

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. 3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 138*)—EFFECT—CONTRACTS IMPLIED ON PART PERFORMANCE—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID.

Where plaintiff paid defendant a part of the price under an oral contract to convey and entered upon the land and made improvements thereon, but defendant did not convey because of his failure to complete his own title thereto, plaintiff could recover the amount paid and compensation for his improvements to the extent of the increased value of the property, less his profits while in possession, even though defendant denied the validity of the contract.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 215*)—RIGHTS OF THIRD PARTY.

Where plaintiff purchased part of land from defendant which the latter had agreed to purchase from another, plaintiff was under no obligation to defendant's vendor, and hence a contention that plaintiff should have tendered the latter the price of all of the land he sold defendant in order to entitle plaintiff to a conveyance of that actually purchased from defendant was untenable.

5. TENDER (§ 16*)—SUFFICIENCY—EXCUSE FOR FAILURE TO PRODUCE ACTUAL CASH.

In an action to recover money paid under a parol contract to convey because of defendant's failure to complete his own title by complying with his contract with his own vendor, if plaintiff offered to comply with his contract with defendant and tendered the latter's vendor the price of the land, which he refused to receive unless plaintiff would take and pay for more land than he had agreed with defendant to purchase, it was not necessary for plaintiff to tender the actual cash to defendant's vendor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Columbus County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by Charles Ford against A. Stroud. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff sues for the recovery of money paid defendant on account of the purchase money of a tract of land under a parol contract to purchase, and for compensation for improvements put upon the land while in possession under the contract. He sets out in his complaint the contract, alleges the payment of the money, and that he put the improvements on the land, and the refusal of defendant to make a deed. Defendant does not specifically deny these allegations, but sets up new matter, by way of avoidance, etc. Plaintiff testified: That defendant proposed to sell him the land, and he agreed to buy it for $750. He paid defendant $200 on account of the purchase money and went into possession. The contract was not reduced to writing. Plaintiff paid an additional $200, stayed on the land two years making valuable improvements, buildings, etc., and "had to leave." Defendant returned $80 of the amount paid. When plaintiff demanded of defendant a deed for the land, he told him to call on Mr. D. L. Gore, who would make the deed. That he went to Mr. Gore to get a deed, and he refused to give him one. "I told defendant that I wanted him to give my money back, and he refused to do so. Mr. Gore said he would not make me a deed unless I would take all of the land. I offered to pay Mr. Gore the balance of the money on the piece of the land as defendant told me to do. * * * Defendant said he had a bond for title. I could not get a deed from Gore, nor from defendant for the land, although I was ready to pay the money and offered to do so." Defendant objected to this testimony and duly excepted to its admission. Plaintiff testified, without objection, that he put improvements on the land, giving estimate of value. Defendant offered no evidence, but moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was denied, and he excepted. Defendant tendered issues which his honor refused to submit. Exception. The following issues were submitted to the jury: "(1) Did defendant contract with plaintiff to sell plaintiff the tract of land described in the complaint? (2) Is the defendant indebted to plaintiff on account of money paid to him on purchase price of said land, and, if so, what amount? (3) Is the defendant indebted to plaintiff on account of improvements of said land, and, if so, what amount?" Defendant excepted. The only portion of his honor's charge to which exception was taken, and which is set out, is as follows: "If they found from the evidence and by the greater weight thereof, the burden being on the plaintiff, that the plaintiff complied with his part of the contract or offered to comply with said contract, and that he tendered D. L. Gore the amount for said land under the contract, and that Gore refused to receive same and make title to the plaintiff, unless plaintiff would take it and pay for more land than he had contracted for, the court charges you that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to tender the actual cash to the said Gore." There was a verdict for plaintiff on all of the issues. Judgment and appeal.

H. McClammy, for appellant.

CONNOR, J. The defendant's motion for judgment of nonsuit presents the merits of the appeal. The motion admits the plaintiff's testimony to be true. If, upon these facts, he is entitled to maintain the action, the rulings, in regard to the admission of evidence and the instructions, are correct. While the answer does not specifically admit the allegation in the complaint in regard to the contract, it does not contain a general or specific denial, as required by the Code of Procedure. We think that, upon both reason and authority, the plaintiff is entitled to maintain his action and recover the amount paid on account of the purchase money and compensation for his improvements to the extent of the enhanced value of the land, less profits made by him while in possession. It is true that the contract of purchase, being in parol, is void. It appears that defendant was not able to make title until, by complying with the terms of a bond which he held from D. L. Gore, he acquired one himself, and this he has failed to do, resulting in plaintiff's losing the land. In Ellis v. Ellis, 16 N. C. 402, it was held that a party who had paid the purchase money for land, under a parol contract which was repudiated by the vendor, was not entitled to maintain a bill in equity, either for specific performance because of the statute of frauds, or for the amount paid on the purchase price. The reason given by Ruffin, C. J., is: "Because so far as concerns the land the contract is merely void, and the money can be recovered at law in an action for money had and received." There is, in such cases, a total failure of consideration, and, as it would be inequitable to permit the vendor to repudiate his contract and retain the money paid upon it, the law gives to the vendee an equitable action, based upon an implied assumpsit for money had and received. The right to be reimbursed for the payment of the purchase money on a parol contract, for the purchase of land, repudiated by the vendor, and have compensation for betterments made while in possession under the contract has, in many cases, been enforced by courts of equity, by enjoining the eviction of the vendee until the money paid on the purchase price has been repaid and compensation for improvements made. In Albea v. Griffin, 22 N. C. 9, the bill was for specific performance of the contract. The defendants relied upon the statute of frauds; the contract being in parol. Gaston, J., said: "We admit this objection to be well founded, and we hold, as a consequence from it, that, the contract being void, not only its specific performance cannot be enforced, but that no action will lie, in law or equity, for damages because of nonperformance. But we are nevertheless of the opinion that plaintiff has an equity which entitles him to relief, and that parol evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing that equity. The plaintiff's labor and money have been expended on improving property which the ancestor of the defendants encouraged him to expect should become his own, and, by the act of God, or the caprice of the defendants, this expectation has been frustrated. The consequence is a loss to him and a gain to them. It is against conscience that they should be enriched by gains thus acquired to his injury." Baker v. Carson, 21 N. C. 381. In Dunn v. Moore, 38 N. C. 364, relief was denied because the contract set up in the bill was denied. Nash, J., said that, if defendant had admitted the contract, the court would not have permitted him to put plaintiff out "without returning the money he had received and compensating him for his improvements."

While, in the case at bar, the contract is not denied, if it had been we should not hesitate to follow the decision in Luton v. Badham, 127 N. C. 96, 37 S. E. 143, 53 L. R.

A. 337, 80 Am. St. Rep. 783, in which Mr. Justice Furches reviews this and all of the other cases and shows conclusively that the right to relief cannot be defeated by a mere denial of the contract. See the very able and, the writer thinks, conclusive opinion of Smith, C. J., in McCracken v. McCracken, 88 N. C. 272. Certainly this cannot be done where the action is for the recovery of the purchase money, as upon an implied assumpsit for money had and received, or for money paid for a consideration which has failed. In Daniel v. Crumpler, 75 N. C. 184, Rodman, J., says that the right to recover the purchase money and compensation for improvements against one who has repudiated his parol contract to convey land "stands on general principles of equity." As said by Judge Furches in Luton v. Badham, supra, all of the cases are based upon this theory. It is doubtful whether, prior to the abolition of the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, an action could have been maintained, at law, for compensation for improvements put upon land by the vendee. The court of equity had granted relief by enjoining the eviction of the vendee by the vendor, who had repudiated his contract until he had made compensation for improvements. Whatever difficulty was encountered because of technical rules of pleading disappears when forms of action are abolished and a plaintiff recovers upon the facts stated in his complaint and proven upon the trial. The careful review of the authorities and satisfactory discussion in the opinion in Luton v. Badham, supra, and the dissent of Smith, C. J., in McCracken's Case, supra, relieves us of the duty of doing more than to refer to them. It is interesting to observe the trend of thought upon the subject as illustrated in the decided cases, showing how the law "works itself pure" and enforces the maxim "that there is no wrong without a remedy." If, as said by Judge Gaston, it is inequitable for a man to make a parol contract to sell land, receive the purchase money, and encourage the vendee to make improvements on it, and, by repudiating the contract, retain the money and take the land, with its enhanced value, certainly the court must find some way, either preventive or remedial, to make him "do equity." We think that it has done so. We cannot perceive any good reason for saying that, so long as the vendee retains possession under the contract, he will be protected in his right, but if, seeing that he can get no title, he surrenders possession, he is without remedy. His honor correctly denied the motion for judgment of nonsuit and admitted the evidence of the contract. It seems that defendant had purchased a body of land from Gore, of which he sold plaintiff only a portion, and that he owed Gore on account of the purchase money more than plaintiff owed defendant. Plaintiff was under no obligation to pay Gore any more than he owed defendant. Hence the contention about the validity of the tender to Gore by plaintiff is without merit. Plaintiff was under no obligation to Gore—had made no contract with him. Defendant was in default in not perfecting his title and conveying to plaintiff according to his contract. We find no error in the portion of the charge set out in the record. The remainder is presumed to be correct. The issues submitted present the matter in controversy.

Upon an inspection of the entire record, we find no error.

CAULEY v. SUTTON et al.

1. MORTGAGES (§ 137*)—EFFECT—TITLE OF MORTGAGEE.

A mortgage passes the legal estate to the mortgagee, who holds it in trust for himself and for the mortgagor.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 144*)—ACQUISITION BY MORTGAGEE OF OUTSTANDING TITLE—EFFECT.

The title acquired by a mortgagee purchasing an outstanding title superior to his own inures to the benefit of the mortgagor.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 144*)—ACQUISITION BY MORTGAGEE OF TAX TITLE—EFFECT.

Though under Revisal 1905, § 2858, a mortgagee may pay the taxes on the premises and acquire a lien on the land therefor, his purchase of the land at a tax sale gives him only an incumbrance, not the equitable estate of the mortgagor, which still exists, and the mortgagee cannot assert any right under the tax deed in conflict with the equity of redemption.

4. MORTGAGES (§ 143*)—REDEMPTION—POSSESSION BARRING REDEMPTION.

A mere constructive possession by a mortgagee arising from the fact of his being the owner of the legal title without actual possession for the required length of time does not bar the equity of redemption under Revisal 1905, § 391, barring an action for the redemption of a mortgage where the mortgagee has been in possession for a specified time.

5. TAXATION (§ 805*)—SUIT TO SET ASIDE TAX DEED—LIMITATIONS.

An action under Revisal 1905, § 1589, to cancel a tax deed is not an action to recover real estate sold for taxes within the three-year statute of limitations provided for such actions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lenoir County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by W. R. Cauley against J. R. Sutton and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Loftin, Varser & Dawson and Murray Allen, for appellants. G. V. Cooper and Y. T. Ormond, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought for the purpose of having canceled a tax deed executed by the sheriff to Ben Sutton, and also a mortgage on land executed by the plaintiff to Ben Sutton, which he alleged had been satisfied. The defendants are the heirs of Ben Sutton, who is dead. The plaintiff alleged, and there was evidence tending to prove, that the mortgagee bought the land at a tax sale, and received a deed from the sheriff therefor. The defendants averred that the tax sale was in all respects valid, and passed the absolute title to their ancestor, and that he had been in adverse possession of the land after the execution of the mortgage for a sufficient length of time to bar the plaintiff's cause of action under the statute of limitations. The court restricted the issues to the effect of the tax deed as a cloud upon the title, and refused to pass upon the question as to the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage; the administrator of Ben Sutton not being a party to the action. The jury found in response to issues submitted to them that Ben Sutton acquired no title to the land by the tax sale and the deed of the sheriff to him, and therefore that the plaintiff is the owner of the land in controversy. In other words, that the tax deed did not deprive the plaintiff of his equity of redemption by conveying an absolute or unconditional estate to the ancestor of defendants. They further found that the plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations. The court rendered judgment upon the verdict, and left all matters of account between the parties, with reference to the mortgage debt, to be determined in an independent action, without prejudice by reason of the proceedings and judgment in this suit. The defendants excepted and appealed.

The only question involved in this case is whether the mortgagee, by his purchase at the tax sale, acquired title to the land, and thereby extinguished the plaintiff's equity of redemption. This question must be answered in the negative. In some states, where a mortgage is regarded only as a security for the debt and the legal title is not considered as in the mortgagee, it has been held that a mortgagee who is not in actual possession of the land may acquire the title by purchase at a tax sale as against the mortgagor. But this is not the rule with us. The legal estate passes to the mortgagee, and he holds it not only in trust for himself, but also for the mortgagor. McLeod v. Bullard, 86 N. C. 210-216; Capehart v. Dettrick, 91 N. C. 844. We have held that, if he pays off an incumbrance or buys in an outstanding title superior to his own, he cannot hold it for his own benefit, but the act inures to the benefit of him for whom he holds as trustee, and further, "if he buys at a sale made under a prior mortgage, he does not acquire the title for his own personal benefit, but merely removes an incumbrance and the charges of it, as a prior lien, upon the property itself; and this is so, because he cannot take advantage of his position to the injury of those whose interests are committed to his protection." Taylor v. Heggie, 83 N. C. 244. The taxes assessed were a lien upon the land, and, when the mortgagee bought at the sheriff's sale, he purchased only an incumbrance, the cost of which he is entitled to have added to the debt secured by the mortgage, and it is, therefore, an additional lien upon the land. The mortgagee could have paid the taxes and acquired a lien upon the land to the extent of the amount so paid by him. Code, § 3700 (Revisal 1906, § 2858). He did not acquire the equitable estate of the mortgagor, which still exists, notwithstanding his purchase at the tax sale, and he cannot use his deed for the purpose of asserting any right in conflict with the mortgagor's equity of redemption.

We find no error in the rulings of the court to which the numerous exceptions were taken. There was no evidence that the mortgagee had occupied the land for a sufficient length of time to bar the equity of redemption under the statute of limitations. A constructive possession by him, arising from the fact of his being the owner of the legal title, without actual possession for the required length of time, did not effect that result. Simmons v. Ballard, 102 N. C. 105, 9 S. E. 495; Parker v. Banks, 79 N. C. 480; Code, § 152 (4); Revisal 1906, § 391 (4). The statute requiring actions to recover lands sold for taxes to be brought within three years after the execution of the sheriff's deed has no application to this action, as it was not brought for the recovery of the land. Beck v. Meroney, 135 N. C. 532, 47 S. E. 618. It was brought under Acts 1893, p. 37, c. 6 (Revisal 1906, § 1589). The plaintiff alleged that the debt had been paid, and asked for a cancellation of the mortgage and for general relief. It would have been a more correct procedure if the court had ascertained what amount, if any, is due upon the mortgage debt, proper parties being made for that purpose, so that the plaintiff could redeem or the mortgage be foreclosed by sale under the order of the court and all matters in controversy between the parties settled in one action. As it is, only a part of the case has been tried.

We do not commend the course pursued, and, if the plaintiff or the defendants so desire, the court may proceed further in the cause for the purpose herein indicated; otherwise the present judgment will stand as a final and not merely an interlocutory judgment in this action, without prejudice to the right of either party to proceed by an independent action to have determined the other matters of difference between them.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Ward, Judge.

Action by B. S. Midgette, administrator of W. S. Leary, against the Branning Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff, administrator, alleges: "That plaintiff's intestate, Leary, as he is informed and believes, was employed and working in the mill of the defendant company under its direction as assistant engineer on and before the 18th day of December 1900. That on the 18th day of December, 1900, the said W. S. Leary was killed in the mill of the defendant company by reason of the negligence of said company, in that its machinery and belts were not safe and were in a rotten and unsecure condition and unfit for the operation of the said mill. That the said mill of the defendant company was not in a safe condition. Its machinery was in bad condition, unsafe, and dangerous. That the same was old and secondhand, having been carried from another old mill and placed in the mill at Columbia. That the building was badly and negligently arranged, with not sufficient room for operating said machinery and repairing same, which facts were known to the defendant company. That the plaintiff's intestate, Leary, while in the employ of the defendant company, and under its directions, was ordered to repair one of the belts running the machinery of the said mill which had broken, and he was required to do this work while the mill was running, which was dangerous and unsafe." That while so engaged in discharging the duties imposed upon him by his employer, to wit, "mending one of the belts," one of them broke, and intestate was killed. Defendant denied that it was, in any respect, negligent, or was guilty of any breach of duty to intestate in the premises. It alleged that plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence. It also alleged that intestate well knew of the condition of the machinery when he entered upon the employment there a month before his death and assumed the risk incident thereto. The following issues were, without objection, submitted to the jury: "(1) Was the death of plaintiff's intestate caused by the negligence of the defendant, as alleged? (2) Did said intestate, by his own negligence, contribute to his death? (3) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant?"

There was evidence tending to show: That the mill was running at night—8 or 9 o'clock—to make up lost time, when intestate was killed. That it was in bad condition. That it could not make time without running on "and stopping often." That it was an old secondhand mill. That the "hog," a machine which grinds up slabs, runs by 2 belts having a cylinder, with 12 knots, making 1,600 revolutions a minute. It was in bad condition, out of balance, had poor foundation, and was, on that account, shaking. There was evidence, on the part of defendant, tending to contradict this evidence. The direct testimony in regard to the manner in which intestate came to his death comes from C. H. Leary, who testified: "That on the day intestate was killed, we had worked part of the time and started up again at 7 o'clock at night to make up lost time. He was killed between 8 and 9 o'clock that night. I was upstairs talking with the sawyer, and he said to me that one of the 'hog' belts was broken; there being a belt on each side of the cylinder. I went down to repair the broken belt. I found it torn in two and took it off, putting a piece of edging between the belt and pulley. I then went down to work on the belt, but soon found that the edging which I had put in had shaken out. Had the 'hog' been in place, it would not have shaken, and the piece would not have come out. It came out because it was shaken so bad. Deceased was helping me to fix the belt. I directed him, and had the right to direct him. He was under my direction. I sent him up to the 'hog' to put the piece back. The 'hog' was eight feet higher than where we were standing. He walked up on conveyor box, which conveyed sawdust to the platform. This was the only way he could get up to it without going over conveyor box and through belts. I did not see him after he got up. It was not more than a minute. When he got up, the belt got foul around the pulley. It was slipping. It struck him on the hand. When it first got foul, the sawdust was so thick I could not see him until engine was slowed down. I saw him then hung up in the belt that caused his death. If the engine had been shut down when he went up to repair the belt, there was no danger. There would have been no danger if the 'hog' had been balanced. The pulley was badly worn, about played out. The belt was unsound and had been burned. It was two feet between where I was working and the conveyor belt." Witness was here asked by plaintiff what was the space condition of the room where he had to work. Defendant objected to this question and to the answer to the same. Objection overruled. Witness answered: "Did not have room. If there had been more room, could have gone around." To the admission of this question and answer defendant excepted. Witness said on cross-examination: "When machinery ought to stop, it was the duty of both myself and my brother to stop it. My brother had been at the mill some little time. W. T. Campen employed us both and paid us both. The 'hog' was approached by a ladder. To get to the ladder my brother had to come out underneath the belt or go through it. After he got out he could have gone up the ladder. After he got up to pulley, he would have been safer going up by the ladder which was provided by the company. If the engine had been stopped, there would have been no danger. The cause of danger was that my brother went up there when the engine was in motion. When I was there, it was my duty to stop the engine. When we were at work on the pulley the safer was to go up by the way he went."

Plaintiff was permitted, over defendant's exception, to show by one Walker: That the "hog" would shake a great deal, that the mill broke down often, and that "we could seldom make a day." The breaking of the conveyor chain was the cause of the delay. That there was no safe way to go up into this machinery while the mill was running. Witness had worked at the mill, but had not seen the "hog" for three months before the accident. Leary was recalled and testified that "to go around the shaft there was only 12 inches space, and that he would have to go all around the mill."

Defendant introduced W. T. Campen, who had charge of the mill. He testified upon the question of negligence and contributory negligence that: "I instructed the hands never to repair the mill unless it was shut down. I gave this instruction to the deceased and his brother, Howard Leary. * * * There was greater danger going up the way the deceased went than if he had gone up the steps which were provided by the company. Deceased had been working with the company six weeks when he was killed. Brother of the deceased said it was his own fault that he was killed." There was contradictory evidence upon this point. Witness also testified that: "The mill and machinery were in as good condition as mills generally are, and was kept in good condition. No 'hog' could be run for 20 hours in balance, owing to the great strain upon them, but this 'hog' and machinery were in a condition usual with mills." Defendant introduced other testimony to same effect. It was admitted that the mill belonged to defendant. For the purpose of showing that plaintiff's intestate was not employed by it, defendant introduced W. T. Campen, who testified: "That in December, 1899, he was employed by the Branning Manufacturing Company to take this mill and run it. By the contract he was to keep up all repairs and do all the work. He was to receive the timber from the log cars of the Branning Manufacturing Company, cut the logs into lumber, and deliver it to the Branning Manufacturing Company, thus manufactured for shipment on its cars, for which the Branning Company was to pay him $1.75 per 1,000 feet. We were to give each other 30 days' notice before either could give up the contract. I took charge on the 15th day of January. Later, and before the accident, I became dissatisfied with the contract and gave notice that I would quit. Whereupon Mr. Branning, president of the company, had an interview with me, and told me he would pay me what I could make, and he indemnified me that I should make $150 per month. Under the contract I was to have entire charge of the mill. I was to hire the hands and to discharge them, and no one else had anything to do with them. I remained in charge two years and one month. If I made more than $150 per month which he guaranteed I should make at $1.75 per 1,000, I was to have it. * * * I kept no office and kept no books. I made out the pay rolls and sent them to Edenton, and the money was charged to me. The Branning Company employed an inspector to keep the amount of lumber I cut. This was agreed upon when I made the bargain, and this was the only person about the mill that the Branning Company hired or paid. It was also agreed, when the contract was made, that the Branning Company should keep the books and should furnish the cash for the purpose of paying the hands upon the pay rolls furnished by me. This was done because I had no facilities for bookkeeping, and because there were no banks in Columbia from which I could get money. There was some trading done by my laborers at the store of the Branning Manufacturing Company. This credit was given them at my request. Statements were sent to me, and I was responsible to the amount of the wages due the hands. The amounts so advanced were charged to me on the books. The company agreed to pay me 5 per cent. of the net profits for the trade of my men at their store. This agreement was not made until after the guarantee by Branning Company referred to above. I hired intestate, paid him, and directed him, and no one but me had the right to discharge him. I would not have kept a man as assistant engineer who was disagreeable to the chief, and would have dismissed him upon complaint of the chief; but he could not be removed without my consent. My name did not appear upon the pay roll at all, only the hands employed by me. Bills for material furnished the mill and for repairs upon the mill were charged against me, and I would send them to the Branning Company, which would put them to my account. That company had nothing to do with the work, except to give me any special sizes they would want to cut. Generally the timber was cut in 16 and 12 foot lengths, but if defendant wanted special bill I would cut them for them." This testimony was corroborated by Horton Corwin, Jr., president of defendant company. Plaintiff's witness Walker, upon this branch of the case, testified that while he was employed at the mill (1900) he saw Mr. Branning come to the mill often. "He would talk with Campen; were walking around the plant together once or twice a month." There was other evidence to same effect. Defendant owned a plant in Edenton, N. C. The mill in which plaintiff's intestate was employed was located at Columbia, N. C. The lumber cut there belonged to defendant. It was shipped to Edenton. Defendant, at the appropriate stages of the trial, moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was refused, and defendant excepted. Defendant made a number of requests for special instructions, which are noticed in the opinion. The instructions given, to which exceptions are taken, are noted and discussed in the opinion. There was a verdict for the plaintiff upon both issues, and damages assessed at $2,000. Motion for new trial. Denied. Exception. Judgment upon the verdict. Defendant assigned errors and appealed.

Pruden & Pruden, Shepherd & Shepherd, and W. M. Bond, for appellant. J. B. Leigh and Aydlott & Ehringhaus, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts as above). No issue being tendered in regard to the alleged assumption of risk by plaintiff's intestate, that defense is eliminated from the case. We presume that the learned counsel treatise that phase of the case as involved in the issue directed to the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate. We have set out the testimony at some length, because the requests for special instructions and the exceptions to the instructions given present every possible question which could arise upon the record. We will first dispose of the exceptions to his honor's admission of testimony. The first is directed to the answer given by the witness as to the "space condition," etc. It will be observed that the answer is not responsive to the question. He was not asked for an opinion or conclusion, but for a fact. If his honor had been so requested, he would doubtless have stricken out the answer and directed the witness to give one responsive to the question. This the witness did later on by saying that "there was one 12-inch space to go around the shaft." While the first answer may have been, and probably was, subject to the criticism made by defendant, it was, in the light of the subsequent answer giving the fact upon which the jury were enabled to draw their own conclusion, not prejudicial to defendant—certainly not sufficiently so to call for a new trial. It is frequently difficult to draw the line between testimony which is a statement of fact and that which is a conclusion of the witness. The testimony, upon which the next two exceptions are based, is, at the most, irrelevant and harmless. The exception to the testimony of Walker, in regard to the condition of the mill three months before the death of plaintiff's intestate, is not referred to in the brief and is to be treated as abandoned. The motion for judgment of nonsuit was properly denied.

The contention of the defendant, in regard to the question of Campen's being an independent contractor, which, as said by his honor to the jury, lay at the threshold of the case, is presented by the prayer for an instruction that, "Upon all of the evidence in this case, the jury shall find that Campen was an independent contractor, that defendant owed no duty to the intestate, and they shall answer the first issue, 'No.'" This his honor declined, but said to the jury "that this would be the first inquiry, and, if they found that Campen was an independent contractor, that ends the case." He further instructed the jury: "It is contended by the defendant that it had contracted its mill to Campen. It is accepted law that where a contract is for something that may be lawfully done and is proper in its terms, and there has been no negligence in selecting a suitable person to contract with, in respect to it, and no general control is reserved, either in respect to the manner of doing the work or the agents to be employed in doing it, and the person for whom the work is done is interested only in the ultimate result of the work, and not in several steps as to progress, the latter is not liable to a third person for the negligence of the contractor; but liability of the superior master depends upon his right to control the conduct of the person with whom he contracts in the prosecution of the work. If you find from the evidence that Campen leased the mill of the Branning Manufacturing Company under contract that was to employ the labor and bear all the expense of running the mill, was to receive the logs of the company from the trucks, manufacture the same into timber, and deliver it aboard cars for shipment at $1.75 per 1,000 feet, with guaranty that he should make as much as $150 per month, and that it did not retain the right to control the conduct of Campen and was interested only in the ultimate result of the work, then the defendant is not liable, and you will answer the first issue, 'No.' But if you find from the evidence that there was a general control of the operation of the mill reserved by the defendant company in respect to the general operation of the mill, then go further and consider the question of negligence raised."

To these instructions defendant excepted. We think that the charge is in accordance with the decisions of this court. The language used by his honor in defining an "independent contractor" is identical with that of Mr. Justice Walker in Craft v. Lumber Co., 132 N. C. 151, 43 S. E. 597, quoted with approval in Young v. Lumber Co., 147 N. C. 26, 60 S. E. 654. If his honor correctly declined the instruction which practically took the question from the jury, there can be no valid criticism of the charge given. Plaintiff suggests that the burden of showing that Campen was an independent contractor was on the defendant. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show that his intestate was in the employment of defendant. It would seem that, when he showed that the mill was the property of the defendant corporation, that at the time of his employment it was being operated in sawing the logs of the defendant, and that the sawed lumber was shipped to defendant at Edenton, near by, where it was operating a plant, plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury on the issue. "Where the plaintiff has suffered an injury from the negligent management of a vehicle, such as a boat, car, or carriage, it is sufficient prima facie evidence that the negligence was imputable to the defendant to show that he was the owner of the thing, without proving affirmatively that the person in charge was the defendant's servant. It lies with the defendant to show that the person in charge was not his servant, leaving him to show, if he can, that the property was not under his control at the time, and that the accident was occasioned by the fault of a stranger, an independent contractor or other person, for whose negligence the owner would not be answerable." 1 Sherm. & Redf. Neg. 71. Any other rule, especially where persons are dealing with corporations, which can act only through agents and servants, would render it almost impossible for a plaintiff to recover for injuries sustained by defective machinery or negligent use of machinery. The plaintiff's intestate may be taken to have known that the mill was the property of defendant—that it was being used for the purpose of sawing defendant's logs. One witness said that "defendant owned much timber on this side of the Sound, and a railroad." Campen said, "there was some trading done by my laborers at the store of the Branning Manufacturing Company." All of this was well calculated to cause intestate to suppose that Campen was operating the mill for defendant company, and, in the absence of any testimony to the contrary, would be sufficient to carry the case to the jury and sustain a verdict. Without entering into the debatable domain of the burden of proof, it is sufficient to say that at least in this case the plaintiff had put upon defendant the duty of "going forward" or "persuading" the jury that Campen was not operating the mill for the owner, but as an independent contractor. The instruction asked by defendant involves the proposition that, taking all of the evidence as true, it has shown, as a matter of law, that Campen was an independent contractor.

An examination of the authorities and decided cases discloses much confusion and uncertainty in respect to what constitutes an independent contractor. The question underwent an exhaustive discussion in Wiswall v. Brinson, 32 N. C. 554, in which Pearson, J., and Ruffin, C. J., differed in opinion. The opinions are "mines of learning" and "arsenals of argument." Pearson, J., begins the discussion by saying that "the question is one of serious difficulty," that the cases "are numerous," and that "many of them turn upon nice distinctions." He states the fundamental principles "that one should so use his own as not to injure another," and "that which you do by another, you do by yourself"; and from these two maxims he says: "The general rule results where one procures work to be done, if a third person is injured by the negligence or want of skill of the persons employed, the person for whose benefit and at whose instance the work is done must make compensation. * * * The rule is founded upon justice, and exceptions to it should be allowed with caution and only to the extent called for by public convenience." He then proceeds to discuss the recognized exceptions, as established by decided cases. We would not undertake to add anything to the discussion in the opinion, concurred in by Nash, J., and the dissenting opinion of Ruffin, C. J. It is conceded that where the person employed to do work carries on an independent employment and does the work in his own way, by his own means, and free from the right of control by the person for whom the work is done, he is an independent contractor. This exception is based upon public convenience and sound policy. It is said: "The true test, as it seems to us, by which to determine whether one who renders service to another does so as a contractor or not, is to ascertain whether he renders the service in the course of an independent occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work and not as to the means by which it is accomplished." Such was the leading case of Milligan v. Wedge, 12 Adol. & E. 737, cited by Sharpenstein, J., in Bennett v. Truebody, 66 Cal. 509, 6 Pac. 329, 56 Am. Rep. 117. There the injury was caused by the negligence of a plumber who "exercised an independent and distinct employment." It was held that the owner of the premises was not liable. In Hexamer v. Webb, 101 N. Y. 377, 4 N. E. 755, 54 Am. Rep. 706, the party employed was engaged in the "roofing and cornice business." Corbin v. American Mills, 27 Conn. 274, 71 Am. Dec. 63; Manasfield Coal Co. v. McEnery, 91 Pa. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 662. It would seem that where the person employed to do the work in his own way, and free from the control of the employer, is engaged in an independent calling, it is but just that persons who contract with him, either as employes or otherwise, should look to him for compensation. We do not mean to say that the exception is confined to work done by one engaged in an independent calling. It is certainly much more difficult to fix the limits of the exception when this element is absent. In Waters v. Fuel Co., 52 Minn. 474, 55 N. W. 52, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564, the employe of defendant was engaged in delivering coal at a stipulated price per load. Held, that he was the servant of the company. The court said: "It is not easy to frame a definition of the term 'independent contractor' that will satisfactorily meet the conditions of different cases as they arise, as each case must depend so largely upon its own facts." Speed v. Railroad Co., 71 Mo. 303, was an action for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while engaged in unloading a car belonging to defendant. It appeared that the defendant had entered into an agreement with one Merry, by which he was to take entire charge and control of the business of loading and unloading freight to and from its cars at St. Louis station. By the terms of the agreement Merry was to have authority and control over the grounds, yards, and building at the station, including engines and cars to enable him to properly discharge his duties under the agreement. Merry was to be paid 15 cents per ton for each ton shipped to or from the yard. All the business was to be transacted by Merry in a manner satisfactory to the superintendent of defendant and subject to his control. Plaintiff was employed by Merry and was injured while in such employment. Defendant set up the defense that Merry was an independent contractor. Henry, J., said: "There is an irreconcilable conflict in the adjudications upon this subject. The general principle is recognized everywhere that one is only liable for damages occasioned by the act of another when he stands in the relation of master to that other. It is an easy matter to state the general principle, but it is often extremely difficult to determine, from the facts in a given case, whether the relation of master and servant exists." It was held in that case that the relation existed, and defendant company was liable. The value of the decision is weakened by the fact that the court attached importance to the character of the business in which defendant was engaged—a common carrier. Probably all that can be done, after an examination of the decided cases, is to adopt the conclusion of Judge Bailey that: "There is much confusion in the authorities, and much depends on the exact conditions of the employment and particular circumstances attending each case. The mere fact that one works by the piece or job, and not by the day or week, is not a conclusive test of the character of the employé, whether a servant or an independent contractor." Personal Injuries, 470.

The plaintiff having shown conditions entitling him to go to the jury, it became the duty of defendant to show, or at least introduce, evidence to repel the plaintiff's proof. The truth of the testimony, together with the reasonable inferences to be drawn therefrom, was for the jury. There was much in the testimony to justify them in rejecting the defendant's contention. As we have pointed out: The mill belonged to defendant. The logs being cut were its property. The hands were paid by orders on the defendant. Some of them traded at defendant's store. The defendant kept an inspector at the mill to take an account of the lumber. The defendant guaranteed that Campen should make at least $150 per month. The contract was for no definite time. There is no suggestion that Campen carried on any independent employment. Mr. Branning came to the mill often. It is true that defendant's testimony was to the effect that the company had nothing to do with the work, except to give special sizes it wanted cut, and tended to explain many of the circumstances and conditions relied upon by plaintiff. It is significant that Campen uses the expression that he was employed by the Branning Manufacturing Company to take the mill and run it. In Young v. Lumber Co., supra, the contract, under which the logs were cut in the woods, was in writing. We held that his honor erroneously submitted the question, as to its legal signification, to the jury; but held that he should have submitted the question whether the contractor was cutting the logs in good faith under the contract. Merely calling a man an "independent contractor" cannot make him so. We should hesitate to hold that a person or corporation could, under the form and semblance of an independent contract, operate a secondhand mill in bad repair, dangerous to employés, for the purpose of having its logs cut into lumber, and escape liability for injuries sustained by the employés who, in good faith and upon reasonable grounds, supposed that they were employed by and were working for the owner of the mill. Such an exception to the general rule stated by Chief Justice Pearson in Wiswall v. Brinson, supra, would not be founded upon public convenience or sound policy. In Davis v. Summerfield, 133 N. C. 325, 45 S. E. 654, 63 L. R. A. 492, we held that, where the character of the work to be done was essentially dangerous, the duty to use due care could not be delegated to an independent contractor by the owner of the property. We also discussed the question in Young's Case, supra. This is a recognized exception to the rule. How far this exception to the nonliability of the owner of the property is applicable to a case like this we do not undertake to say. It is well worthy of consideration whether the owner of machinery, unsafe for use and dangerous to employés, can, by contracting with an insolvent person to operate it to do the owner's work and by simply surrendering control of the manner of doing the work, avoid liability for injuries sustained by employés. It may be that liability would be based upon a different legal foundation, falling within the domain of tort, rather than breach of contract. Railroad v. Madden, 77 Kan. 80, 93 Pac. 586.

Upon the question of negligence the court instructed the jury: "In order to establish actionable negligence, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show to the jury, by the greater weight of evidence, that there has been a failure by the defendant in the exercise of reasonable care to discharge some duty which it owed the plaintiff under the circumstances in which they were placed, 'reasonable care' being that care which a prudent man would exercise under similar circumstances, when surrounded by like conditions; and not only this, but he must also show that such failure of duty was the proximate cause of the result, 'proximate cause' being that which produces the result in a continuous sequence, and one without which the result would not have happened, and one from which a man of ordinary prudence could foresee that such result would likely happen. It is the law in North Carolina that an employer of labor, to assist in the operation of mill and plants, where the machinery is more or less complicated, is required to provide his employés, in the exercise of reasonable care, a reasonably safe place to work, and to supply them with machinery reasonably safe and suitable, and he is also required to keep such machinery in such condition as far as can be done in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence."

We perceive no error in this instruction. It is in accordance with the decisions of this court and the well-settled principles of the law prescribing the duty of employers to their employés. The record states that his honor charged the jury in respect to fellow servants to which there was no exception other than his refusal to instruct the jury, as requested, that intestate and his brother, Howard Leary, were fellow servants. This, in the light of the testimony of Howard: "I directed him and had a right to direct him. He was under my direction. I sent him up to the 'hog' to put the piece back"—he could not have given. Defendant asked a number of instructions upon the second issue, some of which embodied correct propositions of law. Some of them could not have been given as asked, because they practically took the question from the jury. His honor instructed the jury upon this issue: "While the law imposes a duty upon the master, it also imposes a correlative duty upon the servant. It requires him to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, to use his intelligence and his senses, and it holds him responsible if he is injured by his failure to exercise such care. It requires him to observe the machinery at which he is working and the appliances used to discover those dangers which a man of ordinary prudence would discover, and, if he fails to perform his duty and is injured thereby, he cannot recover damages, for, while the plaintiff assumes the risk incident to the working in the mill, he did not assume the risk resulting from defective machinery or from defective place or appliances to do his work, and if the plaintiff knew of the danger of the machinery when he went up to fix the 'hog,' and if in consequence thereof the danger to himself was so obvious that any man of ordinary prudence would not have gone up the way plaintiff went, then the plaintiff would be guilty of contributory negligence, and you should answer the second issue, 'Yes.' If, however, the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, you will answer this issue, 'No.' If there was a safe way to go to the 'hog' provided by the company, which intestate knew, or ought to have known, and he chose another way which was unsafe, and this was the proximate cause of the hurt, the jury shall answer the second issue, 'Yes.' That if the jury shall find that it was clear in the mind of one of ordinary intelligence that it was dangerous to go into the machinery as deceased did, and that the danger was obvious and imminent, and notwithstanding he undertook to do so, and his doing so was the proximate cause of his hurt, the jury will answer the second issue, 'Yes.'" These instructions are correct in themselves, and we think present every phase of the controversy. The exception to the refusal to dismiss the case, because not brought in one year, was not pressed in this court. It is settled by Meekins v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 1, 42 S. E. 333.

We have examined the entire record, in the light of the exceptions made to his honor's rulings and the briefs of counsel. The case was carefully tried and fairly submitted to the jury. The evidence, while in some respects conflicting, sustains the plaintiff's contention that the machinery was in bad condition, unsafe, and certainly dangerous when being operated at night.

There is no error.

WILLIS v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

1. PLEADING (§ 129*)—ADMISSIONS BY FAILURE TO DENY.

In an action against a telegraph company for failing to deliver a message, where defendant in its verified answer did not deny an allegation of the complaint that it owned and operated the line on which the error in transmission occurred, the answer was evidence in the nature of an admission that defendant was the owner of the line.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 208*)—ADMISSIONS—SUPERSEDED PLEADING.

The fact that defendant on leave filed an amended answer denying ownership did not affect the competency of the original as evidence, but merely affected its weight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 718; Dec. Dig. § 208.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 74*)—OPERATION—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge in an action against a telegraph company for failure to deliver a message, stating that if defendant's servants failed to exercise ordinary care in attempting to deliver it, and if, by the exercise of such care, the message could have been delivered in time for plaintiff to have reached his home, there was negligence, was sufficient on the question of negligence, in the absence of a special prayer for a more specific instruction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where there was evidence that defendant telegraph company controlled the line on which the error in transmission of plaintiff's message occurred, and evidence of negligence in handling the message at the delivery office, a motion to nonsuit and a prayer for instructions, based on the assumption that there was no evidence of negligence, were properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Dec. Dig. § 73.*]

Connor and Brown, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Carteret County; O. H. Allen, Judge.

Action by C. S. Willis against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was brought to recover damages for failing to deliver a telegram. It appears that on July 27, 1907, at 3 o'clock p. m., Elvin Willis, a brother of the plaintiff, delivered to the defendant at Beaufort, N.

C., for transmission to the plaintiff, C. S. Willis, who lived in Richmond, Va., the following message: "C. S. Willis, 923 East Marshall Street, Richmond, Va. Papa died at 10.30 a. m. Elvin." The message was not delivered until 10 o'clock a. m., on July 23, 1907. It was received by the defendant's operator at Richmond at 3:30 p. m. on the day it was sent. The message was sent from Beaufort by way of Newport, and relayed at the latter place. When received by the defendant's operator at Newport, the address had been changed from "923 Marshall Street" to "23 Marshall Street," and the evidence tended to show that this change was made after the message had been received by the operator at Beaufort; in other words, on the line between Beaufort and Newport. The defendant contended that it was not liable by reason of this fact, as it did not own or operate that line, but that it was owned and operated as an independent line by Thomas Duncan, and there was evidence in the case to sustain this contention. It appears, though, that in the complaint, filed at Fall term, 1907, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant owned and operated the said line as a part of its line between Beaufort, N. C., and Richmond, Va., and that it undertook to transmit the message from Beaufort to Richmond. These allegations were made in sections 1, 2, and 3 of the complaint, and they were not denied in the answer filed at Fall term, 1907, though the other allegations of the complaint were. At Fall term, 1908, by leave of the court, the defendant filed an amendment answer in which the allegations as to the ownership and control of the telegraph line from Beaufort to Newport was denied, and evidence was introduced at the trial which tended to show that said line was not owned or controlled by defendant, but by Thomas Duncan. The plaintiff put in evidence the complaint and the first answer for the purpose of showing that the defendant did own and control the line from Beaufort to Newport. The defendant requested the court to charge the jury "that, if they believed the evidence, the line from Beaufort to Newport was not owned and operated by the defendant, and it would not be liable for any error which occurred on that line." This instruction the court declined to give, but charged that "it is a question for the jury to find from the greater weight of the evidence whether the line from Beaufort to Newport was owned and operated by the defendant, and, if the jury found that the line from Beaufort to Newport was not owned or operated by the defendant, it would not be liable for any error that may have occurred on that line, the burden of proof as to who owned the line, from Beaufort to Newport being on the plaintiff." Defendant excepted.

The defendant requested the court to charge the jury that the defendant would not be responsible for any error that may have occurred in the transmission of the telegram before the same reached its line, and if the jury should find from the evidence that the telegram was delayed by reason of an error in the transmission and change of address before it reached the line of the defendant, then the jury would answer the first issue "No." The court, in response to the prayer, instructed the jury as follows: "The defendant would not be responsible for any error that may have occurred in the transmission of the telegram before the same reached its line. If the jury should find from the evidence that the telegram was delayed by reason of an error in transmission and the change of the address before it reached the line of the defendant, and such delay was the cause of the failure of the plaintiff to receive the message in time to have attended the funeral, then they will answer the first issue 'No.'"

The evidence tended to show that when the message was received at Richmond the operator handed it to a messenger for delivery to the sendee, and that he used a bicycle in delivering messages. The messenger, who had nine other messages to deliver, went to the place described in the message, No. 23 East Marshall street, and also to 23 West Marshall street, and inquired for C. S. Willis, but found that he did not live at either place. He also inquired at each house as to where Willis could be found, but received no information. The messenger returned to the office at 6 o'clock p. m. the same day, as soon as he had delivered the other messages, and handed the message for Willis to the operator, to whom he reported the facts. The operator examined the city directory, and, not finding Willis' name, inquired of other persons by that name about him. Failing to get any information, he wired back for a better address, but his service message was not received at Newport in time to wire to Beaufort and receive an answer before the time for closing the office, which was 9 o'clock p. m. A message was received at Newport from Beaufort giving the correct address that night, but after office hours, and it was not forwarded until the next day. The message from Newport to Richmond had to be sent via New Bern and relayed at that place, as the main, or direct, line to Richmond could not be used, "it being in trouble," as the operator testified. If it had been in order, the corrected message could have been sent to Richmond that night. It could not be sent by New Bern, as the office there had been closed for the night. There was evidence that no inquiry was made at the post office at Richmond for C. S. Willis, who lived at 923 Marshall street, nor was there any further search for him. The night clerk at Richmond mailed a postal card to Willis. The plaintiff could have left Richmond and attended the funeral of his father, if the message had been delivered to him any time before 8 p. m. on the day it was sent, and would have left by the first train.

The court charged the jury, as to what would constitute negligence in failing to deliver the message after it was received by defendant, substantially as follows: If the defendant did not operate the Beaufort and Newport line, and the jury should find that an error in the message occurred on that line, and at the time the message was received by defendant company it had an incorrect address and the one at which defendant undertook to deliver the telegram, then the jury will consider whether or not the defendant company was guilty of negligence after the telegram reached its line at Newport, and if, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, the defendant could have gotten the correct address and delivered the telegram to plaintiff, so that he could have left Richmond on the 27th of July and reached home in time for the funeral, and defendant failed to do so, it was guilty of negligence, and the jury will answer the first issue "Yes." Defendant excepted to this instruction.

There was evidence as to plaintiff's mental anguish and damages. The court having refused to charge, as requested, that there was no evidence of any negligent delay in transmitting and delivering the telegram, and that the jury should answer the first issue "No," the defendant excepted. At the close of the testimony the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff. The motion was refused, and the defendant excepted. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered, and the defendant appealed.

Moore & Dunn, for appellant. Abernethy & Davis, for appellee.

WALKER, J. (after stating the facts as above). The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the telegram was delivered to the defendant at Beaufort, N. C., for transmission to him at Richmond, Va. This was a clear and distinct allegation that the defendant was, at the time, the owner of the telegraph line between Beaufort and Newport, for this was a part of the line from Beaufort to Richmond, and the pleadings and proof show that this fact was well known to the defendant. It is also alleged that the defendant was engaged in the business of transmitting messages from Beaufort to Richmond, and received the message in question at Beaufort, and undertook to transmit and deliver it to the plaintiff at Richmond. The message, it appears, was actually sent by way of Newport, and over the Beaufort and Newport line. Those allegations, which were made in sections 1, 2, and 3 of the complaint, were not denied in the first answer of the defendant, which was filed January 25, 1908, and no reference was made to them, although the allegations of the other sections of the complaint were specially denied. If there had been no amended answer, the allegations of the first three sections of the complaint would be deemed to be admitted, and the defendant would consequently be liable for any error in transmitting the message from Beaufort to Newport on its way to Richmond which occurred on that line. The language of the statute is that "every material allegation of the complaint not controverted by the answer shall, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true." Revisal 1905, § 503. When the plaintiff alleged, substantially, though very plainly, that the defendant was the owner of the line from Beaufort to Newport, and also alleged, in so many words, that it received the message at Beaufort and agreed to transmit and deliver it to the plaintiff, the defendant was called upon to deny the allegation, if not true, and, by not doing so, it tacitly admitted the truth of it. One of the fundamental maxims of the law is that silence implies consent. "Qui tacet, consentire videtur." For instance, where there is a duty to speak, and the party upon whom this duty rests does not, an assent may be inferred from his silence. Russell v. Thornton, 4 H. & N. 798, per Bramwell, J.; Broom's Legal Maxims (8th Ed.) 786. In this case, there was a verified complaint containing the material allegation that the plaintiff owned the Beaufort and Newport line, and had undertaken to transmit the message, not from Newport to Richmond, as now contended and as averred in the defendant's amended answer, but from Beaufort to Richmond. It was the defendant's duty to deny this allegation, if it was not true, as it vitally affected the question of its liability in one aspect of the case. Having chosen to be silent when it had the opportunity to traverse the allegation, we must hold that the complaint and first answer constituted some evidence from which the jury might reasonably infer the ownership by the defendant of the line from Beaufort to Newport. In Perry v. Mfg. Co., 40 Conn. 817, the court say: "Admissions by a party, or by an authorized agent, either in court or out, may be given in evidence. But the circumstances surrounding the admission, the purposes for which it was made, and the conditions attached to it, may be fully shown. It may not infrequently happen that a party will not be bound by an admission, and will not be estopped from denying its truth. And in view of the showing on both sides, allowing each party to prove the whole truth, it will be for the triers to determine how the proof stands on the facts in controversy, on which the admission is claimed to bear. These principles were acted on, substantially, in the court below. They seem to us just and reasonable, and in harmony with the law of evidence." See, also, Pope v. Allis, 115 U. S. 363, 6 Sup. Ct. 69, 29 L. Ed. 393, where many cases are cited in support of the competency of a pleading in an action as evidence against the party filing it, even where he had no personal knowledge of the facts alleged, but made his averment on information and belief. The case of Avery v. Stewart, 136 N. C. 426, 48 S. E. 775, 68 L. R. A. 776, would seem to be directly in point. The fact that the defendant afterwards filed an amended answer and denied that it was the owner of the Beaufort and Newport line does not affect the competency of the evidence, but merely detracts from its weight or its sufficiency to prove the fact now in issue. See, also, 8 Enc. of Pl. & Pr. p. 27, and notes; McMillan v. Gambill, 115 N. C. 352, 20 S. E. 474; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 488. It would seem unreasonable that while the silence of a party, when called upon in a conversation to speak, is receivable in evidence against him, an answer, which is deliberately prepared and verified by the oath of the defendant in response to a demand for the exact truth, should be incapable of probative force. Candor and frankness require the defendant to answer every material allegation well pleaded, and any failure to deny, or evasion by him or suppression of the truth, should be considered as some evidence against him of the truth of the allegation. Such conduct is admissible as evidence, although it may be explained and is not conclusive.

In a case where the defendant in his answer admitted, not expressly but merely by implication, the allegation in the complaint of a payment on a note, and afterwards filed an amended answer denying the payment, this court, by Ruffin, J., said: "We find it difficult to apprehend the exact purport of his honor's rulings as thus given in the statement of the case; to know whether he rejected absolutely, as being incompetent, the evidence of the defendant's implied admission contained in the original answer, or whether, admitting it to be competent, he adjudged it to be in law insufficient to rebut the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time. But taking it to be either way, we hold it to be erroneous. The fact that the evidence of the admissions was contained in an answer constituting a part of the pleadings in the cause cannot, as we conceive, detract from its competency. A man's own admissions touching the subject of a controversy to which he is a party are always admissible against him, and much more ought they to be so when solemnly made in a proceeding in a court of justice. 2 Danl. Ch. Proc. 977, and Hunter v. Jones, 6 Rand. (Va.) 541."

"Neither, as we take it, can its competency be destroyed by the fact that an amended answer was subsequently filed under the leave of the court. As a declaration of the defendant, it can lose none of its vigor because of that circumstance. It is still none the less his declaration, made at a time when he was called upon to disclose the truth, and, as such, may be evidence against him, while neither the original nor amended answer could be evidence for him. Such a declaration has, more than ordinarily, the sanction of the presumption that a man will not untruly speak to his own hurt." Adams v. Utley, 87 N. C. 356, at page 358, citing Isler v. Murphy, 83 N. C. 215.

Our case is stronger than either of the two cases last cited, as here the plaintiff charged distinctly and clearly in the first two sections of his verified complaint that the defendant controlled the line from Beaufort to Newport and undertook to transmit the message from Beaufort to Richmond. The defendant filed an answer verified by one of its chief officers, and was of course called upon to deny this material allegation in the complaint, if not true, as the truth or falsity of it was within his and its knowledge. The case is strictly within the principle settled by this court in numerous cases. Radford v. Rice, 19 N. C. 39; Nelson v. Whitfield, 82 N. C. 46; Merrill v. Whitmire, 110 N. C. 367, 15 S. E. 3; Chemical Co. v. Kirven, 130 N. C. 161, 41 S. E. 1.

We think there was some evidence of negligence in failing to deliver the message after it was received at Richmond. The court charged the jury substantially that, if the defendant's servants failed to exercise ordinary care in attempting to deliver the message, and if, by the exercise of such care, the message could have been delivered in time for the plaintiff to have reached his home and attended the funeral of his father, there was negligence. This instruction is sustained by the case of Hendricks v. Telegraph Co., 126 N. C. 304, 35 S. E. 543, 78 Am. St. Rep. 658. See, also, Lynne v. Telegraph Co., 123 N. C. 129, 31 S. E. 350. The charge of the court was very general, it is true, but it is sufficient in the absence of any special prayer for a more specific instruction.

The motion to nonsuit was properly refused, as there was some evidence of negligence for the consideration of the jury under the instruction of the court. Neither a motion to nonsuit nor a prayer for instructions, based upon the assumption that there was no evidence of negligence, could properly have been granted, as there was not only some evidence that defendant controlled the Beaufort and Newport line, but there was also some evidence of negligence in handling the message at Richmond.

It is not necessary to discuss the other assignments of error. We have carefully examined them, and do not find any error in the rulings to which the defendant excepted. No error.

CONNOR, J. (dissenting). Plaintiff shows, without contradiction, that the telegram was written by his brother, addressed to him at "923 East Marshall Street, Richmond, Va.," and delivered to the operator at Beaufort. He then introduced Miss Lucy Edwards, who testified that "she was working for defendant company and the Beaufort & Newport Telegraph Company at Newport; that she transmitted a message similar to the one offered in evidence; that she received the message on the Beaufort and Newport line, and when it was received it was addressed to 23 East Marshall street. Mr. Duncan is the owner of the Beaufort and Newport line, and I call it the Duncan line, and I received compensation from him for my services. The Western Union tariff book shows that the Beaufort and Newport line is an entirely different line. At the time the original telegram was received from Beaufort by her, it was addressed to plaintiff at 23 East Marshall street, Richmond, Va. * * * Defendant has no office at Beaufort, as she understood it. There was no Western Union operator at Beaufort." The plaintiff introduced the telegram addressed to and received by him in Richmond, "23 East Marshall street." The message was sent from Newport immediately, and it is conceded that the delay in delivering the message in Richmond was caused by the mistake in the address. There was no other evidence on the part of plaintiff in regard to the place at which the mistake occurred. The evidence of Miss Edwards was corroborated by defendant's witnesses. There is, upon this testimony, no possible room for doubt that the Beaufort and Newport line was entirely independent of defendant company, and that the mistake occurred on that line. There is not a scintilla of evidence to the contrary. Why, then, was defendant not entitled to the instruction asked? Plaintiff had made out a perfect case against the Beaufort and Newport line, exonerating defendant from any liability for the mistake. When the complaint was filed, plaintiff alleged that defendant was conducting the business of receiving and transmitting messages between Beaufort and Richmond, and that on the 27th day of July plaintiff's brother filed with defendant at Beaufort the telegram, etc.; that it negligently failed to deliver the message in time for plaintiff to attend his father's funeral, etc. Defendant, at the return term, answered, denying the allegations in regard to negligence, etc., and omitted to make answer to the other allegations. At the next term, defendants obtained from the court leave, upon terms, paying cost, etc., to file an amended answer. Pursuant to said permission, defendant filed an answer denying that it had any office at Beaufort, or that it received any message at that place for transmission. The amended answer, in this respect, was in exact accord with plaintiff's proof. The original answer was introduced as evidence to show that, in truth, notwithstanding plaintiff's evidence, defendant did receive the message at Beaufort, and the jury were permitted to find the fact. The plaintiff recovers a verdict and damages in direct contradiction of his own proof, because the counsel for defendant omitted, in the original answer, to deny the allegation. It was permitted to file the amended answer, and did so, alleging just what plaintiff proved. I do not deny that admissions in an answer, although afterwards cured by amendment, may be introduced in evidence when the truth of the matter alleged in the answer is in controversy. Here the truth of the matter alleged in the answer was not only not in controversy, but was established, beyond controversy, by plaintiff's witness. His honor instructed the jury that if they found that the mistake in the address occurred at the Beaufort office they should answer the issue for defendant. The plaintiff showed by his own witness that it did occur at that office. As frequently occurs, counsel inadvertently failed to answer an allegation, and, as matter of course, is permitted to put in a denial. This is very far from being a "solemn admission," as if defendant had admitted the allegation. The purpose of a judicial trial is to ascertain the truth and administer the law as applicable to the facts. Rules of pleading and practice are made to promote this end. The plaintiff may show the fact to be different from the testimony of his witness, but he cannot impeach his witness and ask the jury to discredit her. In this case he did neither, but he fixed liability upon one company and recovers damages from another. It is not suggested that there was any connection between the two lines fixing liability upon defendant company for the mistake of the Beaufort and Newport line. Plaintiff shows that the telegram was delivered to the Beaufort and Newport operator, addressed to "923 East Marshall Street," that it was received by defendant's operator, addressed to "23 East Marshall Street," transmitted and delivered to the plaintiff in Richmond addressed to "23 East Marshall Street," and yet for injury, conceded to result from the mistake made at Beaufort, the defendant is made to pay damages, and this because counsel inadvertently failed to answer an allegation of the complaint, which by permission it did answer and deny. I think that his honor should have told the jury that, upon the uncontradicted evidence, the mistake occurred on the Beaufort and Newport line, for which defendant was not responsible. There is no denial that defendant delivered the message promptly when the correct address was given it. The only suggestion of negligence is that there was delay in sending the office message calling for a better address. This was, in the light of plaintiff's evidence, the only question for the jury.

GRIFFIN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 24, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 58*)—UNION STATIONS—CORPORATION COMMISSION—POWER.

A statute authorizing the corporation commission to order the establishment of a union passenger station impliedly empowers the commission to do whatever is reasonably necessary to execute such order.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 680*) — STREETS—MUNICIPAL AUTHORITY.

Under Revisal 1905, § 2567 (5), authorizing railroad companies to use streets with the assent of the city, a city could assent to the use of a street by a railway company in connection with a union passenger station established under an order of the corporation commission; the designation of the street to be used being a matter to be determined by the city council with a view to the general welfare.

3. EMINENT DOMAIN (§§ 271, 273*)—USE OF STREETS BY RAILROAD—RIGHTS OF ABUTTERS.

When the use of a street by a railroad company constitutes an additional servitude, an abutter's remedy is by action for damages, and not for an injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 729-736, 741, 744-749; Dec. Dig. §§ 271, 273.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 24*)—PROPRIETY OF REMEDY.

Industries tending to develop the country and its resources should only be restrained in extreme cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 58*)—LOCATION OF STATION—INJUNCTION.

One owning land abutting on a remote street for 420 feet cannot enjoin use of the street by a railroad company in connection with a union passenger station established by order of the corporation commission where the city has assented to such use, as expressly authorized by Revisal 1905, § 2567 (5).

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1175*)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—RENDITION OF JUDGMENT.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1542, authorizing the Supreme Court to render such judgment as the record warrants, the Supreme Court will dissolve an order restraining the use of the street by a railroad company in connection with a union passenger station, where the order establishing the station was made by the corporation commission at the request of the town authorities, and for public convenience and comfort, and the railroads were about to begin the use of the station and tracks when the injunction was granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1175.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by W. H. Griffin against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. B. Rodman, J. H. Pou, and I. F. Dorch, for appellant. F. A. Daniels, Aycock & Winston, and W. T. Dorch, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. On the 5th July, 1905, the board of aldermen of Goldsboro, N. C., petitioned the corporation commission to order the three railroads entering that city to establish a union passenger station. After sundry proceedings, which are set out in Dewey v. R. R., 142 N. C. 394-396, 55 S. E. 292, the three railroads concerned agreed upon a location for said union passenger station on the western edge of the town. The corporation commission, after full investigation, approved the location so chosen, and directed the erection of the building at that spot, as they were empowered to do. Revisal 1905, § 1097 (3). Certain persons being dissatisfied sued out a restraining order which the judge below dissolved, and this court affirmed his action (Dewey v. R. R., 142 N. C. 392, 55 S. E. 292). The railroads have jointly erected said building and all three have laid their tracks to the new union station. The plaintiff, who owns land abutting on Beech street, between James and George streets, a distance of 420 feet, has sued out this restraining order against the Southern Railroad Company to prohibit it from using that part of Beech street (between James and George) and has thus brought the whole matter to a standstill, though the station is completed and the tracks of all three railroads have been graded and laid for the purpose of using said joint passenger station, in compliance with the order of the corporation commission.

Revisal 1905, § 2567 (5), expressly grants to railroad companies the right to use the streets of a town or city with "the assent of the corporation of such city." The assent of the city to the use of Beech street by the defendant railroad company for this purpose has been duly given by resolution of its board of aldermen. Besides, as Hoke, J., well says in Dewey v. R. R., 142 N. C. 401, 55 S. E. 295, when the statute authorized the corporation commission to order the union station, that carried with it the right to do whatever is reasonably necessary to execute such order which the defendant was executing. Industrial Siding Case, 140 N. C. 239, 52 S. E. 941; Corporation Commission v. R. R., 139 N. C. 126, 51 S. E. 793. This is also held in Osborne v. R. R., 147 U. S. 248, 13 Sup. Ct. 299, 37 L. Ed. 155; Staton v. R. R., 147 N. C. 423, 61 S. E. 455. The city clearly possessed the statutory right to assent to the use of the street by the railroad company. This is often a most essential power necessary to be used for the benefit of the people of the city. The plaintiff, however, seeks to show that the defendant might have gone along some other street. If so, some lot owner there could retort that the railroad ought to go along Beech street.

The designation of the street to be used is a matter to be determined by the governing body of the city, with an eye to the general welfare. Besides, there has been a railroad track on Beech street, from James to George (this very locus in quo), since 1873, and the trains of defendant and of the Atlantic & North Carolina Railroad have been using this track daily, for all that time—36 years. It is true it was in use as a "Y," and also more lately for access to an industrial plant, but the plaintiff acquired the property knowing that the railroad tracks were there, and in daily use to any extent the railroad companies saw fit. The plaintiff does not own any interest in the soil of the street. If there is any additional servitude, the plaintiff's remedy is by an action for damages, not for an injunction.

In Staton v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 428, 61 S. E. 455, Connor, J., says: "It is clear that the Williamston & Tarboro Railroad Company, or its successors, could, under the grant of the right of eminent domain, have condemned a right of way over Albemarle avenue, and by paying compensation of permanent damages to the abutting owners have acquired the right to construct and operate its road pursuant to the rights and privileges and franchises conferred in the charter. The owners of the property would not have been entitled to an injunction to restrain such condemnation or use. Whatever may have been the rights of the owner of the property in 1870, when the road was constructed along Albemarle avenue, it is clear that the plaintiff, having purchased the property after the road was constructed, and while it was being operated, will not be allowed to enjoin its use in a proper manner. * * * That the public would in many ways be seriously injured is manifest. Courts never enjoin the construction or use of public utilities and improvements at the suit of private individuals, unless the damage is both serious in amount and irreparable in character." Navigation Co. v. Emry, 108 N. C. 133, 12 S. E. 900. It is against the policy of the law to restrain industries and such enterprises as tend to develop the country and its resources. It ought not to be done except in extreme cases, and this is not such a one. It is contrary to the policy of the law to use the extraordinary powers of the court to arrest the development of industrial enterprises, or the progress of works prosecuted apparently for the public good, as well as for private gain. The court will not put the public to needless inconvenience. The court should have dissolved the restraining order. Walton v. Mills, 86 N. C. 280; Dunkart v. Rinehardt, 87 N. C. 224; Lumber Co. v. Wallace, 93 N. C. 22; Lewis v. Lumber Co., 99 N. C. 11, 5 S. E. 19; Roanoke Lumber Co. v. Emry, 108 N. C. 130, 12 S. E. 900; Com'rs v. Lumber Co., 114 N. C. 505, 19

S. E. 686; Railroad v. Lumber Co., 116 N. C. 924, 20 S. E. 964; Land Co. v. Webb, 117 N. C. 478, 23 S. E. 458; Merrick v. Ry. Co., 118 N. C. 1082, 24 S. E. 667; Wynn v. Beardsley, 126 N. C. 116, 35 S. E. 237. The chief street in Goldsboro running through its center, and for the whole length of the town, has been used for over 70 years by one railroad, for 60 years by two, and for half a century by all three, of these same railroads. It is singular that it should now be contended that 420 feet of this remote street, almost on the very edge of the town, cannot thus be used, with the assent of the town, whose charter confers on it the right to change, and even abolish, any street.

As the order to establish this union station was made by the corporation commission, at the request of the town authorities, and for the convenience and comfort of the traveling public, nearly two years ago, and the railroads were on the point of beginning the use of the station and tracks, upon which they have expended considerable sums, in obeying the order of the corporation commission, judgment dissolving the restraining order will be entered in this court, as was done in R. R. Connection Case, 187 N. C. 21, 49 S. E. 191, and cases there cited. Revisal 1905, § 1542.

Reversed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Tucker County.

Certiorari by A. C. Helmick to review the action of the County Court of Tucker County in removing him from the office of Surveyor of Roads. Judgment for Helmick, annulling the order of the County Court, and it brings error. Affirmed.

Cunningham & Stallings, for plaintiff in error. A. Jay Valentine, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. On the 2d day of April, 1907, the county court of Tucker county appointed A. C. Helmick road surveyor of precinct No. 1, in Fairfax district; and on the 10th day of April, 1908, it summarily removed him from office and appointed another in his place. Helmick brought the matter to the circuit court of Tucker county by writ of certiorari, upon petition. The county court demurred to the petition, and moved to quash and to dismiss the writ, assigning a number of reasons in support of its motion, all of which relate to one question; that is, whether or not the county court has power to remove summarily a road surveyor appointed by it before his term expires. The cause was heard on the 13th day of May, 1908, and the court overruled the demurrer, refused to quash the writ, and annulled the order of the county court removing said Helmick. The county court excepted, and obtained from this court a writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court.

The principal question presented relates to the power of a county court to remove from office summarily, before the expiration of his term, a road surveyor appointed by it. We do not think the law confers upon it such prerogative. The Constitution of West Virginia (article 9, § 2 [Code 1906, p. lxxvii]) says: "Coroners, overseers of the poor and surveyors of roads, shall be appointed by the county court." This would seem to constitute a road surveyor an officer, and not simply an employé of the county court. The Constitution fixes the manner of his appointment. Neither can he be elected or appointed in any other way, because this provision of the Constitution is mandatory. Ice v. Marion County Court, 40 W. Va. 118, 20 S. E. 809. But the Constitution does not fix the tenure of his office. The Legislature, however, has done this, and has made his term to extend two years. See section 1392, Code 1906. This section, and the constitutional provision above quoted, constitute a road surveyor a public officer who holds for a fixed term of two years, and provide the only mode of his selection to office, which is by appointment by the county court. The county court, having once exercised its discretion in the appointment of said Helmick as road surveyor, cannot revoke the appointment pending his term. It has no discretion to remove him from office. He can be removed only for cause by the circuit court, and after judicial inquiry, as provided by section 183, Code 1906. Arkle v. Board of Commissioners, 41 W. Va. 471, 23 S. E. 804.

If the Legislature had not fixed the duration of a road surveyor's term of office, the county court might have had the authority under the Constitution to appoint him to serve only during its will and pleasure, and in such case might have had the implied power to remove summarily. However, we do not decide this question. But it is clear that by fixing his tenure of office the Legislature has left the county court without any such implied power. Throop on Pub. Off. § 354, says: "And it is conceded in all the cases that, where a fixed term is assigned to the office, the appointing power has no absolute power of removal." To the same effect are the following authorities, viz.: Mechem on Pub. Off. § 445; Collins v. Tracy, 36 Tex. 546; Redfield v. Chatburn, 63 Iowa, 659, 19 N. W. 816, 50 Am. Rep. 760; People v. Hill, 7 Cal. 97; Carr v. State, 111 Ind. 101, 12 N. E. 107; State v. Barbour, 53 Conn. 76, 22 Atl. 686, 55 Am. Rep. 65.

The foregoing authorities are not in conflict with the following cases decided by this court, in all of which the decisions rest upon the fact that the appointee was holding only during the will and pleasure of the power that appointed him, and not for a term fixed by law: Hunter v. Trustees of Berkeley Springs, 47 W. Va. 343, 34 S. E. 729; Town of Davis v. Filler, 47 W. Va. 413, 35 S. E. 6; Hartigan v. Board of Regents, 49 W. Va. 14, 38 S. E. 698.

The action of the county court in removing defendant in error from office was reviewable by certiorari. Dunlevy v. County Court, 47 W. Va. 513, 35 S. E. 956; Dryden v. Swinburne, 20 W. Va. 89; Swinburn v. Smith, 15 W. Va. 483.

We find no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and affirm it, with costs and $30 damages to appellee.

2. CARRIERS (§ 283*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—RELATION OF PARTIES—SPECIAL POLICE OFFICER.

If such an officer is engaged in special service for the company, such as guarding its property or enforcing obedience to its rules and regulations, and does a wrongful act for which the injured party is entitled to damages, and such act was within the scope of such service or employment, the company is liable as in the case of its regular employes, such as conductors and station masters.

3. CARRIERS (§ 283*)—FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 15*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—RELATION OF PARTIES—SPECIAL POLICE OFFICER.

But the company is not liable for a false arrest, assault and battery, and malicious prosecution, not directed nor instigated by it, and founded upon an alleged breach of the peace at one of its stations, in no way affecting or involving, so far as the evidence discloses, any of its property, rights, or servants, nor growing out of any transaction between the plaintiff and the company, although the plaintiff was rightfully in the station having a ticket and awaiting the arrival of a train, and the alleged breach of the peace, arrest, and assault and battery occurred on the premises of the company.

4. RAILROAD COMPANY NOT LIABLE.

Evidence disclosing the facts and circumstances above stated, and nothing more, is insufficient to sustain a verdict against the railway company at whose instance the special officer was appointed, and by whom he was paid for his public services, and the trial court properly set it aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Marion County.

Action by Charles J. McKain against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, from an order setting the same aside and granting a new trial, he brings error. Affirmed.

Harry Shaw and C. H. Leeds, for plaintiff in error. U. N. Arnett, Jr., and John Bassel, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. Charles J. McKain complains of an order, made by the circuit court of Marion county, setting aside a verdict in his favor for $300, and awarding the defendant, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, a new trial in the case. The action is for damages for false arrest and imprisonment and assault and battery, alleged to have been committed by the defendant through its agents, and refusal to carry and transport the plaintiff, as it had contracted to do by selling him a ticket. The arrest was predicated on an alleged assault committed at the Fairmont station of the defendant upon Mrs. J. H. Downey, wife of the special officer who made the arrest. The evidence bearing on the question of probable cause therefor is highly conflicting, and renders it one clearly proper for jury determination. The plaintiff denies having molested the lady in any way, and she, her husband, and another man stoutly assert the contrary, saying he rudely pushed or shoved her as he passed them, while they were standing and engaged in conversation. It is hardly necessary to say this made a case proper for jury determination, if the railway company is responsible for the acts done by Downey; the arrest, assault and battery, and imprisonment being regarded, agreeably to the finding of the jury, as having been inflicted without probable cause or justification. Downey was a special policeman, commissioned by the Governor of the state, by virtue of the authority vested in him by section 31 of chapter 145 of the Code of 1899 (Code 1906, § 4281), upon the application of the defendant, and employed and paid by it. He had qualified as such officer and filed a copy of his oath of office in the clerk's office of the county court of the county in which he made the arrest. His powers are thus defined in the section of the statute above named: "Every police officer appointed under the provisions of this act shall be a conservator of the peace within each county in which any part of said railroad may be situated, and in which such oath or a certified copy thereof shall have been filed with the clerk of the county court or other tribunal established in lieu thereof; and, in addition thereto, he shall possess and may exercise all the powers and authority, and shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges and immunities, within such counties, as are now, or may hereafter be, vested in or conferred upon the regularly elected or appointed constables of said county." The statute also authorizes any railroad company at whose instance such an appointment has been made to dispense with the services of the officer by filing a notice to that effect, and thereupon his powers "cease and determine."

The reported decisions indicate that statutes similar to ours, providing for the appointment of special police officers at the instance of corporations and payment by them for their services, have been passed in many of the states and construed by several of the courts. While no decision of this court deals with the identical questions presented, namely, the status of such an officer and the extent to which his employer is liable for his acts, the numerous decisions of other courts having persuasive authority with us render it comparatively easy to solve these questions. Such officers act in the opinion of the courts sometimes as servants of the company employing them, and sometimes as officers of the state. Deck v. Balt. & O. R. R. Co., 100 Md. 168, 59 Atl. 650, 108 Am. St. Rep. 399; Foster v. Grand Rapids Ry. Co., 140 Mich. 689, 104 N. W. 380; Brill v. Eddy, 115 Mo. 596, 22 S. W. 488; Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1, 24 L. R. A. 483, 488, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440; Sharp v. Erie Ry. Co., 184 N. Y. 100, 76 N. E. 923, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 250; *Tyson v. A. 455, 1 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 718. The import of these decisions is that such appointees, although paid for all their services by the persons at whose instances they are appointed, are not servants of such persons in respect to all the acts they perform by virtue of their offices; but only in respect to services rendered the company, such as defending or preserving its property. The line of distinction, sometimes hard to rec-ogulze under the circumstances of the particular case, marks the point at which the act ceases to be one of service to the employer, and becomes one of vindication of public right or justice, the apprehension or punishment of a wrongdoer, not for the injury done to the employer, but to the public at large. Perhaps the clearest and best statement of it is that given by the eminent English Jurist Blackburn in Allen v. London, etc., Ry. Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 85, as frequently quoted by the American courts: "There is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or of recovering it back and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done. There is no implied authority in a person having the custody of property to take such steps as he thinks fit to punish a person who he supposes has done something with reference to the property which he has not done. The act of punishing the offender is not anything done with reference to the property. It is done merely for the purpose of vindicating justice. And in this respect there is no difference between a railway company—which is a corporation—and a private individual. If the law were that the defendants are responsible for the act of their booking clerk in giving the plaintiff into custody on an unfounded charge, every shopkeeper in London would be answerable for any act done by a shopman left in his shop who chose to accuse a person of having attempted to plunder the shop, every merchant would be responsible for a similar act of his clerk, and every gentleman for the act of his butler or coachman." In order to make the employer liable, he must have directed the injurious and wrongful act to be done. Thus in Tolchester, etc., Co. v. Steinmeier, 72 Md. 813, 20 Atl. 188, 8 L. R. A. 846, one of the earliest cases on the subject in this country, the court held as follows: "(1) That the defendant was not bound for the policeman's acts simply because he was appointed by the Governor at its nomination or request, and because it paid his salary. (2) That the act of the policeman was that of a state officer in the exercise of his common-law powers as such officer, and not executing the orders of the defendant. (3) That the act of arrest, to be effectually ratified by the defendant, must have been the act of its agent authorized to commit it." In Tucker v. Erie Ry. Co., 69 N. J. Law, 19, 54 Atl. 557, the court held as follows: "In order to render a company responsible for an unwarranted arrest made by one of such policemen, and a subsequent malicious criminal prosecution by him, it is necessary to show that his action was instigated by the company or some of its officers or employees." In Foster v. Grand Rapids Ry. Co., 140 Mich. 689, 104 N. W. 380, the following proposition is asserted: "Where a special deputy sheriff paid by a street railway company acts solely in his capacity as an officer in assaulting a passenger, and not by the direction of the conductor in charge of the car, the street railway company is not responsible for the act."

But the direction or instigation need not be in express terms. It suffices that the officer in the employment of a private person or corporation had implied authority or direction from the employer to do the act. In other words, if the act done was within the scope of the duty imposed upon him in favor of the employer by his contract of service, the principle of respondeat superior applies. "In an action against a corporation for a malicious prosecution instituted by one of its servants, where it is not shown that the servant had any express authority to institute the prosecution, the burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the servant from the nature of his duties had implied authority to prosecute the plaintiff." Thomas v. Can. Pac. Ry. Co., cited supra. This principle is recognized in nearly, if not quite, all of the cases above cited. Others, further illustrating it, may be found in the valuable notes to Sharp v. Railway Co., 184 N. Y. 100, 76 N. E. 923, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 250, and Thomas v. Railway Co., 14 Ont. L. Rep. 55, 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 324. No such implication arises from the fact that the officer is paid by the person at whose instance he was appointed. Although so paid, he is prima facie a public officer, and not a private servant. Healey v. Lothrop, 171 Mass. 263, 50 N. E. 540; Tucker v. Erie Ry. Co., 69 N. J. Law, 19, 54 Atl. 557; Cordner v. Railway Co., 72 N. H. 413, 57 Atl. 234; Foster v. Railway Co., 140 Mich. 689, 104 N. W. 380; Tyson v. Bauland Co., 186 N. Y. 397, 79 N. E. 3, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267. But such officers frequently perform acts or services directly, immediately, and primarily beneficial to their employes, and at their instance and under their direction. Such special employment may include an express direction to arrest or prosecute all persons whom the officer may suspect of offenses against the property or rights of his employer. If there is no such express direction, it may be inferred from the nature of the duties imposed or the services to be rendered, and, if so, the authorization or instigation is established by way of implication. In such cases the relation of master and servant is made out, and then the question is whether the act done was within the scope or course of the servant's or agent's employment, and the principles enunciated in Gillingham v. Railroad Co., 35 W. Va. 588, 14 S. E. 243, 14 L. R. A. 798, 29 Am. St. Rep. 827, and Davis v. Railroad Co., 61 W. Va. 246, 56 S. E. 400, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 993, in which the acts were done by railway conductors, apply. In Sharp v. Erie Ry. Co., 184 N. Y. 100, 76 N. E. 923, the plaintiff's decedent, caught in the act of stealing a ride on a train, had been pursued by a detective employed by the railway company out of the railway yards on to adjacent lands, and there shot by the latter. There was evidence tending to show that the railway company had employed the detective to protect its track and property, and look after crimes committed against it and its right of way, and the court held that it was for the jury to say, under all the facts and circumstances shown in evidence, whether the detective acted within the scope of his employment, or whether, being a public officer, he acted in that capacity alone. Deck v. Railway Co., 100 Md. 168, 59 Atl. 650, 108 Am. St. Rep. 399, developed facts very similar to those shown in Sharp v. Railway Co., supra, and the court held the case one proper for jury determination. The plaintiff had been stealing a ride on a freight train, and a special policeman, employed by the company, ordered him off, and then shot him when he was a few feet distant from the track. In Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1, 24 L. R. A. 483, 488, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, the plaintiff had been assaulted and beaten in a theater by a special officer at the time on duty there. The assault and battery grew out of a controversy between the plaintiff and the ticket seller. It was a part of the special officer's duty to maintain order in the establishment, and the ticket seller had demanded the arrest of the plaintiff. The court held the proprietor of the establishment liable for the act of the officer. Speaking of the character of the act, the judge, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "Even if he were a regular patrol man, called in off the street by appellants or their agents to aid in enforcing the regulations of the theater, he would for such purpose be only the agent of appellants, and for his conduct as such agent, within the scope of his employment, appellants would be responsible." This view, or process of reasoning, resulted in the following conclusion in Foster v. Railway Co., cited: "Where a special deputy sheriff who was paid by a street railway company, and whose duty it was to preserve order at a resort owned by the company, and ride upon the cars and prevent disturbances, assaulted a passenger on a car in assisting a conductor to eject him for nonpayment of fare, the officer in so doing represented not the public, but his employer, and the street railway company was liable."

If, however, it does not appear that the act done was within the scope of the servant's employment, or that there was any employment or contract of service beyond that by which the person or corporation at whose instance the appointment to the office was made bound himself to pay the officer for his services as a policeman, or that the arrest was made or the person prosecuted at the instance or by the direction of the person who has the appointment made, there is no liability upon such person for the act. In Healey v. Lothrop, cited, Mr. Justice

Holmes, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "If the statute had meant to make the officer the servant of the person who applies for his appointment and gives bond for his conduct, presumably it would have said so. But, if it had said so, it would have insisted upon a fiction being treated as a fact. It is true that the defendant asked to have an officer appointed, perhaps asked to have Mead appointed, and that he paid him. But he did not appoint him, could not remove him, and could not control his official conduct, which was governed by the regulations of the police commissioners and his own sense of duty as a public officer. The statute does not call the relation that of master and servant, and goes no further than to make the defendant liable upon his bond 'to the same extent' as for a servant. The words quoted imply that the officer is not one. They mean to the same extent as in another case which does not exist." In Tyson v. Bauland Co., cited supra, the arrest was made in the store of a company that had requested the appointment of the officer and paid him for his services on a charge of theft in the store by a customer, and, it not appearing that the company had directed the arrest to be made, or the plaintiff to be prosecuted, although a floor walker had brought the loss to the attention of the officer, the court held that the trial court should have directed a verdict for the defendant. The subject of the alleged theft was not goods or property of the store, but money of another customer who happened to be in the store at the time. In Smith v. Southeastern Ry. Co., L. R. 5 C. P. 640, there had been a controversy between railway servants and the plaintiff. Incidentally a special officer employed and paid by the company assaulted the plaintiff and others. After the struggle was over, the special officer gave the plaintiff into custody. The court held the company not liable, because the act of giving him into custody was beyond the scope of the servant's employment. One of the rules of the company said any officer or servant sworn as a constable for the district or place where he was on duty might take into custody any one whom he saw commit an assault upon another at any of its stations for the purpose of putting an end to any fight or affray, but not if the affray had come to an end. It appeared from the evidence of the plaintiff that he was not given into custody until after the fight had ended, and the court said: "We are disposed to draw the inference in fact that Antonio in giving the plaintiff into custody was not acting within the scope of his employment by the company, or on behalf of, or for the benefit of, the company." Agreeably to this, the court said in Dickson v. Waldron, cited supra: "If, however, after entering the theater, he (the officer) should discover appellee in the act of violating a criminal law of the state or a penal ordinance of the city, and should proceed to arrest him for it, such act of arrest would be that of a police officer. And if such arrest were made on the officer's own motion, without direction, express or implied, on the part of the appellants, then the appellants would not be responsible."

In view of these precedents and principles, we are of the opinion that the railway company is not liable to the plaintiff for the injuries inflicted upon him. He was not arrested or prosecuted for any act respecting the railway company or its property. The offense with which he was charged was an act done respecting the wife of the prosecuting officer, and did not in any way involve any right of the company. That it was done upon the premises of the railway company is in our opinion immaterial. The motive of the arrest, assault, and prosecution clearly appears to have been either vindication of the law, or a desire on the part of the officer to avenge the insult to his wife or to comply with her wishes, and in none of these aspects of the case would the company be responsible for the acts, however unjustifiable they may have been. Nor is it material that the plaintiff had a return ticket, was lawfully at the station awaiting a train, and was not carried by the railway company. According to the evidence, his losses and injuries were all caused by Downey, not the railway company.

Perceiving no error in the judgment, we affirm it, with costs and damages.

Affirmed.

GOSHORN v. WHEELING MOLD & FOUNDRY CO.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 191*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—WHO ARE.

A servant, employed to operate in the nighttime a particular machine, is not a fellow servant with a machinist employed to keep the machinery in the plant in good order and condition, nor with other servants employed therein to operate the same machine in the daytime, who on request may have assisted such machinist in installing a new pulley connected with such machine, and which, as observed by them, is cracked, and rendered defective and unsafe in the installation thereof, so as to absolve the master from liability for injuries resulting to such first servant therefrom.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 234*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECT—IMPUTED KNOWLEDGE.

The knowledge of the servants employed on such day shift cannot be imputed to the servant employed on said night shift, or render him guilty of negligence in continuing in his employment, unless he had knowledge of such defective and unsafe machinery, or it was so plainly manifest that he ought to have known it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 234.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 185*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE APPLIANCES—DELEGATION OF DUTY—FELLOW SERVANT.

A case in which the principles announced in Madden v. Railway Co., 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695, Jackson v. Railway Co., 43 W. Va. 380, 27 S. E. 278, 81 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337, Vickers v. Kanawha & W. V. R. Co. (W. Va.) 63 S. E. 367, and Richards v. Iron Works, 56 W. Va. 510, 49 S. E. 437, relating to the nonassignable duties of a master, are properly applied as controlling the facts in the case, and the instructions to the jury, given and refused.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—RISKS ASSUMED BY SERVANT—KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECT.

A servant has the right to presume that the master has provided him a reasonably safe place to work, and it is only after discovering the place to be unsafe that he can be said to have assumed the extra risk of continuing in his employment; and, though after reasonable time allowed him he will be presumed to be aware of, and have knowledge of, apparent defects, yet, to charge him with notice thereof on this ground, such defects and dangers must be unquestionably plain and obvious, so that, if he did not see them, he must necessarily be in fault.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Generally, whether the continuance in the service and the use of defective machinery amounts to such negligence as to bar recovery ought to be submitted to the jury, under proper instructions from the court.

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 104*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—"CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE."

Newly discovered evidence of an admission of the same kind, and to the same point, as that given in evidence on the trial by a witness examined, though made to another and different person, and at a different time and place, and under different circumstances, is cumulative in character, and will not be good ground for setting aside a verdict and awarding a new trial.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—REVIEW—AMOUNT OF VERDICT.

In an action by a servant against a master for personal injuries sustained, there is no fixed rule of compensation, as in actions for death by wrongful act; and, unless the verdict of the jury is for an amount so out of proportion to the actual injury as to evince the fact that the jury has been misled, or been influenced by corruption, passion, or prejudice, it will not be set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Ohio County.

Action by Frank Goshorn against the Wheeling Mold & Foundry Company. Judgement for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Russell & Russell, for plaintiff in error. O'Brien & O'Brien and S. O. Boyce, for defendant in error.

MILLER, P. The plaintiff, a machinist of some 18 years' experience, employed by defendant in its foundry at Wheeling on a night shift, in some way had his right arm caught between a belt and pulley on the shafting attached to the machine he was operating, resulting in a severance of his lower fore arm, and so mangling and bruising his upper arm that it had to be amputated above the elbow. For his injuries thus sustained he recovered in the court below a verdict and judgment against defendant for $16,777.75. The circuit court denied the defendant's motion for a new trial, and the case is now before us upon writ of error.

The circumstances surrounding plaintiff at the time of his accident, as summarized by defendant's counsel, are as follows: The machine at which he was working was an end milling machine, used for grinding the ends of iron and steel castings. The grinding wheel, in front of which plaintiff worked, and toward which on tables he placed the castings to be ground, was turned rapidly by a shaft. When standing fronting this wheel, there were to his left, along the same shaft, three other wheels or pulleys. The first pulley was the one in connection with which the accident occurred. It was made of metal, about eight inches in diameter, the shaft running through its center, and from the center spokes ran out to the rim, about six inches in width, and an eighth or a quarter of an inch in thickness, except where the spokes joined it, and where it was thicker than at the sides. The belt running around this particular pulley was in a vertical position, running around another much larger pulley, immediately over, and several feet above, the one at which the accident occurred. On the same shaft, and to the left of the latter pulley, were two other pulleys, side by side, on which ran belts of considerable length, in a horizontal position, and running to other pulleys some distance away. All of these pulleys and belts ran at a very high speed. As much oil was used in connection with the machinery, and some of it would occasionally get upon the belts, causing them to slip when working against the pulleys, it was necessary, from time to time, to throw powdered chalk upon the inside portions of the belts to take up the oil. The two pulleys west of the pulley at which the accident occurred had in front of them a metal shield, fastened by a screw to a portion of the structure just above these pulleys.

The negligence charged, and on which plaintiff bases his right of recovery, is in the first count: That defendant did not use proper care and caution that he was provided with good, proper, safe, and suitable machines and appliances, in that it provided for and suffered to be used by him while engaged in operating said "end milling machines," a cracked, insecure, weak, unsafe, and unsuitable pulley, located at the lower left corner of said machines, because of which said pulley broke and parted, and a portion thereof struck plaintiff on the head with great force and violence, whereby he became dazed and thrown down, and his right arm was caught in said pulley and belting, and was torn and cut off, necessitating amputation as aforesaid; and, in the second count, in addition to what is charged in the first, it is alleged to have been a part of the duty of plaintiff, in operating said machine, to chalk the belts and pulleys, and, in addition to the other duties of the defendant charged in the first count, that it was especially its duty to provide plaintiff good, safe, proper, and suitable belting and pulleys to be used by him aforesaid; but, disregarding its duty in this behalf, defendant had provided, and suffered to be used by the plaintiff, a certain unsafe and unsuitable belting, and that, while he was engaged in performing his duty of chalking said belting and pulleys and operating said machine, said pulley broke and parted, and a portion thereof struck the plaintiff on the head with great force and violence, whereby he became dazed, and was thrown down and injured as described in the first count.

On the trial plaintiff relied entirely upon proof of the cracked, weak, and insecure condition of the pulley at which the accident occurred, and of which he testified he had no previous knowledge or information; and on the further evidence of himself and his witnesses, showing, and tending to show, that while engaged in chalking the belts as charged, the pulley broke and parted, a portion thereof striking him, and causing him to fall, and his arm to be caught and injured as alleged. Although defendant controverted the fact that the pulley was in a cracked and insecure condition, its evidence on this question was negative and circumstantial only, and it relied mainly on the theories that plaintiff had negligently contributed to his injuries: First, by selecting the wrong place to chalk the horizontal belts; second, that in attempting to apply the chalk, he had thrust his hand over the pulley and between the sides of the belt in which his arm was caught and severed; and, third, that it was because of the place at which, and the negligent manner in which, he had undertaken to chalk the belts that his sleeve had been caught between the revolving pulley and belts and severed in the manner described, and that the breaking and parting of the pulley was not the cause of plaintiff's injuries, but the result of his arm being caught as described. It is claimed for defendant that the safe and proper way to chalk the belts was to take off the metal shield referred to, and throw the chalk on the lower inside portion of each belt by throwing it through the space between them; that the plaintiff, instead of doing the chalking in the safe way, had preferred the dangerous method of throwing the chalk over the pulley at which the accident occurred, between the two portions of the belt running around that pulley, and had thus by his negligence contributed to his injuries. The evidence, however, of a number of witnesses who worked at this machine is that the chalking of the horizontal belts was always done from the position occupied by the plaintiff; and there was much evidence tending to show that this was as safe a place as the other, and took less time, and in some respects was less dangerous, than to do the chalking from the other position.

On these controverted and material facts the defendant submitted to the jury three special interrogatories, which were answered and returned by them with their verdict, as follows: No. 1. "Was the pulley which, according to the plaintiff's claim, broke and caused the injury to the plaintiff cracked or in improper condition at the time when it was put into place some weeks or more before the accident?" Answer. "Yes." No. 2. "Was the plaintiff guilty of negligence directly contributing to his injury in the manner in which he acted in chalking the belts just before and at the time when the accident occurred?" Answer. "No." No. 3. "Did the pulley break before the plaintiff's arm was caught?" Answer. "Yes." We must therefore treat these findings of facts by the jury, as well as all other findings of facts controverted, and necessarily involved, in their general verdict as conclusive thereof.

But questions of law are presented: First, it is said that the negligence complained of, if any, was that of Bitner, the machinist, and of Pearl and Hill, his assistants, fellow servants of plaintiff, that Pearl and Hill, who operated on the day shift the same machine, especially were such fellow servants, and that, as they assisted Bitner in putting on the pulley, and knew of the cracked and dangerous condition in which it was left, and had called Bitner's attention to it, their negligence cannot be imputed to the master. While the evidence is that Pearl and Hill assisted Bitner in putting on the pulley, it was no part of their duty to repair or keep the machinery in proper condition. They say they called Bitner's attention to the cracked condition of the pulley, and that he replied that the defect was not material or important. It was his duty to look after the machinery and keep it in repair. As many times announced by this court, there are certain nonassignable duties which a master owes to his servant. The first of these, as announced in Madden v. Railway Co., 28 W. Va. 610, 57 Am. Rep. 695, and repeated in Jackson v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 48 W. Va. 380, 382, 27 S. E. 279 (31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337), is "to provide safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business. This includes the exercise of reasonable care in furnishing such appliances, and the exercise of like care in keeping the same in repair and making proper inspections and tests." And it is there said that all of these duties are included in the one general duty of the master to provide a safe plant. And at page 383 of 43 W. Va., at page 280 of 27 S. E. (31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337), it is said: "These duties are sometimes spoken of as duties in construction, preparation, and preservation, as contrasted with mere work of operation." And the first point of the syllabus is: "The test whether a master is liable to one servant for the negligence of another servant is the character of a negligent act. If it be in the doing of an act incumbent on the master as a duty of the master to the servant, the master is liable; otherwise not." See, also, Vickers v. Kanawha & W. V. R. Co. (W. Va.) 63 S. E. 367. These decisions, and many other decisions of this court that might be cited, clearly show that it was one of the nonassignable duties of the defendant to keep the pulley in question in a reasonably safe and proper condition, and that, no matter to whom delegated, or by whom performed, the defendant is nevertheless liable for the negligent performance thereof. Vickers v. Kanawha & W. V. R. Co., supra. A fellow servant can be intrusted with the performance of such nonassignable duty, but not so as to excuse the defendant from liability. This case is not within the rule of Williams v. Thacker Coal & Coke Co., 44 W. Va. 599, 30 S. E. 107, 40 L. R. A. 812, as counsel for defendant argue. The holding in that case that a mine boss, employed in a coal mine, is a fellow servant with the miner employed therein is predicated mainly upon the fact that the statute referred to, properly construed, makes him so. A safe plant or a reasonably safe place to work required the operator of a coal mine, respecting overhanging slate, as in Williams v. Coal Co., and with respect to ventilation of the mine and other duties devolved upon a mine boss or a fire boss, as in Squillache v. Tidewater Coal & Coke Co. (W. Va.) 62 S. E. 446, means, in the eye of the statute, that the mine shall be reasonably safe in the first instance. The cases just referred to, involving mining operations, and governed by statute, fall rather within the rule announced in Jackson v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., supra, at page 384 of 43 W. Va., at page 280 of 27 S. E. (31 S. E. 258, 46 L. R. A. 337), that "you cannot make the master liable for an act of mere operation, no matter by what servant done. You cannot exempt him for an act not one of mere operation, but of his personal duty, though done by any servant."

Another proposition urged is that plaintiff assumed all the risks incident to his employment arising from the nature and character of the machinery and its surroundings, including the danger of putting his hands, or arm, or head, or any part of his body over the pulley, or between the portions of the vertical belt, according to the theory of the defendant. And the argument is that plaintiff must have had knowledge of the crack in the pulley, that it was cracked, and as the crack was visible, as shown in the evidence, that he ought to have been familiar with it, and knowledge thereof must be imputed to him, and that, having undertaken to chalk the belts in the manner assumed by defendants, and having remained in the defendant's employ with such knowledge, he must be regarded as having assumed all risks incident to his employment, and incident to the conditions surrounding him, absolving the defendant from all liability for his injuries sustained. The plaintiff, however, denied all knowledge of the defective condition of the pulley, and the evidence shows that it was not so plainly visible that he could be charged with actual knowledge thereof. Without such actual knowledge he had the right to assume that defendant had discharged its full duty to him in providing him a reasonably safe place to work. The jury by their verdict necessarily found that he had no such actual knowledge, and was not chargeable with actual knowledge of the defective condition of the pulley, and there is no evidence showing, or tending to show, that either Bitner or Pearl, or Hill, his assistant, communicated to plaintiff their knowledge of the condition of the pulley. Having positively denied knowledge thereof, this case cannot be brought within the rule of Purkey v. Southern Coal Co., 57 W. Va. 595, 50 S. E. 755, Lavery v. Hambrick, 61 W. Va. 687, 57 S. E. 240, and Williams v. Belmont Coal & Coke Co., 55 W. Va. 85, 46 S. E. 802, as argued by defendant's counsel, and we see no material distinction between the case at bar and the case of Richards v. Iron Works, 56 W. Va. 510, 49 S. E. 437. It is said, with respect to the latter case, that the negligence which resulted in the accident there involved was not the negligence of any person with whom the employé injured had been working in the same line of work, as it is claimed was the fact in the case at bar. But, as we have seen, the negligence of a fellow servant intrusted with the performance of a nonassignable duty will not excuse the master from liability for the negligent performance thereof. In the Richards Case the death of plaintiff's intestate was due to defective material used in the building of a scaffold. Decedent did not assist in handling the material for, or aid in building, the scaffold, but he was as much a fellow servant with those who did assist therein as the plaintiff here was a fellow servant with Bitner or Pearl, or Hill, and who assisted in installing the defective pulley. In the Richards Case the court said of the deceased: "He is not shown to have had any knowledge of its unsound or unsafe condition. The part which gave way and precipitated him to the ground was a lookout, answering to a joist, which was covered by, and supported one end of, the boards of that platform. While the defendant contends that intestate did not observe, but could have observed, any defects in the materials of the scaffold or in its workmanship by the exercise of ordinary care, this circumstance, connected with the fall of the scaffold, seems to negative that presumption. We do not think that plaintiff's intestate was bound, under the law, to make an examination of the scaffold before going upon it to work."

In the case at bar plaintiff was employed at night. Was he bound to make a critical examination of the pulley and other parts of his machine? We think not. In Lavery v. Hambrick, supra, point 2 of the syllabus makes it clear that, a servant entering upon and continuing in service in an unsafe place, he does not waive the performance by the master of the duties imposed upon him by law in respect to the safety of the place in which his services is performed, except where those dangers are known to, and fully appreciated by, him. According to Purkey v. Coal Co., supra, when the servant enters the master's employment, he may presume that the master has provided a safe place for him to work, and it is only after discovering the place to be unsafe that he can be said to have assumed the extra risk of continuing in the employment. In Norfolk, etc., R. Co. v. Cheatwood, 103 Va. 856, 49 S. E. 499, it is said a servant is not presumptively chargeable with notice of a peculiar and unusual state of things. A reasonable time must be allowed for him to learn of the change in the situation; and, although he is presumed to be aware of defects which are perfectly obvious to his sight, and the danger is apparent to any person of his mental capacity, nevertheless, to charge him of notice on this ground, the defect and danger must be unquestionably plain and clear, so that, if he did not see it, he must necessarily have been in fault. And in Wheel Co. v. Harris, 103 Va. 708, 49 S. E. 991, it is said: "Generally, whether the continuance in the service and the use of the defective machinery amounts to such negligence as to bar recovery ought to be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court."

In the court below exceptions were saved by defendant to the giving of the six instructions propounded to the jury by plaintiff; but here the exceptions to the second, fourth, and fifth instructions only are relied on. The second contains a statement of the general duty of the master to furnish a reasonably safe place to work, and the nonassignability of that duty; and, if assigned, that the person to whom it is assigned, no matter what his grade or rank in the service of the master may be, becomes a vice principal. The criticism of this instruction is that it omits any reference to the crack in the pulley; that it is misleading in omitting any reference to the rule in Laverty v. Hambrick, supra; that though the place of labor may be unsafe if the servant, knowing of the dangerous position, continues in the service, he assumes the risks incidental thereto; and also that it omits any reference to the fact that the negligence in installing the defective pulley was that of fellow servant of plaintiff. The fourth instruction propounded to the jury the proposition that, if defendant suffered and permitted the pulley at which the plaintiff was injured from any cause to become unsound, unsafe, insecure, cracked, and defective, and that this condition was known to it, and that by the reasonable and ordinary care and diligence such condition would have become known to it, and that the injuries to plaintiff resulted therefrom, without fault on his part, while he was in the performance of his duty, defendant was liable, and the jury should find for the plaintiff. It is objected to this instruction that it assumes the pulley referred to was cracked, dangerous, and likely to bring about the accident. We do not think it amenable to this criticism. It does not assume the fact, but submits the question to the jury. It is said of it that, if the pulley was in a cracked and dangerous condition, the plaintiff had the same opportunity, by the exercise of like reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, to have learned, as easily and readily as the defendant might have done, of its condition, and that the plaintiff thereby assumed all the risk and danger incident to its condition, absolving the defendant from liability therefor. And, moreover, that it limits to the company alone the duty to take notice of the defective condition of the pulley, and eliminates any such obligation on the part of the plaintiff, contrary, it is claimed, to the rule of Williams v. Belmont C. & C. Co., and Laverty v. Hambrick, supra. It is also urged against the fifth instruction that it is also misleading, in the same way and along the same lines as the fourth instruction. It propounded to the jury the proposition that it is the positive duty of the master in all cases to inform the servant of any defects and dangers in the tools, machinery, and appliances, with which he is required to work, and of which he has knowledge, or ought to have knowledge by the exercise of reasonable attention, care, and diligence, but of which the servant is ignorant, and would not discover by reasonable care on his part. We are of opinion that all three of these instructions propounded correct propositions of law, and are in accordance with principles enunciated in the decisions already referred to.

It is represented, also, that the court below erred in refusing defendant's instruction No. 2 in the form presented, and in modifying it, and thereby materially changing its force and effect, as originally presented, and also in rejecting defendant's instructions Nos. 8 and 9. As proposed, instruction No. 2 was as follows: "In accepting and entering upon a position under the employment of another person or corporation the employé assumes any risk of injury which may result to him from the ordinary conditions and circumstances existing in the place where he is required to do his work." As modified by the court, there was subjoined to it, "but he does not assume extraordinary risks, arising from the use of defective machinery, or by the use of reasonable care should have such knowledge, and then continues in the employment." We think the modification proper. As proposed it was too much restricted. And, as was said by the court below: "It might easily be construed as imposing upon the employé the assumption of the risk resulting from all ordinary conditions in the place where he works, including latent defects and dangers of which his employer is informed, or ought to be informed, and of which the employé is ignorant, provided only that such defects and dangers were part of the usual conditions in that particular place of employment"—which would be contrary to the rule of law as announced in cases already cited. The eighth instruction, rejected, was: "If the jury find from the evidence that the accident and injury to the plaintiff were brought about through the negligent act of the other employé of the defendant, who placed in its position the pulley which is claimed to have broken and thus caused the injury to the plaintiff, then the defendant is not responsible for any such negligence of such other employé, and the jury should not find a verdict for the plaintiff because of such crack in such pulley, and the breaking of such pulley by reason thereof." The ninth instruction, rejected, was a binding instruction, telling the jury that "under the evidence as presented it is their duty to find a verdict for the defendant." We agree with the court below that the eighth instruction was intended to and in effect would have told the jury that Bitner was a fellow servant of Goshorn. Clearly this would have been error under the evidence. The ninth and binding instruction was clearly not justified by the evidence. It would have taken from the jury the question of the negligence of the defendant, and whether or not the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, questions of fact which, under the evidence, were clearly within the province of the jury, and not for the court.

The action of the court below in refusing a new trial is also assigned as error. This motion was based mainly upon two grounds: First, newly discovered evidence; and, second, that the verdict was excessive in amount. The newly discovered evidence relied upon was that defendant had discovered, since the trial, that plaintiff had stated to Dr. Hildreth, at the City Hospital, between June 15, and 30, 1905, that "he did not blame the company, but that his flowing sleeve had been caught between the belt and the pulley, and that was the way the accident happened, and that was his own fault." The evidence shows that Dr. Hildreth was the physician and surgeon employed by defendant to attend plaintiff at the hospital; that he was afterwards active in trying to secure a settlement between plaintiff and defendant; that he was not summoned or examined as a witness on the trial, and it is not shown, by any affidavit or otherwise, that defendant had made any inquiry of Dr. Hildreth about the supposed conversations between himself and the plaintiff in relation to the cause of plaintiff's injuries, or the manner in which they had been sustained, a most natural thing to have done, owing to his professional employment by defendant. Besides plaintiff, in an affidavit filed upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, positively denied that he had ever had any such conversation with Dr. Hildreth. And, while disclaiming any intention to impute falsehood to Dr. Hildreth, plaintiff further says that in a conversation with Dr. Hildreth, in the month of April of that year, when he sustained an injury to a finger on his left hand, he did state to Dr. Hildreth that he did not blame the company for that injury; that it was due to his own fault. We think this evidence cumulative of the testimony of like character as that given by the witness Yertzell. Yertzell, when on the stand at the trial stated that the plaintiff, about 10 minutes after the accident occurred, had made a similar statement to him as to the manner in which he had sustained his injuries. The defendant failed to show, on his motion for a new trial, that it had brought itself within any of the rules entitling it to a new trial for after-discovered evidence, except only that this evidence had been discovered since the trial. It is argued that, although this evidence of Dr. Hildreth is of the same character as that given by the witness Yertzell, yet, as it relates to a declaration of plaintiff made at another and different time, and under different circumstances, it ought not to be regarded as cumulative. This is not the law. "Cumulative evidence," says Greenleaf, "is evidence of the same kind to the same point. Thus if a fact is admitted to be proved by the verbal admission of the party, evidence of another verbal admission of the same fact is cumulative." 2 Greenleaf on Ev. § 2. See, also, Grogan v. C. & O. R. R. Co., 39 W. Va. 415, 19 S. E. 563; Sisler v. Shaffer, 43 W. Va. 769, 28 S. E. 721; Stewart v. Doak, 58 W. Va. 172, 52 S. E. 95. The motion based on newly discovered evidence, therefore, we think was properly overruled.

But what shall we say as to the amount of the verdict? This is a most serious question. It is conceded on both sides that the verdict is a large one. On behalf of the defendant it is claimed that it is so excessive as to clearly evidence the fact that the jurors were prejudiced against the defendant. So far as we have knowledge it is the largest verdict ever rendered by a jury in this state for like or similar injuries sustained. In brief of counsel for defendant it is compared to the verdict for $7,500 involved in Thomas v. Electrical Co., 54 W. Va. 393, 46 S. E. 217, and in which this court is quoted as saying: "For these reasons, with some reluctance as to the amount of the judgment, we affirm it." That was a suit by an administrator for the death of his intestate, due to the negligence of the defendant; our statute, in such cases, limiting recovery to $10,000. At common law such actions did not survive; and it is only by virtue of the statute (section 3488, Code 1906) that an action for death by wrongful act can be maintained. The statute imposes no limitations on the amount of recovery by the person injured. As was said by the learned judge in his opinion in the court below, quoting from Trice v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 40 W. Va. 271, 21 S. E. 1022: "In actions for personal injuries, and in cases generally where there is no fixed rule of compensation, the theory of the law is that the decision of the jury is conclusive, unless they have been misled, or their verdict has been influenced by corruption, passion, or prejudice. Unless the verdict finds an amount so out of proportion to the actual injury as to evince such misleading, or the presence of some malign influence, it will be sustained, although it may materially differ from the judgment of the court. But if the amount of the verdict so far exceeds or falls short of what to the court appears to be just compensation as to induce the belief that the jury have not given the case a fair and dispassionate consideration, it will be set aside." And as was said by the circuit judge: Plaintiff was a machinist of some 18 years' experience, and at the time of his injuries was 35 years of age, in good physical health, capable of earning 30 cents per hour, working 12 hours a day. He had depending on him for support a wife and children, the evidence showing that since the loss of his arm, and after much effort, he had been unable to secure any employment. The jury were no doubt influenced, but properly so, by these and other facts and circumstances shown in the evidence. In 6 Thompson on Negligence, 365 et seq., this writer, in a valuable note, has collated many cases in which verdicts of this kind, some for larger and some for smaller amounts, and for like or similar injuries, have been sustained. It is unnecessary to do more than refer to the cases there cited for justification of the verdict in the case before us, certainly for our justification in not disturbing it because of the amount of it.

As the judge below who tried the case, and had better opportunity than we to understand the facts, to observe the witnesses, the character of the jurors, and all the facts and circumstances on which the verdict depended, could not find that the verdict had been influenced by corruption, passion, or prejudice, neither can we. We cannot invade or usurp the province of the jury, and substitute our own judgment for the judgment of the proper triers of the facts, and of the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled at their hands, by way of damages for his injuries. The law invests us with no such power. Our jurisdiction, particularly in cases of this kind, is limited to discovering bias, prejudice, fraud, or corruption in the verdict.

Finding no error therein we must affirm the judgment.

HALFPENNY & HAMILTON v. TATE & McDEVITT et al.

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 11*)—HINDERING AND DELAYING CREDITORS.

The terms "defraud," "hinder," and "delay," as employed in section 3099, Code 1906, are not equivalent terms. To hinder and delay one's creditor, within the intentment of said section, is as much provided against as to wholly defraud him.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 299*)—EVIDENCE.

A case of fraudulent sales and transfers of property governed and controlled by rules and principles announced in many previous decisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 876; Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 241*)—SUIT TO SET ASIDE.

The right of a creditor to subject to the payment of his debt the property of his debtor fraudulently conveyed does not depend on the question of the insolvency of the debtor. In this state the statute gives absolute right to a creditor to a suit in equity to annul a fraudulent conveyance, and he is not compelled to first exhaust other property of his debtor by execution or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 715; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 11*)—"HINDER"—"DELAY"—"DEFAUD."

The words "hinder," "delay," and "defraud" are not synonymous, and a purpose to delay and hinder a creditor may be fraudulent, although the debtor may honestly intend that all his debts shall be paid ultimately.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by Halfpenny & Hamilton against Tate & McDevitt and others. Decree for plaintiffs for less than the amount claimed as against Tate & McDevitt, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, modified, and remanded.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. Jared L. Wamsley and W. E. Baker, for appellees.

MILLER, P. The object of the bill is to set aside as fraudulent and void, as against plaintiffs, the sale by Tate & McDevitt to G. H. Gates & Co., and by Gates & Co. to K. H. Stover, of about 950,000 feet of manufactured lumber, and to subject the same to the lien of plaintiffs' attachment sued out in the cause, and levied thereon, and taken into custody by the sheriff. The lumber attached was the same which, by prior contract in writing, dated November 28, 1906, Tate & McDevitt had agreed to sell and deliver to plaintiffs, free on board cars at Kingsville, W. Va., a small station on the Coal & Coke Railroad, in Barbour county, but which, after delivering a small portion thereof, and pending the further execution of the contract, by contract in writing on October 11, 1907, they undertook to sell and deliver, for the purported consideration of $13,000, cash in hand, to G. H. Gates & Co., and which lumber said Gates & Co., acting through G. H. Gates, on or about October 17, 1907, by a parol contract, pretended to sell to said Stover at the price of $17,000, to be paid for as delivered by them on cars. At the time of the sale to Gates & Co., about 800,000 feet of this lumber had been already delivered at the railroad by Tate & McDevitt, to be loaded on cars for plaintiffs, and at the time of the sale by Gates & Co. to Stover, about 60,000 feet more had been delivered there, and the residue either remained at the mills, or on stump in the woods to be manufactured. The plaintiffs' claim is for $3,581.29, the balance, with interest, of $5,000, advanced by them to Tate & McDevitt on account of said lumber, less $1,561.12 in lumber delivered on account. In addition plaintiffs claim $5,000 damages for breach of contract, but the attachment does not cover the damages claimed, and no serious effort seems to have been made to prove actual damages. Tate & McDevitt in their answers also make a counterclaim for damages, on the theory of a breach of the contract on the part of plaintiffs to furnish cars and inspectors; but the contract does not stipulate that plaintiffs were to furnish either cars or inspectors. Besides, Tate in his testimony admits having received orders from plaintiffs, and excused himself to plaintiffs for failure to make shipments on the ground that he could not get cars. There seems to have been some trouble to get cars, but this was due to no fault of plaintiffs. No serious effort was made by Tate & Mc-Devitt to show damages. While the answer of Tate & McDevitt denies intention to defraud plaintiffs, they do not deny the material facts charged in the bill as constituting the fraud, and in their evidence they admit facts not only constituting fraudulent intent but actual fraud on their part, in the disposition of said lumber and other property. We will not undertake to detail the evidence on this point. It conclusively establishes the fraud charged on their part, and we do not hesitate for a moment to pronounce judgment of conviction against them; but the answers of G. H. Gates & Co. and of K. H. Stover put in issue the question of the bona fides of the purchases of the lumber by them. Both claim to be innocent purchasers for value, without notice of the fraud of Tate & McDevitt. On the hearing the circuit court dismissed plaintiffs' bill as to them, holding the lumber attached not liable to plaintiffs' attachment, but referred the cause to a commissioner to state the condition of the account between plaintiffs and Tate & McDevitt, and decreeing that the People's National Bank, garnishee, should pay to plaintiff the sum of $21.02, admitted to be due from them to Tate & McDevitt, and from this decree plaintiffs have appealed.

The specific allegations of the bill are not as broad as they might be to cover the case made by the evidence. It does charge that the object and purpose of Tate & McDevitt in making the subsequent sales thereof was to avoid delivery of the lumber to plaintiffs, and to avoid repaying plaintiffs the balance of the advances made by them on said lumber, and that Gates & Co. and Stover had notice thereof. This charge, taken in connection with other allegations, we think equivalent to a charge of intent to wholly defraud plaintiffs; but, as the answers deny this, it would have been better pleading to have charged also that the sales were made for the purpose of hindering and delaying plaintiffs in the collection of their debt, for the terms "defraud," "hinder," and "delay," are not equivalent terms, and to hinder or delay are as much condemned by the statute (section 3099, Code 1906) as to wholly defraud a creditor. Edgell v. Smith, 50 W. Va. 349, 355, 356, 40 S. E. 402. And as the court says in the case just cited, quoting, at page 356, of 50 W. Va., at page 404, of 40 S. E.: "But in order to render a deed fraudulent, it is not necessary that the debtor should intend to entirely defeat the creditor in the collection of his claim. Creditors are entitled not only to be paid, but to be paid as their claims accrue, and a debtor has no more right to postpone payment simply for his own advantage, than to defeat it altogether. A purpose to delay and hinder a creditor is therefore fraudulent, although the debtor may honestly intend that all his debts shall ultimately be paid. * * * The words 'hinder,' 'delay,' and 'defraud' are not synonymous." The allegations of the bill, taken as a whole, however, we regard equivalent to charging in the terms of the statute intent not only to wholly defraud, but also to hinder and delay plaintiffs.

On the subject of proof not only the evidence of plaintiffs, but that of defendants, also, abundantly establishes intent not only to wholly defraud plaintiffs, but also to hinder and delay them. Both Tate and McDevitt are and were nonresidents. Their nonresidence was the basis of plaintiffs' attachment. McDevitt had been temporarily in West Virginia, superintending their lumbering operations. Tate was rarely here, although he appears to have come to West Virginia to negotiate the sales to Gates & Co., if not to Stover. Tate was also the principal witness for defendants. In attempting to assign a reason for selling to Gates & Co., he professes to have been afraid Halfpenny would go back on him, because, as he claimed, he had gone back on him in the purchase of a tract of timber land for Tate & McDevitt, and on which he had advanced $4,185 of purchase money and taken title to himself as security. Plaintiffs were to have had the lumber manufactured from this land, but Tate & McDevitt having found a purchaser for the lumber at the price of $10,000 to $12,000, which would yield them a large profit, applied to Halfpenny for permission to sell, which Halfpenny agreed to, on condition that he should be paid a bonus for the use of his money, and as compensation for the loss of prospective profits on the lumber which his firm was to have had from the land. Some controversy arose between the two as to what this bonus should be, and on this account Tate professed the belief that Halfpenny, who had been disposed to go back on him in that transaction, might also attempt to "do him" in the other, and, in the language of modern slang, he concluded to try and "beat them to it." This he proceeded to do by the sale to Gates & Co. of all of the lumber on which plaintiffs had made the advances to his firm, and to Gates individually of every species of property owned by his firm, and, so far as the record shows, owned by the individual members thereof in the state of West Virginia, including horses, wagons, harness, and all equipments employed by them in their lumbering operation. The sale of the property to Gates individually was upon the pretended consideration that Gates should assume and pay all the outstanding debts of Tate & McDevitt, an indefinite amount, but estimated by him and Gates at about $2,000, but not including any indebtedness to plaintiffs. So that nothing remained of the individual or firm assets, not thus sold and disposed of, out of which plaintiffs could realize their money. Tate admits that before selling to Gates & Co. he had made efforts to sell the lumber, first to Capt. Cobb, and then to one C. T. Nelson; but both Cobb and Nelson, readily perceiving the flavor of his fraudulent intentions, declined to become parties to the fraudulent scheme. Tate says that he then sought legal counsel, and was advised that he could not make a sale that would stand against plaintiffs, unless he could dispose of the lumber to a bona fide purchaser, for adequate consideration and without notice of his fraudulent intent. Then it was, he says, that he approached Gates, on a Sunday, and proposed to sell to him, giving him no notice, and who, so far as he professes to know, had no notice of plaintiffs' rights or of his purposes in making the sale, and that on the following day he succeeded in selling the lumber to Gates & Co. at the cash price of $13,000, and a day or two later to Gates individually the other property of his firm. As to this want of notice or knowledge to Gates, Tate, of course, had corroboration in the testimony of Gates himself; but the inculcating facts, shown in the evidence on both sides, satisfy us beyond all doubt, that, whether or not Gates had actual knowledge or notice, the facts and circumstances surrounding him at the time of his purchases were of the character to charge him with full knowledge and notice of the fraudulent purposes of Tate & McDevitt. The fact that Tate sought out Gates on a Sunday night and proposed to sell at a lump sum, and that Gates, who had not seen the lumber, was not acquainted with the market, and agreed to buy almost immediately on the bare representations of Tate, as to the character and quality of the lumber and was so ready and willing to go into so large a transaction, is strongly indicative of fraud; and the further fact that almost immediately thereafter he also agreed to buy the other personal property of this firm, on the terms already stated, also goes to show the bad faith of the transaction.

The following language, which Gates professes to have addressed to Tate at the time of the purchase, is also significant: "I says to Mr. Tate, I says, 'Now put this down good and low so I can buy it and pay cash for it, and you know that beats cats and dogs.' That is the way I said it to him." Men do not usually engage in legitimate transactions in this way. Gates admits having been a creditor of Tate & McDevitt, presumably growing out of their lumbering operations. He was not engaged in buying or selling lumber. He dealt in horses and mules and in lands. He had not the money himself to buy the lumber, but he professes to have had associated with him a friend, M. L. Klock, a banker of Wellsboro, Pa., but whom he had not consulted about this particular transaction, and whom, he says, he never consulted about anything, but from whom he knew the money could be obtained. In payment he claims to have given Tate & McDevitt an order on Klock for $13,000, and in his testimony in chief says that he sent his son-in-law with Tate to Pennsylvania, with a copy of the contract in writing, to see Klock and explain to him the nature of the transaction, and to get the money, and at another place, in explanation of his reason for wanting the contract in writing, says, "In the first place, I suppose I had to, and, in the second place, I wanted to satisfy Mr. Klock that everything was right, because I knew he would ask all those questions before he would pay the money." On cross-examination, however, when asked how soon it was after the written contract had been executed that Tate and his son went to Pennsylvania to see Klock, he answered, "I think the next day." And when asked, in the same connection, whether they took the written contract with them, he answered: "I am not sure about that, * * * but I think not." When asked to state whether Klock paid the money, he answered: "Yes, sir; as far as I know. He paid it, and Mr. Tate said he paid it, and that he got it. Of course, I was not there." Neither the testimony of Mann, nor Klock, alleged associate of Gates, was taken. Another significant fact is that, after Gates purchased the lumber and other property from Tate & McDevitt, he left McDevitt in full charge of the property, substantially as he had been before the sale.

But even more convincing, perhaps, is the fact that about October 16th, a few days after these purchases, Gates met Stover in a hotel at Elkins, and sold, or professes to have sold, the lumber to him. Stover had been the agent of plaintiffs in negotiating for them the sale and the purchase of the lumber from Tate & McDevitt and had prepared the contract. On cross-examination Gates says that when Stover came into the hotel he said to him: "Stover, you are just the man I want to see, and I told him that I had bought a million feet of lumber on the Coal & Coke, and as I know Mr. Stover very well, I says, 'I want you to tell me when I have a good deal or a poor deal.' He said, 'I cannot tell you until I hear what you have got.' I told him what I had, and he asked me what I paid for it, and I told him, and he said, if it was log run stock and was on the Coal & Coke, 'you have a good deal, and what you recommend it.' And he says, 'What will you take for it if it is as you recommend it?' I said I would take $17,000. Mr. Stover figured a bit and said, 'If it is log run stock, and the amount you tell me, I will take it.' 'Well,' I said, 'Mr. Stover, to be fair, we will call it a deal, but you go and look at it, and if you find the stuff there, you will take it, and, if not, we won't deal.' Mr. Sigler was sitting there, and he said, 'That was the quickest deal I ever saw in my life,' and he has been a lumberman for years." Gates professes he sent McDevitt with Stover to the mills to see the lumber. When Stover was asked whether he understood it to be the same lumber sold by Tate & McDevitt to Halfpenny & Hamilton, he answered: "No, not exactly. After telling me that eight car loads had been shipped, it was my impression that the advance had been covered by these shipments." According to their testimony the contract between Gates and Stover was that Gates was to deliver the lumber on board cars, and Gates professes to have employed McDevitt to perform this part of the contract. After Gates had sent out men a time or two to load cars and found the expenses too great, he says, "I went to Mr. Stover and told him it would not do, and he said he could not help it, and I said, 'What will you take and load this lumber yourself?' He asked me $1 per 1,000 if I remember, but we made the bargain at 75 cents, and then I put a man to tally and paid him myself." Thus Gates & Co. stepped down and out, leaving Stover and McDevitt in charge. If defendants Gates and Tate are to be believed, Gates & Co. had paid cash, but Stover had paid nothing, at the time the lumber was levied on by the attachment in this case, for Stover was to pay only as the lumber was delivered on cars. Afterwards, and after this suit was brought, we find Gates in Philadelphia, where he met J. L. Broadfoot, who had been an inspector of lumber for the plaintiffs, and spoke to him about selling lumber he was interested in. When asked what lumber it was he was interested in, he replied: "Mr. Stover told me that any one I saw that would sell this lumber he would pay for it, and I understood that Mr. Broadfoot said that he was out of work and he would know where to get buyers, and that was the reason I spoke to him about it. Q. Then you were trying to sell Mr. Stover's lumber, were you? A. I was not trying, no, sir, but was trying to help him in selling it." The price which Gates & Co. were to pay Tate & McDevitt was several thousand dollars less than they would have realized at the prices at which it had been sold plaintiffs. Many other inculpatory facts appear, but we have already detailed enough of the evidence to show the baldness of the fraud.

The legal principles applicable to transactions of this character are so well known to the profession, and have been so often declared in the decisions of this court, that it is unnecessary to repeat them here. One proposition, however, may deserve more than this passing notice. Counsel for defendants say that as the bill does not charge insolvency of Tate & McDevitt, and as they appear to have realized in the sale of lumber some $13,000, and it does not clearly appear that the plaintiffs cannot obtain satisfaction of their debt by legal process against them, they have no legal or equitable right to subject the property attached to the payment thereof. But the rights of a creditor to subject to the payment of his debts the property of his debtor fraudulently conveyed does not depend on the question of the insolvency of the debtor. Insolvency is often an element going to show fraud, but the creditor's right to pursue the property fraudulently conveyed is not controlled thereby. While a different rule may prevail in some jurisdictions, it is not the law of this state that the creditor must first exhaust the debtor's other property. The statute of this state against fraudulent conveyances gives an absolute right to creditors to a suit in equity to annul a fraudulent conveyance, and they are not compelled first to subject other property of the debtor, by execution or otherwise. Hoffman v. Fleming, 43 W. Va. 762, 28 S. E. 790; 14 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 329, 330. And, as was held in Edgell v. Smith, supra: "If the intent is to either hinder or delay them, or defraud them, by a conveyance which places an obstacle in the way of the prosecution of their legal remedies, it is void under the statute against fraudulent conveyances." There can be no doubt of the fraudulent intent of the debtors in this case to put all their visible property out of the reach of plaintiffs by legal process, and to wholly defraud them. To all intents and purposes they admit it. When attempting to sell the lumber to Nelson, Tate admits having said to him that Halfpenny was trying to do him, and that he was going to see if he could not take care of himself, and when Halfpenny called to see him at Bellefonte, Pa., after the sales to Gates & Co. and to Stover, Tate said to him, "I have my money in my sock, and you can run after me as I ran after you for over six weeks." And when Halfpenny replied, "You are going to do me, Tate," he answered, "No, but I am going to have my own, and I am in position to get it." And when Halfpenny asked him what damage he wanted, he answered, in substance, if your nerves are not strong, hold on to the chair you are sitting on good and tight, for I just want $10,000 out of you, and that Halfpenny did not say anything for a while and then left.

We are clearly of opinion that the decree below dismissing the plaintiffs' bill as to G. H. Gates & Co. and K. H. Stover, and abating the plaintiffs' attachment levied upon the lumber in controversy, and referring the cause to a commissioner, should be reversed and annulled, and that the decree which the court below should have pronounced should be entered here. Tate & McDevitt, as the record clearly shows, and as they practically admit, were indebted to plaintiffs for advancements made on lumber, as of October 19, 1907, $3,581.29, which, with interest thereon to July 11, 1908, the date of the final decree appealed from, aggregates $3,736.14; and, it appearing that the attachment was sued out on good and sufficient grounds, the decree to be entered here in modification of the decree below will be that the plaintiffs recover of the defendants Tate & McDevitt the said sum of $3,736.14, with interest thereon from July 11, 1908, until paid, together with their costs in this court and in the circuit court expended, subject to a credit of whatever may be collected on the decree in favor of plaintiffs against People's National Bank, garnishee, and that the property attached and taken in possession by the sheriff be sold to satisfy the same. And the cause will be remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein in accordance with the principles announced and directions given herein.

BAKER v. JACKSON.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1022*)—REVIEW—COMMISSIONER'S REPORT.

A commissioner's report, based on evidence, has great weight, and should be sustained, unless plainly not warranted by a reasonable view of the evidence. This rule operates with great force in an appellate court, after the report has been confirmed by a circuit court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by Stark L. Baker against William Jackson. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Ward, for appellant. Lew Greynolds and W. B. Maxwell, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. Stark L. Baker filed a bill in the circuit court of Randolph county against William Jackson to enforce a judgment lien against land of Jackson. The judgment was rendered by a justice in favor of William Reams against said Jackson and H. M. Robinson. Robinson was surety for Jackson in the note on which the judgment was rendered, and Robinson paid the judgment, and Reams assigned it to Robinson by written assignment. Without this assignment equity would keep the judgment alive and virtually assign it to Robinson by subrogating him to its lien. Jackson filed an answer pleading payment of the judgment. Depositions were taken on both sides, and the court made a decree expressing the opinion that the case was for the plaintiff, and referring it to a commissioner to report what land Jackson owned and the liens thereon. The commissioner took some more depositions and reported this judgment as a lien. The court overruled Jackson's exceptions, confirmed the report, and decreed the judgment against Jackson and ordered a sale of the land.

The sole question is one of fact: Had the judgment been paid? Jackson claimed that in a settlement between Robinson and him this judgment was included and paid. Robinson denied this. Upon this test question the evidence is absolutely conflicting. No receipt is produced from Robinson. The judgment proved the lien. The burden was on Jackson to show the payment by preponderant evidence. He has failed to do this, even were it an original question in this court; but there is the commissioner's report confirmed, which brings the case under the well-known rule that where a commissioner reports on facts his finding will be given great weight, and should be sustained in the circuit court, unless plainly not warranted by any reasonable view of the evidence, and this rule operates with peculiar force in an appellate court when the report has been confirmed by the circuit court. Reger v. O'Neal, 33 W. Va. 159, 10 S. E. 375, 6 L. R. A. 427. In addition to this we have the old rule that a circuit court's decree on evidence is taken to be right, and will not be reversed, unless decidedly against the weight of the evidence. Kennewig Co. v. Moore, 49 W. Va. 323, 38 S. E. 558. Not unless plainly wrong. Wolfe v. Bank, 54 W. Va. 689, 47 S. E. 243. Especially when the evidence is conflicting. Naughton v. Taylor, 50 W. Va. 233, 40 S. E. 352. It is useless to detail mere evidence. Such is not the mission of opinions. Their purpose is to lay down legal principles.

We affirm the decree.

BIBB et al. v. AMERICAN COAL & IRON CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 11, 1909.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 43*)—PROCEEDINGS—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A vendor seeking to reform the written contract because of mutual mistake has the burden of proof.

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 45*)—PROCEEDINGS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Mere preponderance of evidence is not sufficient to justify the reformation of a written contract on the ground of mutual mistake, but the mistake must be conclusively established.

3. EQUITY (§ 296*)—PLEADING—SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

Where defendant, in a bill to enforce payment of the purchase price of coal land together with a gas well, claimed damages for the defective title of the plaintiffs to the well, which defendant used in connection with the property sold until it ceased to flow, when it was abandoned as valueless, the exhaustion and abandonment of the well, having occurred pending the litigation, could be introduced by a supplemental bill as a fact affecting the measure of defendants' damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 296.*]

4. EQUITY (§ 295*)—PLEADING—SUPPLEMENTAL BILL.

The chief office of a supplemental bill is to bring into the case new events, affecting rights and interests already mentioned, which have arisen since the filing of the original bill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 581; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

5. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 351*)—RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF PARTIES—ACQUISITION OF ADVERSE TITLE.

In the absence of fraud in a sale of an interest in land, a vendee in possession who acquires an outstanding title cannot demand from the vendor more than the amount reasonably and fairly paid on that account, and this rule applies to a sale of property of uncertain duration, such as a gas well.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 1064; Dec. Dig. § 351.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Action by R. M. Bibb and others against the American Coal & Iron Company and others. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Scott, Buchanan & Cardwell, for appellants. H. R. Pollard and Meredith & Cocke, for appellees.

WHITTLE, J. The original bill in this case was filed by the appellants against the appellees in September, 1902, to enforce the payment of $5,000, the residue of the purchase price of $35,000, for the sale of their leasehold interest in a tract of coal land located in Mingo county, W. Va., together with the improvements, fixtures, and certain personal property, consisting of a stock of goods, live stock, and unexpired insurance policies, and also "the natural gas well" on the premises, under a contract of December 10, 1901. The contract stipulates that the foregoing property is to be conveyed by deed free from incumbrances.

The bill contests the title of the Mingo Coal Company to the gas well, or, at least, the right of that company to exact compensation for its use, either from the plaintiffs or their assignee, the American Coal & Iron Company. The plaintiffs also assert title in themselves to the property, at least to the extent of their right to use it in connection with their leasehold free of rent. It is, moreover, alleged that it was the intention of the plaintiffs, by the contract of sale, to sell, and of the American Coal & Iron Company to buy, only such interest in the gas well as they acquired from their grantors, Morrison and Walker, and that the insertion of the provision in respect to that property in the fee-simple clause of the contract of sale was the result of a mutual mistake; and the prayer of the bill is that the contract be reformed so as to conform to the true understanding of the parties. The answers of the defendants controvert both contentions.

The American Coal & Iron Company in its answer says: That, shortly after the contract of purchase had been executed, it first learned of the claim of the Mingo Coal Company to the gas well; that in order to avoid complications and to continue its mining operations, it was compelled to enter into an agreement with the Mingo Coal Company, by which it was allowed to use the gas from the well upon the payment of an annual charge of $250; that it had paid all the purchase money due under the contract of December 10, 1901, except $5,000, which sum it notified the plaintiffs it would hold to indemnify and save itself and its assignee harmless on account of the failure of the plaintiffs to comply with their contract in the matter of conveying the gas well; "that it had repeatedly stated to the plaintiffs that it was ready to pay the residue of the purchase money if they would convey the gas well free of incumbrance and relieve it and the assignee of the annual charge aforesaid."

The correspondence between the defendants and the plaintiffs in relation to the agreement for the use of the gas well shows that the annual stipend of $250 covered the entire output of the well and the use of the gas for all purposes whatsoever. In a letter, under date of February 8, 1902, the president of the American Coal & Iron Company writes: "We are not raising a frivolous question. It is one of great importance to us. It involves our right to use the gas well free of charge and as our own, and the right of the Mingo Coal Company to demand a compensation of us for the use of the well during the life of our lease." A few days later he says: "In a word, the lease to us from the Mingo Coal Company gives us no greater right than we would have enjoyed if your sale of the well to us had carried with it a good title."

The vendee was never deprived of the possession or use of the well, and all the gas was consumed by it in the use and ceased to flow, and the well was abandoned as valueless August 21, 1904.

Before the hearing the plaintiffs asked leave to file a supplemental bill, which alleged that the vendee took possession of all the property included in the contract of sale, and in connection with its mining operations used the gas from the well until it ceased to flow and the well was abandoned August 21, 1904. But leave to file the supplemental bill was denied; the court being of opinion that, even if its allegations were proved, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to the abatement of damages prayed for. The court also decreed that the American Coal & Iron Company was entitled to retain the $5,000, the balance of the purchase price of the property sold under the contract of December 10, 1901, as compensation for the failure of the plaintiffs to convey to it a good title to the gas well free from all incumbrances, and dismissed the plaintiffs' bill with costs. From that decree this appeal was allowed.

We find no error in the ruling of the chancery court upon the primary contentions of the plaintiffs in regard to their title to the gas well and the alleged mutual mistake in the contract of sale. The burden of proof rested on the plaintiffs in both instances, and, without reviewing the testimony on those issues, we are of opinion that on neither point has it been satisfactorily borne.

The law is well settled that a very high degree of proof is required in a suit to reform a written contract. The mere preponderance of evidence is not sufficient, but the existence of the mutual mistake must be conclusively established.

In Pomeroy on Specific Performance (Ed. 1897) § 261, the rule is thus stated: "The defect in the contract must, however, be proved beyond all reasonable doubt, by evidence of the clearest and most satisfactory nature. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff. * * * An alteration of the writing cannot be made upon a conjecture as to the true reading, even though the court is satisfied that the existing instrument does not express the real intention of the parties."

The decisions of this court are in full accord with the statement of the law as to the character of evidence necessary to reform a written contract. Mauzy v. Sellars, 26 Grat. 641, 647; Carter v. McArtor, 28 Grat. 356, 360; Fudge v. Payne, 86 Va. 303, 10 S. E. 7; S. V. R. Co. v. Dunlop, 86 Va. 846, 351, 10 S. E. 239; Donaldson v. Levine, 93 Va. 472, 25 S. E. 541; Moore v. Assurance Co., 103 Va. 391, 394, 49 S. E. 499; Beach v. Bellwood, 104 Va. 170, 183, 51 S. E. 184.

Putting aside therefore both of these contentions as not proved, we shall address ourselves to the ruling of the trial court on the question of the measure of damages to which the vendee is entitled on account of the defective title of the plaintiffs to the gas well.

In approaching the consideration of that question, we may premise that the record does not show either fraud or misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiffs with respect to their title to the gas well. The acquiescence of the Mingo Coal Company in the use of the well as an incident to the leasehold of the coal property in the past may well have induced belief on the part of the plaintiffs that it would make no charge for the continued use of it by their vendee.

As a question of correct practice, under the evidence in the case, we have no doubt about the propriety of bringing into the record the fact of the exhaustion and abandonment of the gas well by the vendee pending litigation, as affecting the measure of its damages. Even in an action at law on a life insurance policy which had been repudiated by the insurance company, where the insured died before trial, the beneficiary was permitted to prove the cessation of the life of the insured as an element proper to be considered in fixing the quantum of damages. Opinion by Burks, J., in Clemmitt and Wife v. New York L. Ins. Co., 76 Va. 355, 362.

One of the chief offices of a supplemental bill is to bring into the case new events referring to and supporting or affecting rights and interests already mentioned, which have arisen subsequently to the filing of the original bill. Story's Eq. Pl. § 336; 1 Bar. Chy. Pr. 165, 351; Pleasant v. Logan, 4 Hen. & M. 489; Boykins v. Smith, 3 Munt. 102; Laidley v. Merrifield, 7 Leigh, 346; Glenn v. Brown, 99 Va. 322, 38 S. E. 189.

Though it is undoubtedly true, as a general proposition, that the test of the value of property sold is to be applied as of the day of sale, the case in judgment does not come within the influence of that principle. In other words, we are not called on here to speculate as to the value of the gas well (the price of which was not fixed by the parties in the contract of sale, and as to which there is no evidence in the record), as an original proposition; but our inquiry is limited to the ascertainment of the quantum of damages sustained by the vendee by reason of the failure of the vendors to convey a good title to the property in controversy.

The well-established rule on that subject is that, in the absence of fraud, where the outstanding title is acquired or the incumbrance removed by the vendee in possession by purchase, such vendee is entitled to the amount reasonably and fairly paid by him on that account, and to no more. That principle is distinctly enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Bush v. Marshall, 6 How. 284, 12 L. Ed. 440. Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court, quotes with approval the statement of the law from the case of Galloway v. Finley, 12 Pet. 295, 9 L. Ed. 1079, as follows: "Equity treats the purchaser as a trustee for his vendor, because he holds under him; and acts done to perfect the title of the former, when in possession of the land, inure to the benefit of him under whom the possession was obtained, and through whom a knowledge of a defect of title was obtained. The vendor and vendee stand in the relation of landlord and tenant. The vendee cannot disavow the vendor's title."

These principles are universally recognized, and firmly established in Virginia. Hull v. Cunningham, 1 Munt. 332, 338; Bryan v. Salyards, 3 Grat. 181; Roller v. Effinger, 88 Va. 645, 14 S. E. 337; Burnett v. Caldwell, 76 U. S. 290, 19 L. Ed. 712; Peters v. Bowman, 98 U. S. 56, 25 L. Ed. 91; Rawle on Cov. for Title (5th Ed.) § 192; Wood's Mayne on Dam. § 250.

Nor is the application of the rule to this case affected by the circumstance that the American Coal & Iron Company only acquired the use of the gas well. It was dealing in regard to a species of property of uncertain duration, and prudently adopted a form of contract which rendered the benefits and burdens reciprocal and co-existent; the plan being to set apart a sum of money, the interest on which, at 5 per cent., would yield a sum equal to the annual exaction for the use of the well as long as the gas might continue to flow. That mode of adjustment was chosen by the vendee without consulting the plaintiffs, and the wisdom of it has been demonstrated by subsequent events. The fact that it was satisfactory to the vendee and considered the equivalent of a conveyance by the plaintiffs of the gas well clearly appears not only from the conduct of the parties, but also from the answer and the extract from the letter of the president already quoted.

Subordinating, then, form to substance, our conclusion on this branch of the case is that the American Coal & Iron Company (after having been placed in possession of the gas well by its vendors under the contract of sale) acquired the outstanding title of the Mingo Coal Company to the gas well, and is affected with an equity in favor of its vendors which forbids that it shall demand of them more than its actual outlay in the purchase of such title.

It follows from these views that the decree of the chancery court must be reversed, and this court will enter such decree as that court ought to have entered, awarding to the appellants the balance of their purchase money, with interest, subject to a credit for the amount paid by the American Coal & Iron Company to the Mingo Coal Company for the use of the gas well.

Reversed.

6. CARRIERS (§ 218*)—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LIMITING LIABILITY.

Under Va. Code 1904, § 1294c(24), providing that no contract shall exempt any common carrier from the liability of a common carrier, which would exist had no contract been made or entered into, a carrier of live stock may not contract to limit its liability for loss or injury to the cattle to less than their true value, whether the loss or injury is caused by its negligence, or not, if it is not caused by the vis major, or the inherent qualities of the cattle or the fraud of the shipper.

Error to Circuit Court of James City and City of Williamsburg.

Trespass on the case by J. N. Pew against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company for loss of and injury to cattle shipped. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

R. G. Bickford and S. O. Bland, for plaintiff in error. N. L. Henly, C. B. Garnett, and Braxton, Williams & Eggleston, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This is an action of trespass on the case to recover damages arising out of an intrastate shipment of cattle, the property of the defendant in error, J. N. Pew, over the road of the plaintiff in error, the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, the initial carrier. Some of the cattle were killed and others injured in course of transportation under circumstances which it is alleged render the carrier liable for the damage sustained.

To a judgment against the company for the value of the cattle, this writ of error was awarded.

The principal assignment of error draws in question the ruling of the circuit court denying the validity of certain stipulations contained in the bill of lading, whereby, in consideration of a reduced rate for transportation of the cattle, the company seeks to limit the measure of its duty as a common carrier, and the shipper obligates himself to accept an agreed value, less than the true value of the cattle, in the event of loss for which the carrier is responsible.

The company insists that in no event can it be held answerable in damages under a correct construction of section 1294c(24), Va. Code 1904, unless the plaintiff proves that the injury to the cattle resulted from its negligence, and, in that event, that the amount of the recovery must be limited to the agreed value of the cattle.

The trial court resolved both propositions against the contention of the company, instructing the jury that if they believed from the evidence that the defendant company received the cattle for transportation, and that they were killed, lost, or destroyed, they must find for the plaintiff, unless such killing, loss, or destruction was due to the act of God, or the public enemy, or the peculiar nature or inherent qualities of the cattle, or to the act or fault of the shipper.

The court, moreover, told the jury, that the stipulation in the bill of lading limiting the value of the cattle, in case of loss, to an amount less than their true value, was invalid.

The correctness of this ruling depends upon the proper construction of section 1294c(24).

The first sentence of the first paragraph of that section renders the initial carrier, receiving goods for transportation, liable for any loss or damage caused by his negligence or the negligence of any connecting carrier to which such property may be delivered, or over whose lines such property may pass; and the fact of loss or damage in such case shall be prima facie evidence of negligence. This provision, except to the extent to which it undertakes to make the initial carrier liable for loss or damage occurring on the lines of connecting carriers, is simply declaratory of the common law. The next provision allows the initial carrier to recover from the connecting carrier the amount of any loss, damage, or injury it may be required to pay to the owner of such property on account of the latter's negligence. Then follows the provision upon which the recovery in this case is founded, namely, that: "No contract, receipt, rule or regulation shall exempt any such carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract been made or entered into."

This enactment is a composite piece of legislation. The first sentence of the first paragraph was taken from the Missouri statute (Laws Mo. 1879, p. 171; Rev. St. Mo. 1889, § 944), while the concluding sentence of the paragraph was adopted from the Iowa statute (Code Iowa 1897, § 2074).

It is a familiar rule in the interpretation of statutes that where a foreign statute, which has received the construction of the courts of the state from which it comes, has been incorporated into the statute law of this state, it will be presumed that the Legislature likewise adopted the construction placed upon the statute by the courts of the foreign state. Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh, 394, 410, 23 Am. Dec. 280; Danville v. Pace, 25 Grat. 1, 5, 18 Am. Rep. 663; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cheatwood's Adm'r, 103 Va. 356, 367, 49 S. E. 489.

Applying that rule to the interpretation of the statute in question, we find that the Missouri courts hold that the liability of an initial carrier, with respect to acts done on its own line, remains as at common law. Hurst v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co., 117 Mo. App. 25, 94 S. W. 797; Ball v. Wabash, 83 Mo. 574; McCann v. Eddy, 133 Mo. 59, 33 S. W. 71, 35 L. R. A. 110.

So, also, as to the concluding sentence of the first paragraph of section 1294c(24), taken from the Code of Iowa, the courts of that state have uniformly held invalid contracts exempting common carriers from their common-law liability, either with respect to the amount or degree of their liability as insurers. McDaniel v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 24 Iowa, 412; McCoy v. K. & D. M. R. Co., 44 Iowa, 424; McCune v. B., O. R. & N. Ry. Co., 52 Iowa, 600, 8 N. W. 615; Lucas v. Ry. Co., 112 Iowa, 594, 84 N. W. 678.

In considering this subject, Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 237c, observes: "In some of the states, however, it has been deemed contrary to the true policy of the state to permit the carrier to limit his common-law liability by any contract whatever. Prohibition of such contracts has been declared by statute in Kansas, Iowa, Texas, while in Nebraska and Kentucky they are forbidden by the Constitution."

See, also, a full and valuable discussion by Judge Freeman of "Limitation of Carrier's Liability in Bills of Lading," in notes to Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. Calumet, etc., Farm, 194 Ill. 9, 61 N. E. 1095, 83 Am. St. Rep. 68, 74, et seq. At pages 129, 130, 83 Am. St. Rep., the learned annotator says: "In a few of the states this has been carried to the extent of prohibiting a common carrier from in any way limiting his liability as it exists at common law. Such prohibitions are to be found in the Constitutions of Kentucky and Nebraska, and by statute in Iowa and Texas."

The Missouri cases, supra, show that the liability of the initial carrier for acts done on its own line is that of an insurer, as at common law, and that the object of the Missouri statute, corresponding to the first sentence of the first paragraph of section 1294c(24), is to apply the English rule of liability to the initial carrier, where there is an initial carrier and a connecting carrier, and does not affect the liability of a carrier where the transportation is wholly over its own line.

It follows therefore that the first sentence of the section has no application to the case in judgment, which is controlled by the concluding sentence of the first paragraph, as interpreted by the decisions of the Iowa courts to which reference has been made.

Nor is this view of the enactment influenced by the title in black-faced type found at the head of the section. That title was inserted by the compiler of the Code as matter of convenience.

The original act, which is known as the "Claytor act," was passed May 16, 1903, under the title, "An act prescribing the liability of common carriers, railroads or transportation companies for any loss, damage or injury to property caused by its negligence or the negligence of any other common carrier, railroad or transportation company, to which said property may be delivered, or over whose line such property may pass." Acts Ex. Sess. 1902-03-04, p. 388, c. 258. The Claytor act was carried into the Code by the compiler as section 12941. On January 18, 1904, however, the Legislature passed a new act, entitled "An act concerning public corporations." That statute re-enacts the Claytor act and is embodied in Va. Code 1904 as section 1294c(24). Acts Ex. Sess. 1902-03-04, p. 968, c. 609.

We are not unmindful of the fact that the title of an act is not infrequently of value in the exposition of statutes, as a guide to the intention of the Legislature; but there is nothing in the title to the present enactment to divert us from a meaning plainly to be gathered from the history of the legislation, and more especially as our conclusion is in harmony with the manifest public policy of the state.

Having thus reached the conclusion that the case comes within the control of the provision in section 1294c(24) that "no contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any such common carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract been made or entered into," the plaintiff in error is necessarily relegated to its common-law liability. It therefore only remains to inquire what the liability of a common carrier is with respect to goods delivered to him for transportation, under the doctrine of the common law, in the absence of all contract whatsoever on the subject.

That question was definitely answered in England in the year 1785, by the decision of the Court of King's Bench, in the case of Forward v. Pittard, 1 Term R. 27. In that case the plaintiff delivered to the defendant, a common carrier, 12 pockets of hops to be carried to Andover and forwarded to Shaftsbury by the carrier's wagon. The hops were consumed by accidental fire while in transit, without negligence on the part of the defendant. Lord Mansfield delivered a notable judgment in the case, in which, among other things, he said: "The question is whether the common carrier is liable in this case of fire. It appears from all the cases for 100 years back that there are events for which the carrier is liable independent of his contract. By the nature of his contract, he is liable for all due care and diligence, and for any negligence he is suable on his contract; but there is a further degree of responsibility by the custom of the realm—that is, by the common law, a carrier is in the nature of an insurer. It is laid down that he is liable for every accident, except by the act of God, or the King's enemies."

This statement of the common-law rule has been followed by this court in Murphy, Brown & Co. v. Staton, 3 Munt. 239, and Friend v. Woods, 6 Grat. 189, 192, 52 Am. Dec. 119.

The recent case of C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Beasley, 104 Va. 788, 52 S. E. 566, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, arose under section 1294c(25), or rather under the corresponding section (1296) of the Code of 1887, and the court held that "a contract with a common carrier, whereby, in consideration of a reduced rate, a shipper agrees to accept an agreed value, less than the true value, of goods lost by the negligence of the carrier, is invalid. * * *"

Our conclusion is that, so far as the rights and liability of an initial carrier with respect to goods lost on its own line is concerned, there is no difference in legal effect between a liability arising under the last sentence of the first paragraph of section 1294c(24) and under 1294c(25), except, of course, that liability under the latter clause is predicated on the negligence of the carrier, while under the former it is not. That is to say, a common carrier can no more exempt itself by contract from liability for loss or injury to goods committed to it for transportation in the one instance than in the other.

There are numerous minor assignments of error, which have received careful consideration, but which need not be noticed further than to observe that the construction which we have placed on section 1294c(24) eliminates the main contentions of the plaintiff in error, that the admissible evidence in the case is plainly sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury, and that no more favorable verdict for the defendant could properly have been rendered. See Taylor v. B. & O. R. Co. (Va.) 62 S. E. 798, and authorities cited.

We find no reversible error in the record, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

SOUTHERN EXPRESS CO. v. KEELER.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 11, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 147*)—EXPRESS COMPANIES AS CARRIERS—STATUTES—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—"TRANSPORTATION COMPANY."

An express company, being by Va. Code 1904, § 1294a(2), declared a transportation company, is within the terms of Va. Code 1904, § 1294c(24), providing that no contract shall exempt any common carrier from liability which would exist had no contract been made or entered into.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, p. 7076.]

2. CARRIERS (§ 147*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—LIMITING LIABILITY—STATUTES.

The manifest purpose of Va. Code 1904, § 1294c(24), is to deprive the common carrier of the right to limit his liability by contract and relegate him to his common-law rights and responsibility, independent of contract, though by the common law a carrier could qualify his liability as quasi insurer under certain conditions.

3. CARRIERS (§ 158*)—EXPRESS COMPANIES—LOSS OF TRUNK—FIRE—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

Under Va. Code 1904, § 1294c(24), providing that no contract shall exempt any common carrier from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract been made or entered into, an express company is liable for the full value of a trunk destroyed by fire without negligence on its part, without regard to a stipulation in its receipt that, no value being given, it would be liable for only $50.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 665; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 129*)—FRAUDULENT CONCEALMENT BY SHIPPER—AFFECTING LIABILITY FOR LOSS OF GOODS.

The agent of an express company, on a request to it to get a trunk for shipment, the contents of which was worth $400, received the trunk and removed it from an upper to a lower floor, and there left it, and did not return, though notice was given to the company. Thereafter the trunk was sent by an agent of the shipper to the company's office, and the agent truthfully said that he did not know the value of the trunk, and he received a receipt stating that the value was asked and not given. The trunk was then shipped at a cheaper rate than if the true value had been given. Held, that there was no fraudulent concealment of the value of the trunk, whereby a cheaper rate was obtained so as to affect the liability of the carrier for the loss of the trunk by fire.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Trespass on the case by Margaret Keeler against the Southern Express Company for the loss of a trunk. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Statement of agreed facts in an action of trespass on the case brought by Margaret Keeler against the Southern Express Company to recover damages for the loss of a trunk:

"(1) On the 20th day of January, 1907, the plaintiff in this action was the owner of a certain trunk containing clothing, silverware, jewelry, and other things enumerated below, which, together with the trunk, were of the value of $400. On the said 20th day of January, 1907, the plaintiff in Petersburg, Va., summoned the defendant by telephone to transport the said trunk to Richmond, Va., but did not inform said company that the trunk was of unusual value. The Southern Express Company sent its agent to the residence whence the summons came, and the said agent removed the trunk from the upper floor to the lower floor of the house and there left it, saying that he would call later and take it away; but no information was asked or given said agent as to the value of the trunk and its contents. Although summoned three times to come for the trunk, the Southern Express Company failed to send its agent back. Thereupon on the 22d day of January, the plaintiff intrusted the trunk to a colored driver to be carried to the office of the express company. The said colored driver, on said 22d day of January, delivered said trunk, which was locked, to the agent of the Southern Express Company at Petersburg. The said agent inquired of the said driver the value of said trunk. The reply of the said driver was that he did not know. Whereupon the agent of the defendant company did receive the said trunk for transportation to Richmond, Va., and did issue to the said agent of the shipper the bill of lading, a copy of which is hereto attached by agreement of counsel, the original being lost by said plaintiff, which said bill of lading was accepted by the said driver, as agent of the plaintiff, and by said driver delivered to said plaintiff, with the words, 'Value asked and not given,' stamped on said bill of lading. At the time of the delivery of the said bill of lading to the agent of said shipper, he paid the agent of said defendant company the sum of 65 cents freight on said trunk, which weighed 155 pounds.

"(2) The contents of said trunk were: Underwear; one black broadcloth suit; one white broadcloth suit; one gray serge suit; one white crepe de chine dress; one black velvet hat (plumes); one white hat; one brown hat; two lace waists; one black silk waist; one dozen shirt waists; one black voile skirt; one black silk underskirt; one white silk underskirt; five pair of shoes; two blankets; five pillows; collection of Sterling silver souvenir spoons, between six and seven dozen; manicure set; toilet articles, brush, silver, mirrors, etc.; one gold chain purse; two fancy combs; gold pins; gold buttons; belt buckles; three chains; and also one case containing the following sterling silver: One dozen dinner knives, one dozen dinner forks, one dozen dessert forks, one dozen dinner knives, one dozen fruit knives, one dozen teaspoons, one dozen tablespoons, one dozen dessert spoons, one butter knife, one sugar shell, one cream dipper, and one meat fork.

"The rates of freight on packages shipped from Petersburg, Va., to Richmond, Va., then established and in force by the company were: For packages of less value than $50, the sum of 40 cents per hundredweight; and on packages of greater value than $50, the same as the above, plus the further sum of 5 cents for each $100 of the value, or fraction thereof. The State Corporation Commission of the state of Virginia had not yet formally promulgated or established any rates, but upon complaints by shippers as to express rates the Southern Express Company had been summoned before the commission and their rates inquired into, and the commission had not changed the same. In March, 1907, the commission promulgated its rates, which were the same as those formerly promulgated, fixed, and charged by the express company, and these rates are now in force in the state of Virginia.

"Hence if the true value of said trunk and its contents had been declared by the shipper or her agent, the value being $400, and the weight 155 pounds, the charge would have been 65 cents according to weight, plus 20 cents.

"(3) When the trunk above mentioned was delivered to the company as aforesaid, it was promptly handled and transported from Petersburg, Va., to Richmond, Va., in the manner and way in which packages of the known value of less than $50 were and usually are handled, and was, on its arrival at the latter place, promptly taken to the warehouse and office of the Southern Express Company, as is customary with such packages.

"(4) On the night of its arrival at the said warehouse, the said warehouse and office were destroyed by fire, together with a great portion of the contents thereof. The said fire was an accidental fire and was in no way caused by the negligence of the carrier nor of any of its servants or agents, and the said carrier, its agents and servants, used every reasonably possible exertion to save from destruction the contents of the said warehouse and office.

"From destruction by said fire were saved all packages delivered to the defendant express company for carriage on which a value of as much as $50 had been declared by the consignors, and such packages of less value as was possible to save under the circumstances.

"Before the expiration of 30 days from the time when said goods were lost, the plaintiff gave the defendant notice, in writing, of her claim for the loss of said goods and chattels.

"(5) The method of handling packages in use on the lines of the Southern Express Company varies directly as the value of such packages; it giving more care to packages of great value than to packages of a lesser value.

"All packages shipped from Petersburg, Va., to Richmond, Va., of a declared value of as much as $50 are handled and transported in the following manner:

"A package being offered to the company in Petersburg, at the company's office, it is weighed, and the shipper is asked the value. The rate of freight is then fixed as above mentioned, according to the published rates, and depends on the weight and on the value.

"The rate being paid (or the package being sent C. O. D.), a receipt, contract, or bill of lading is issued showing the consignor, consignee, destination, origin and rate paid, and the conditions and terms on which the shipment is accepted. The contract, receipt, or bill of lading in this case was in the usual form and contained the usual conditions.

"The package is then taken charge of by the agent of the express company, and, if a value of as much as $50 has been declared, it is especially noted on an individual waybill showing the consignor, origin, destination, train handled on, consignee, value, rate paid, and the messenger by whom handled.

"This messenger is personally responsible for the package, and is charged with the duty of taking extraordinary care thereof, and with placing it in the safest possible place, if the size permits, in a fire and burglar proof safe. In case of fire, accident, or other unusual danger, he is charged with the duty of saving all valuable packages first, and then other packages if possible. In case a package has been declared of an extraordinary value, a special messenger is sent in charge of the individual package.

"When the messenger in charge of a package of the value of $50 or more arrives at the destination of such packages, or at the end of his run, he surrenders the package only when he has been given a written individual receipt for the said package; said receipt being signed by the person receiving said package.

"In cases of all packages on which a value of as much as $50 is declared, every agent and servant of the express company who handles the package knows the value so declared, knows that there is a written proof that the said package is in his hands, and knows that he must not surrender the said package under any consideration unless he has received like written proof of him to whom he delivers it. In case of all packages of the declared value of $50, every possible precaution is taken for their safety. This necessitates a more costly method of handling by the company of those valuable packages than is used in the handling and transportation of packages of small value.

"Packages of small value are handled in the following more economical manner:

"A package is offered the company, at its office, at point of shipment, and the package weighed and valued as above described.

"The rate is then fixed as above with regard to weight and value. All packages on which a value of less than $50 has been declared are then noted on the general waybill, which shows point of shipment, consignee, and destination.

"Such packages are not handled individually, in that they are checked only in the general run; that is, when arriving at destination or end of the messenger's run, they are called off by one messenger and checked by the other. Due care is used, but not the unusual and extraordinary care that is expended on packages of greater value. No individual receipt for each package is taken, but a receipt for the general cargo is taken, and the waybills show what articles are included therein.

"In case of fire or of attack or of any extraordinary danger, the messenger's instructions and duty are to care first for the packages of greatest value, then for those of greater declared value than $50, and then for those of less value.

"Every messenger or other servant or agent can look at his waybills and see exactly what packages are of a value of $50 or more, and exactly what the value of each of these has been declared to be. All messengers or other agents or servants of the defendant company know that packages on which no value has been declared are of less than $50 of value, and that the freight rate paid on such packages has been secured on such low value.

"Every messenger knows that it is his duty, as above described, to pay every attention, ordinary and extraordinary, to the safety of the valuable packages, and to use every reasonable care to insure the safety of the packages of low value.

"Every messenger or other servant of the company is chargeable personally with all losses occurring while the package lost is in his custody and control, unless such loss can be properly explained as unavoidable.

All articles of glass, or contained in glass, or any of a fragile nature, will be taken at shipper's risk only, and the shipper agrees that the company shall not be held responsible for any injury by breakage or otherwise, nor for damage to goods not properly packed and secured for transportation. It is further agreed that said company shall not, in any event, be liable for any loss, damage, or detention caused by the acts of God, civil or military authority, or by insurrection or riot, or the dangers incident to a time of war.

"If any sum of money, besides the charges for transportation, is to be collected from the consignee on delivery of the above described property, and the same is not paid within thirty days from the date thereof, the shipper agrees that this company may return said property to him at the expiration of that time, subject to the conditions of this receipt, and that he will pay the charges for transportation both ways, and that the liability of this company for such property while in its possession for the purpose of making such collection, shall be that of warehousemen only.

"For the Company. Taylor."

In this case neither party demanded a jury, and, the whole matter of law and fact having been submitted to the court, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for the sum of $400, the value of the trunk, to which judgment the express company brings error.

W. R. Meredith and Jas. H. Drake, Jr., for plaintiff in error. Garnett & Pollard, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. In its main features this case is ruled by the decision in Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company v. Pew, 64 S. E. 35, in which an opinion was handed down at the present term. Both cases arose under the concluding sentence of the first paragraph of section 1294c(24), Va. Code 1904, which provides that: "No contract, receipt, rule, or regulation shall exempt any such common carrier, railroad or transportation company from the liability of a common carrier which would exist had no contract been made or entered into."

An express company is declared to be a "transportation company" by our statute, and is therefore expressly included in the foregoing enactment. Section 1294a(2).

The fundamental error in the contention in favor of the limited liability of the express company in the present instance consists in assuming that the rights of the parties are as at common law, ignoring the provisions of section 1294c(24). It is well settled that, while at common law a common carrier could not contract against his own negligence, he could qualify his liability as quasi insurer by special acceptance upon such reasonable terms and conditions as might be agreed upon with the shipper, provided they were not incompatible with his duty to the public; but it was the manifest purpose of the Legislature, by the language quoted, to deprive the common carrier of the right to thus limit his liability and to relegate him to his common-law rights and responsibilities independent of contract.

It need only be observed, in conclusion, that the agreed facts do not sustain the remaining contention that the plaintiff obtained a cheaper rate for the transportation of her trunk by fraudulent concealment of its true value.

The agent of the express company received the trunk from the owner, removing it from the upper to the lower floor of the house in Petersburg at which she was staying, and went away promising to return for the trunk later, but without making any inquiry as to its value, or imparting any information on the subject of rates. The company was afterwards three times requested by 'phone to call for the trunk, but neglected to do so, and it was finally sent to the express office by a negro driver. When asked the value of the trunk, the driver truthfully answered that he did not know.

Fraud cannot be predicated of such a state of facts and the mere acquiescent acceptance by the shipper of a bill of lading prepared by the express company with the customary stamp, "Value asked and not given."

We are of opinion that the judgment of the law and equity court of the city of Richmond is without error, and must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

It is a general rule of practice that if a declaration in tort contains two or more counts, some of which are good and others bad, a demurrer to the whole declaration and each count thereof should be sustained as to the bad counts, else a general verdict and judgment for the plaintiff will, as a rule, be set aside.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1040*)—HARMLESS ERROR—OVERRULING DEMURRER.

If trial is had on the case made by a good count in a declaration containing other insufficient counts, no injustice will be done by refusing to set aside the verdict and judgment for plaintiff for error in overruling a demurrer to the whole declaration.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 258*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF COUNT.

A count in the declaration for injuries to a servant held not objectionable as failing to show a causal connection between the negligence alleged and the accident, and as not forewarning defendant of the case it was required to meet.

† Rehearing denied March 27, 1908.

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 108*)—STATEMENT OF CAUSE OF ACTION—REQUISITES OF DECLARATION.

All that is necessary in a negligence case is to set forth the facts which constitute the cause of action, so that they may be understood by the defendant, the jury, and the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 174; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 153*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—WARNING SERVANT.

In an action for injuries to an employé whose hand was caught in a circular saw, based on the ground that he was a common laborer and was set to work alone with the saw without instructions and necessary assistance, it was not error to instruct that it was the defendant's duty to use reasonable care not to expose its servant to risks beyond those incident to the service at the time of the contract of employment, and if, while plaintiff was performing his duties with ordinary care, defendant violated its duty in this particular, proximately causing the injury, defendant was liable, unless the risk to which the servant was exposed was so glaring, constant, and imminent that an ordinarily prudent man would have refused to incur it.

7. TRIAL (§ 259*)—REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS—REDUCTION TO WRITING.

To require a reduction to writing of a requested instruction qualifying or explaining an instruction already given is not unreasonable, and is in accordance with the reasonable and better practice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 648; Dec. Dig. § 259.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—ACTION FOR INJURIES — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — CAUSE OF ACCIDENT.

Evidence, in an action for injuries to an employé whose hand was caught in a circular saw, held sufficient to show that the injury was caused by defendant's failure to provide an assistant.

9. NEW TRIAL (§ 104*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—CUMULATIVE.

In an action for injuries to an employé whose hand was caught in a circular saw, defendant's theory as to the cause of the accident, as testified to by the foreman, was that plaintiff was at the rear side of the saw cleaning the trash away with a stick, and as he turned around he threw his hand on the back of the saw and received the injury. Defendant moved for a new trial for after-discovered evidence of two hands in its factory. Neither saw the accident, but one claimed to have seen plaintiff immediately before it occurred scraping sawdust from under the rear of the saw, and the other stated that he saw him immediately afterward at the rear of the saw. Held, that such evidence, if true, merely corroborated the foreman.

10. NEW TRIAL (§ 102*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

There was no error in overruling a motion for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence, where it does not appear that it could not have been discovered before trial by reasonable diligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 210-214; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Norfolk County.

Action by Jaun Dalea against the Virginia Cedar Works. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Loyall, Taylor & White, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Lawless, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The object of this writ of error is to review a judgment obtained by the defendant in error, Jaun Dalea, against the plaintiff in error, the Virginia Cedar Works, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries imputed to the negligence of the defendant.

The first assignment of error relates to the action of the court in overruling demurrers to the original and amended declarations.

The court overruled a demurrer to the original declaration and to each of the four counts thereof, and thereupon the plaintiff, by leave of the court, amended his declaration by filing a fifth count, the demurrer to which was likewise overruled.

It is a general rule of practice that, "if a declaration in tort contains two or more counts, some of which are good and others bad, and there is a demurrer to the whole declaration and each count thereof, it should be sustained as to the bad counts, else a general verdict and judgment for the plaintiff will, as a rule, be set aside." Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Stegall, 105 Va. 538, 54 S. E. 19.

The reason for the rule is that the verdict may have been founded upon an immaterial or faulty count; but, where the court is satisfied that the defendant has not been prejudiced by reason of such faulty count, the verdict ought not, for that cause only, to be set aside. Thus, in the present instance, it is apparent that the trial was had upon the case made by the fifth count, and therefore, if that count be sufficient to maintain the action, no injustice will be done by relaxing the stringency of the general rule; nor need we concern ourselves to consider the alleged insufficiency of the remaining counts. Standard Oil Co. v. Wakefield, 102 Va. 824, 834, 47 S. E. 830, 66 L. R. A. 792; Virginia, etc., Wheel Co. v. Harris, 103 Va. 708, 49 S. E. 991.

We shall, accordingly, confine our inquiry to the sufficiency of the fifth count, the essential averments of which are as follows: That the defendant was carrying on the business of manufacturing buckets, barrels, and like products, and employed in connection with its business revolving circular saws and other dangerous machinery. That the plaintiff was hired by the defendant as a common laborer to keep its yard clear of trash, chips, and other debris incident to the operation of the plant. That there was in use in the factory at the time of the accident a dangerous machine, known as a "bottom machine," to which was attached a large circular saw. That at least two servants were necessary to operate the machine and handle the logs, chains, ropes, belts, and other appliances, and it could not be operated, fed, and managed by a less number of servants without greatly increasing the risk and danger of the operator. That it was the custom of the defendant not to employ fewer than two of its servants in such operation. That it was the duty of the defendant to engage a sufficient number of servants to discharge that service with reasonable safety to themselves, and not to assign the plaintiff to such position of danger, and transfer him to essentially new duties and responsibilities and expose him to hazards different from those incident to his original contract of employment, and for the performance of which he was unfitted by reason of lack of experience and skill. Nevertheless the defendant did not observe its duty in that regard, and although the plaintiff was hired as a common laborer, as before mentioned, the defendant, with knowledge of the increased danger and his lack of experience and skill, without necessary instruction, negligently required the plaintiff to operate the dangerous machine and saw without assistance. That while the plaintiff, in the exercise of reasonable care and without fault on his part, singly and alone, and in obedience to the master's order, was preparing and adjusting a log of wood upon the table used in connection with the rapidly revolving saw, to be cut into designated pieces, his right hand was borne down and forced into sudden contact with the saw and so injured and mangled that it became necessary to amputate his arm between the wrist and elbow. The count also contains the averment that the increased risk was not so dangerous that a prudent man would have refused to incur it.

It is objected that the count shows no causal connection between the alleged grounds of negligence and the accident, and, moreover, that it does not forewarn the defendant of the case it is required to meet.

The count is not amenable to criticism on either grounds. It sets forth with reasonable certainty facts that show that the casualty was proximately due to the defendant's negligence in ordering an inexperienced servant, of whose lack of skill it had knowledge, without instruction and without assistance, to operate a dangerous machine, which duty was ordinarily performed by a sawyer and helper.

It has never been the purpose of this court to introduce innovations in pleading in negligence cases, or to subject the plaintiff to unreasonable requirements in setting out his cause of action. All that is necessary is for the pleader "to set forth the facts which constitute the cause of action, so that they may be understood by the party who is to answer them, by the jury who are to ascertain the truth of the allegations, and by the court who is to give judgment." Surely this oft-repeated and reasonable rule of the common law (taken literally from 1 Chitty's Pleading [9th Am. Ed. 232, 233]), while not unduly burdensome on the plaintiff, is quite sufficient to advise the defendant of the case he is called upon to defend. This subject has been so recently and so repeatedly discussed by this court that it demands neither elaboration nor citation of authority.

The next assignment of error arises in connection with the plaintiff's instruction No. 1.

That instruction told the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care not to expose its servant to risks beyond those incident to the service at the time of the contract of employment, and if they believed from the evidence that, while the plaintiff was performing his duties with ordinary care, the defendant violated its duty in the particular indicated, and that such breach of duty on its part was the proximate cause of the injury, the defendant is liable in damages, unless the jury should further believe from the evidence that the risk to which the servant was exposed was so glaring, constant, and imminent that an ordinarily prudent man would have refused to incur it.

In interpreting that instruction, the plaintiff's counsel argued that, although the plaintiff assumed the risks incident to his employment as a laborer in the yard, he did not assume the risk of operating without assistance the machine by which he was injured, unless the risk was of such a character that an ordinarily prudent man ought to have declined to assume it. Thereupon counsel for the defendant objected to that line of argument, and requested the court to instruct the jury verbally as to the meaning of the instruction, to which request the court replied that counsel could give his interpretation of the instruction, but, if he desired an instruction from the court construing the language used, he must reduce such instruction to writing.

The instruction in question was taken substantially from an instruction founded upon a similar state of facts approved in Va., etc., Cement Co. v. Luck, 103 Va. 427, 49 S. E. 577. See, also, Goodman v. R. & D. Ry. Co., 81 Va. 586, and R. & D. Ry. Co. v. Burnett, 88 Va. 542, 543, 14 S. E. 372.

The terms placed upon counsel by the court—namely, that if he wished an instruction qualifying or explaining an instruction already given he must reduce it to writing—were not unreasonable, and are in accordance with the usual and better practice in such case.

The next assignment of error is to the alleged failure of the plaintiff to show that the absence of a sufficient number of servants was the proximate cause of the accident.

From the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, this assignment is without merit. Indeed, the following admission in the petition for the writ of error would seem to answer the contention: "In the case at bar, the plaintiff, as shown by the evidence, claimed that he should have had an assistant to help him lift extra heavy logs on the table connected with the circular saw, and because he did not have such an assistant, and attempted to lift an extra heavy log, he lost his balance and fell against the saw."

The plaintiff testified that two men were always necessary to lift the heavier logs. He was a young Italian laborer, who could not speak English, and understood very little of the language. Testifying through an interpreter as to how the accident happened, he said: "He was lifting up a piece that was extra heavy. He thought probably he could handle it. He had been doing it for a day, but in picking up this piece and putting it over it overbalanced him and bore him against the saw and cut his hand off."

This evidence establishes a state of facts which sufficiently shows the causal connection between the injury received and the failure of the defendant to provide the plaintiff with an assistant to help him feed and operate the machine. Improvement Co. v. Smith's Adm'r, 85 Va. 306, 7 S. E. 365, 17 Am. St. Rep. 59; Marshall v. Valley R. Co., 99 Va. 805, 808, 34 S. E. 455; Virginia, etc., Co. v. Tomlinson, 104 Va. 249, 51 S. E. 362.

The remaining assignment of error concerns the action of the court in overruling the defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence.

The theory of the defendant as to the cause of the accident, as testified to by the foreman in charge of the sawroom, is that Dalea was at the rear side of the saw cleaning the trash away with a little stick, and as he turned around he threw his hand on the back of the saw and received the injury of which he complains. The after-discovered evidence is that of two of the hands in the factory. Neither saw the accident, but one of them claims to have seen the plaintiff immediately before it occurred scraping sawdust from under the rear end of the saw, and the other states that he saw him immediately after the accident standing at the rear end of the saw. The effect of this evidence, if true, is merely corroborative of the testimony of the foreman.

The rule governing the granting of new trials on the ground of after-discovered evidence is well settled, and is stated by Judge Cardwell, in Norfolk v. Johnakin, 94 Va. 290, 26 S. E. 832, as follows: "Motions for new trials are governed by the same rules in civil as in criminal cases, and the circumstances, controlling the granting of new trials upon the ground of after-discovered evidence are summed up by this court in Nicholas' Case, 91 Va. 753, 21 S. E. 868, thus:

"(1) The evidence must have been discovered since the trial.

"(2) It must be evidence that could not be discovered before the trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

"(3) It must be material in its object and such as ought, on another trial, to produce an opposite result on the merits.

"(4) It must not be merely cumulative, corroborative, or collateral"—citing 4 Min. Inst. pt. 1, p. 758; St. John's Ex'r v. Alderson, 32 Grat. 140, 143; Wynne v. Newman's Adm'r, 75 Va. 817; Whitehurst v. Com., 79 Va. 558. See, also, Tallafiero v. Shephard, 107 Va. 56, 57 S. E. 585.

It does not appear that this evidence could not have been discovered before the trial by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Both affiants were employes of the defendant, and the simple inquiry as to what they knew of the accident (though neither saw it) would have elicited the desired information. Besides, the evidence is only cumulative and corroborative of the testimony of the foreman. So that in neither aspect do the affidavits measure up to the required standard.

Upon the whole case we find no error in the judgment complained of, and it must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 111*)—PLEADING—INSUFFICIENCY OF GENERAL ALLEGATIONS.

It is not sufficient for the declaration to allege negligence in a general way, but it must aver the acts relied on with reasonable certainty and show that they constitute the efficient and proximate cause of the injury.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 258*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—DECLARATION—ALLEGATIONS OF NEGLIGENCE.

Error to Circuit Court, Goochland County.
Action by George Hunter against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. H. & Walter Leake, for plaintiff in error. Jas. C. Page and Jas. Alston Cabell, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This action is brought by the defendant in error, George Hunter, to recover damages for personal injuries received while in the service of the plaintiff in error, the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company.

The only assignment of error which demands our attention relates to the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration.

The declaration contains three counts, the gravamen of each of which is as follows:

(1) That the defendant was the owner of an iron or steel rail of great weight, which was lying along its roadbed and under the control of certain of its agents or servants. That it was the duty of the defendant, by its agents and servants, so to control, manage, or handle the rail as not to carelessly and negligently injure the plaintiff, when not guilty of any negligence on his part. Yet the defendant, by its agents and servants, conducted itself so carelessly and negligently in the management, control, and handling of the rail as to allow it to fall upon and strike the plaintiff, inflicting the injuries of which he complains.

(2) That on the occasion of the accident the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to help its other employes to handle and move the rail in question, and it was the duty of the defendant to exercise ordinary care in selecting competent servants, especially a competent foreman, to handle and move the rail. Yet the defendant negligently failed to exercise such care in selecting a competent foreman, and in consequence of the negligent, unskillful, and wrongful orders and directions given by such incompetent foreman, the rail was allowed to fall upon and strike the plaintiff, inflicting the injuries of which he complains.

(3) That the defendant's foreman, who had authority over the plaintiff, did not give the proper and necessary orders or directions about handling and moving the rail, but gave such negligent and reckless orders that the rail, which was being handled by the plaintiff with reasonable care, was untimely, carelessly, and negligently thrown and fell upon the plaintiff, inflicting the injuries of which he complains.

The cardinal vice of all these counts is that, while they iterate and reiterate in varying phrase the charge of negligence against the defendant, they wholly omit to state the facts upon which the alleged negligence is predicated.

It is well settled that it is not sufficient for the declaration to allege negligence in a general way (for to do so is only to state the pleader's conclusions of law from undisclosed facts); but it must aver the act of negligence relied on with reasonable certainty and show that such act constitutes the efficient and proximate cause of the injury. Otherwise no traversable issue is tendered, and the court cannot determine, as a matter of law, whether the declaration states a case of actionable negligence, and the defendant is not advised of the case which he is called upon to defend. Our reports contain numerous illustrations of this principle.

Thus, in the recent case of Lynchburg Traction & L. Co. v. Guill, 107 Va. 86, 57 S. E. 644, the court, speaking through the president, observes: "Negligence is a conclusion of law from facts sufficiently pleaded. The office of a declaration is to inform the defendant of the case which it has to meet, so that it may have a reasonable opportunity to prepare its defense. It is not enough to say that the plaintiff was injured, and that the injury resulted from the careless and negligent conduct of the defendant; but the facts relied upon to establish the negligence for which the defendant is to be held liable must be stated with reasonable certainty."

Tested by that standard, the first count of the declaration is insufficient. It states no fact from which the existence of actionable negligence can be inferred, or which informs the defendant of what it is required to answer.

So, with the second count, it avers, by way of premise, the duty of the defendant to exercise ordinary care in selecting competent servants, and, especially, a competent foreman, to handle and move the rail, and the breach of that duty. The pleader then proceeds to ascribe the accident to the negligent, unskillful, and wrongful orders and directions given by the incompetent foreman, without any suggestion as to what orders and directions were given; thus again substituting a bare conclusion for the facts from which it is to be deduced.

The third count is amenable to the same objection.

In the case of Newport News & Old Point Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Nicolopoulos (decided January 14, 1909) 109 Va. —, 63 S. E. 443, the court, speaking through Buchanan, J., says: "The third count does not aver in what particular the defendant failed to perform its duty. It charges generally that the defendant negligently ran its car into the plaintiff's wagon, whilst he was attempting to cross its track. As a count in trespass on the case, this count is not good under our decisions. * * * Whether an action based upon negligence be in case or trespass, the same reason exists why the acts of negligence relied on as a basis of recovery should be stated in the one case as in the other. The object of a declaration is to apprise the adverse party of the ground of complaint."

This court has not laid down, nor does it propose to establish, any unreasonable rules with regard to particularity of averment in declarations in personal injury cases. All that the rule requires is that the declaration shall contain a concise statement of the material facts on which a recovery is demanded. Of course, the evidence relied on to sustain the averments of the declaration need not be pleaded. Surely a rule so essential for the enlightenment of the court and the defendant imposes no unreasonable burden upon the plaintiff. Indeed, it is hard to conceive how any intelligent system of pleading could require less.

It is well known to the profession that the practice under the liberal doctrine of some of the earlier cases had become so lax that in many instances declarations contained mere legal inferences upon the essential element of negligence, based upon no fact, and defendants were relegated wholly to the field of speculation as to the real grounds of their supposed liability. The decision in Hortenstein v. Va. Car. Ry. Co., 102 Va. 914, 47 S. E. 996, was intended to correct the mischief which flowed from that practice.

In that case it is said by Judge Cardwell: "The court, upon mature consideration, has reached the conclusion that in actions for a tort the declaration must state sufficient facts to enable the court to say upon demurrer whether, if the facts stated are proved, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover."

See, also, Blackwood Coal & Coke Co. v. James' Adm'r., 107 Va. 656, 60 S. E. 90, and Virginia Cedar Works v. Dalea (decided at the present term) 64 S. E. 41.

For the error of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration, the judgment must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the case remanded to the circuit court, with leave to the plaintiff, if so advised, to amend his declaration, and for further proceedings.

Reversed.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. HOLMES' ADM'R.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 11, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 309*)—CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED.

A railroad company must exercise care to avoid a collision at a highway crossing, and, the greater the danger, the greater is the vigilance required.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 981; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 156*)—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

On a demurrer to the evidence, the facts which the evidence demurred to tends to establish must be taken as true, and the evidence of the party demurring must be rejected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 354, 355; Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 312*)—HIGHWAY CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED.

Independently of any statute or ordinance, a lookout must be employed when a train is backed over a crossing in a frequented street, and merely ringing the bell or sounding the whistle when a train is standing near with its rear to the crossing is not sufficient warning to pedestrians of an intention to back the train; and without other notice the company is negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 999; Dec. Dig. § 312.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 350*)—STREET CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether it is negligence for trainmen to run an engine backwards over a crossing in a frequented street, without stationing some one on the tender to signal its approach to one who may be on the track, is ordinarily for the jury, though under some circumstances the act may be negligence as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1162; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 345*)—STREET CROSSINGS—CARE REQUIRED—NEGLIGENCE.

Where it is negligence to operate an engine backwards without having a flagman or a man on the tender, the absence of such precautions may be proven to establish the negligence of the railroad company, without reference to the existence, pleading, or proof of a municipal ordinance on the subject, provided the allegations of the declaration are sufficient to justify the admission of such evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 345.*]

6. RAILROADS (§ 345*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—DECLARATION—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for the death of a pedestrian struck by an engine at a street crossing, the declaration set out in detail the peculiarities of the crossing, alleged that the tracks were flush with the pavement of the street, so that persons unfamiliar with the locality would not discern their presence; that the company was required to exercise reasonable care to keep watch so as to avoid running into pedestrians and to give warning of the approach of trains by ringing the bell or other means; and that it failed to do so—evidence that there was no flagman, no person riding on the front of the engine, and that the engineer could not see from his cab, and that there was no light burning, no bell ringing, was admissible to prove negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 345.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 344*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—PLEADINGS.

The declaration in an action against a railroad company for the death of a pedestrian struck by a train at a crossing need not allege in detail all the methods of precaution that the railroad company might or ought to have taken to give timely warning of the approach of the train, but the particular duty must be alleged, and its violation must be charged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 344.*]

8. RAILROADS (§ 348*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for the death of a pedestrian struck by an engine at a street crossing, evidence held to show actionable negligence, authorizing a recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

9. RAILROADS (§ 348*)—ACCIDENTS AT CROSSINGS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for the death of a pedestrian struck by an engine at a street crossing, evidence held to show that decedent was free from contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

10. EVIDENCE (§ 588*)—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE. The jury may discredit the testimony of a witness where the same is inherently unsatisfactory.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the administrator of Florence I. Holmes against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff rendered after overruling a demurrer to the evidence, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hughes & Little, for plaintiff in error. Brooke & Brooke, Richard McIlwaine, Jr., and J. F. Rutherford, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. Mrs. Florence I. Holmes and Mrs. Mabel E. Munsell were killed by an engine of the plaintiff in error on the western end of Main street, in the city of Norfolk, on the night of September 28, 1907, between 7 and 8 o'clock. The administrator of each of the decedents brought suit to recover damages in the circuit court of the city of Norfolk, alleging in each case that the deceased came to her death, without fault on her part, as a result of the negligence of the defendant railroad company, and in each case there was a judgment for $10,000 in favor of the plaintiff, which we are asked to review and reverse.

The evidence being the same, the cases were heard together in this court.

In the case now under consideration, being that of Mrs. Holmes' administrator, there was a demurrer to the evidence, which was overruled by the circuit court and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff for the damages ascertained by the jury. This action of the circuit court is assigned as error.

A brief statement of the physical conditions and special circumstances surrounding the point of the accident is essential to a clear understanding of the case.

The Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Company occupies an inclosed yard on the north side of West Main street, in the city of Norfolk, extending from the intersection of that street with Newton street westwardly toward the Bay Line wharf, a distance of about 200 feet. Beginning at the intersection of Newton and Main streets, and going thence westwardly along the sidewalk on the north side of Main street, the first 55 feet of this yard front on Main street is occupied by a building. Proceeding further west, the yard is inclosed by a close fence, nearly 7 feet high, in which there are three gates, each about 17 feet wide. The railroad track of the defendant company forms a "Y" in Mathews street south of its intersection with Main street. The eastern prong of this "Y" crosses Main street, and enters the yard through the first gate reached in going west along the north side of Main street, and the western prong of the "Y" crosses Main street and enters the yard through the third gate. It was at this third and last-mentioned gate that the accident occurred.

The intersection of Mathews with Main street does not constitute a street crossing, Mathews street running only as far north as the south side of Main street, the north sidewalk of Main street being continuous as far down as the wharf at its end. An engine, therefore, coming out of a gate of the yard, passes immediately over the sidewalk on the north side of Main street.

The conditions pointed out show that the place at which the accident happened was one involving peculiar danger to persons going west along the north side of Main street.

A railroad company is bound to exercise care to avoid a collision when its road crosses a public highway, and, the greater the danger, the greater is the vigilance required.

Viewing the testimony from the standpoint of a demurrer to the evidence, it appears that from Newton street to the place of the accident, a distance of about 150 feet, the railroad yard was so obstructed by buildings and fences that a pedestrian on the north side of Main street, going west to the wharf, could not see an engine being operated in the yard and approaching the street on the western prong of the "Y," nor could the engineer in charge of the engine going out of the yard on the western prong of the "Y" see any one approaching on the sidewalk from the east and going toward the wharf; there not being space enough between the cab window and the gatepost on the eastern side of the gate for him to see a person so approaching.

It further appears that the plaintiff's intestate and her companion were strangers in the city of Norfolk, having never been there before the day they were killed, and only along Main street in the morning as they came from the wharf with friends who met them there. In going west along Main street on their return to the wharf, between 7 and 8 o'clock at night of the same day, when it was very dark and "drizzly or misty," as they passed the gate through which the western prong of the "Y" ran, an engine of the defendant, with tender in front, moving at the rate of four miles an hour, emerged from the yard upon the sidewalk of the street, colliding with the intestate and her companion, instantly crushing the life out of both, and scattering their mutilated remains in different directions about the street.

It further appears that the Main street of Norfolk is a populous thoroughfare, and that at the time of the accident, on account of the Jamestown Exposition, which was then in progress, it was more than usually traveled. It further appears that the engine, with the tender in front, came from its place of concealment in the yard upon the sidewalk with no light burning, no bell ringing, preceded by no flagman, and without any watchman or warning of any kind to persons who might be passing along the street upon which it was about to enter.

If these facts are to be taken as true, and they must be on a demurrer to the evidence, the negligence of the defendant is beyond question.

It is contended on behalf of the defendant that the circuit court erred "in admitting evidence of the lack of a flagman or watchman or man on the tender in the absence of proof of an ordinance requiring it."

Several of the counts of the declaration set out a city ordinance providing that, whenever a locomotive engine is used within the city of Norfolk, a man shall be required to ride on the front of the locomotive or engine, or on the tender or car in advance of the train as the case may be, and no such locomotive shall be allowed to cross West Main street until a flagman shall have been stationed at the intersection of the railroad with the street to display a flag by day and a light by night, etc.

The theory of the defendant seems to be that, because there was no proof of the alleged ordinance requiring the precautions mentioned, the failure to take such precautions cannot be proven under the other counts of the declaration as tending to show the defendant's negligence. This position is not tenable.

"Independently of any statute or ordinance on the subject, when a train is backed over a crossing in a frequented street, a lookout must be employed. Merely ringing a bell or sounding the whistle on the engine, when the train is standing near with its rear to the crossing, is not sufficient warning to passers-by of an intention to back the train, and that without other notice the company will be negligent." Mark's Adm'r v. Petersburg R. Co., 88 Va. 1, 3, 18 S. E. 299.

Whether or not it is negligence for the servants of a railroad company to run an engine backwards without stationing some one on the tender to signal its approach to a person who may be on the track is a question which is controlled by the circumstances under which the engine is operated. Under some circumstances the act is negligence as a matter of law, but in most cases it is a question of fact, to be submitted to the jury. So. Ry. Co. v. Daves, 61 S. E. 748.

If, under the circumstances under which the engine in question was operated, it was negligence for the defendant company to have "no flagman or watchman or man on the tender," then the absence of such precautions may be proven to establish the defendant's negligence, without reference to the existence, pleading, or proof of an ordinance on the subject, provided the allegations of the declaration are sufficient to justify the introduction of such evidence.

The counts of the declaration other than those alleging the ordinance set out in detail the special peculiarities of the locality and its environments and approaches, by reason of which passengers on the street were obstructed in their view of engines or trains while in the yard and about to move therefrom into Main street; the fifth count alleging that the tracks of the railroad were let into and flush with the pavement of the street, so that persons unfamiliar with the locality passing along the street in the nighttime, in the exercise of ordinary care, would not discern their presence.

These, in brief, are the allegations of the circumstances under which the train was operated. These counts then proceed to charge the duties imposed upon the defendant company, under the special circumstances alleged, to be to exercise due and reasonable care to keep watch and on the lookout so as to avoid running into and over and injuring persons passing, etc., and the duty to exercise due and reasonable care to give warning of approach of the train by ringing a bell or by taking other means of notification so as to avoid, etc.

These counts do not allege that any particular method or precaution in exclusion of others was incumbent upon the defendant in carrying out the duty imposed upon it, but only to exercise due and reasonable care to perform the duty of keeping watch and lookout so as to give warning of its approach by ringing a bell or by taking other means of notification. These counts then allege that the defendant violated its duty and did not exercise due and reasonable care to keep watch and lookout, and to give warning of its approach by ringing a bell or by taking other means of notification.

To sustain the alleged violation of these duties, the plaintiff produced evidence that the view of the engineer from his cab was so obstructed that he could not keep watch and lookout; that no light was burning on the tender as it came out in front of the train; that no bell was ringing; that there was no watchman at the crossing; that there was no flagman to warn persons of the approach of the train; and that there was no person riding on the front of the tender which was in front of the engine. These are the ordinary and usual methods adopted for giving notice and warning to persons under the circumstances of this case, and proof that not one of them was employed tends to establish the allegation of the declaration that no warning was given.

The rules of pleading do not require the allegation, in detail, of all the methods of precaution that the defendant might or ought to have taken to give timely warning under the circumstances here disclosed. The particular duty must be alleged, and its violation must be charged. The duty here is alleged to be "to exercise due and reasonable care to keep watch and lookout and to give warning of the engine's approach"; and the violation of this duty is charged. To sustain this charge, evidence was admissible to show that there was no flagman, no watchman, no person riding on the front of the engine, that the engineer could not see from his cab, and that no light was burning and no bell ringing. See Ches. & Ohio Ry. Co. v. Hoffman, 63 S. E. 432.

The negligence of the defendant being established by competent testimony, we come to consider whether the plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence.

In this connection it is important to bear in mind the physical environments of the place where the accident occurred. These have been sufficiently described, and need not be repeated here. It was a dark, drizzly or misty night, with the spot badly lighted. The testimony shows that down to the very instant of the accident, when it was too late to escape, the decedent had no notice or warning of the danger that confronted her.

Only two witnesses testified to having seen the accident. One of these, W. Royster, introduced on behalf of the plaintiff, was returning from his work at the wharf along the north side of Main street. As he neared the point of the accident, he saw the deceased and her unfortunate companion on the sidewalk on the north side of Main street, approaching him, and saw both ladies step on the track where it crosses the sidewalk at the instant that the backing engine emerged from the yard to the sidewalk, and testifies that the engine had gotten possibly four or five feet out of the gate when it struck deceased in the side. The testimony of this witness that these ladies were on the sidewalk on the north side of the street when they were struck is borne out by other testimony as to the physical evidences at the point of contact. Two ladies' combs were found immediately after the accident, one in the middle of the sidewalk and one near the grating, just about where Royster saw them struck by the engine. Some brains were also found on the sidewalk and at the grating mentioned. The evidence further tends to show that at the point where this witness locates these ladies when struck there was a dragging, as if some one had been dragged over the surface there.

The testimony to which we have adverted clearly shows that the deceased was struck while on the sidewalk, and just as she stepped on the track, about four or five feet from the gate through which the engine emerged.

This evidence is uncontradicted, except by the testimony of R. L. Burgess, a witness introduced on behalf of the defendant company. This witness, who arrived at the moment, says that he was standing on the corner of Mathews and Main streets, on the south side of the latter, and that he saw two ladies, he supposes the two who were the victims of this accident, standing in the middle of Main street between the western prong of the "Y" and its eastern prong; that "they were talking there, and one of them said to the other, 'Let's get across the track ahead of the engine,' and one caught her arm into the other's arm"; that he saw the engine coming, and they "sprung" for a run to go across the track, and one had an umbrella hoisted, "and I seen them fall across the track, and I turned my head and walked away. That is all I know about that part of it. I could not swear the engine killed them." This witness further says that the ladies did not run straight across the track, the shortest way, but went diagonally in a northwesterly direction towards the track, recklessly running. This would be toward the approaching engine, which he says they were trying to avoid.

It is insisted on behalf of the defendant in error that the remark, "Let's get across the track ahead of the engine," which is attributed to one of these ladies, shows that the deceased had actual knowledge of the proximity of the engine; and that the remark made is a fact not contradicted. This witness does not claim to have heard this remark at any other time or place than while the ladies mentioned were standing together in the middle of Main street. The evidence of the plaintiff shows that the victims of this accident were not at the time the remark is said to have been made standing together in the middle of Main street, but that they were at that time on the northern sidewalk of the street, about the gate through which the engine that killed them passed; the only remark made by them being the exclamation as they were struck, "Oh, Lordy!"

All that happened was in a brief moment, and it is hardly possible that these ladies could have been seen standing together in the middle of Main street saying and doing there the things attributed to them, and at the same time to be where the evidence of the plaintiff places them. The statement of the witness Burgess must be taken as a whole; and, so considered, it cannot be reconciled with the plaintiff's evidence. We cannot sever the remark which he attributes to one of these ladies from its setting, and say that it establishes the contributory negligence of the plaintiff's intestate. Without reference, however, to the rule which rejects the statement of this witness on a demurrer to the evidence, his whole testimony is inherently unsatisfactory, and a jury would have been well warranted in discrediting it as they did do in the companion case of N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Munsell's Adm'r (which action on their part was approved by the judgment of the circuit court) 64 S. E. 50.

We are of opinion that the record does not sustain the charge that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence.

Upon the whole case, we find no error in the judgment of the circuit court, and it is affirmed.

Where, in an action for the death of a pedestrian struck by an engine at a street crossing, the evidence showed that the place of the accident was one of peculiar danger to pedestrians, because they could not see an approaching engine nor could the engineer see pedestrians approaching, and that the street was a populous thoroughfare, an instruction that the greater the danger the greater the vigilance required from the company, and that any neglect to give warnings of the train's approach proper under the peculiar circumstances rendered it liable, etc., was not open to the objection that there was nothing to show that the place of the accident required special precaution.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Munsell's administrator against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

This was an action for the death of a married woman, 31 years old, struck by an engine at a street crossing, mutilating her body. The jury rendered a verdict for $10,000.

The following is instruction No. 1:

"The court instructs the jury that a railroad company running and operating its trains upon and across the streets of a city must use greater care and diligence to prevent accidents to persons who may be upon or crossing said streets than is required of it in less frequented and populous localities; that in certain localities in a city greater precautions may be necessary than in others by reason of the existence in such localities of conditions or particular surroundings, making the danger of accidents there greater than in those places at which such conditions and particular surroundings do not exist; and that if a train is running upon or across a highway, or street, at a place where, by reason of the existence of special conditions and particular surroundings, there is greater danger of accidents to persons upon or crossing the street than in places where such special conditions and particular surroundings do not exist, it is the duty of the railroad company and its employees in charge of the train to exercise greater precautions, to be on the lookout, and to give warning of the approach of the train of a character depending upon the particular locality and circumstances to avoid accidents than would be required in other localities where such conditions and particular surroundings do not exist, and any neglect of such precautions to be on the lookout and to give warning of the approach of the train as are proper under the peculiar surroundings and circumstances of the locality constitutes negligence for which the railroad company is liable in damages if the jury believe that said negligence was the proximate cause of the accident, unless the injured person, by the exercise of such care on his part as would be used by an ordinarily prudent person under the same circumstances, could have avoided the accident."

Hughes & Little, for plaintiff in error. Brooke & Brooke, Richard McIlwaine, Jr., and J. F. Rutherford, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This case grows out of the same accident that was the subject of inquiry in the case of Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Holmes' Adm'r (in which an opinion is handed down at the present term of this court) 64 S. E. 46.

The plaintiff's intestate and her friend, Mrs. Holmes, were together at the time of the accident, and both were struck and killed at the same moment by the same engine. The testimony in the two cases is the same, and has only been printed in the other case, upon the understanding, however, that it is to be read and considered in this case.

The action brought by Mrs. Holmes' administrator was heard and disposed of upon a demurrer to the evidence. This case was submitted to a jury upon instructions, and a verdict found for the plaintiff, which the circuit court refused to set aside. The record here contains bills of exception not found in the other record.

Bill of exception No. 1 is to the action of the court in admitting evidence, in the absence of any city ordinance, that the defendant company did not have a flagman or watchman at the gate. This question has been fully discussed and disposed of adversely to the defendant in the case of Holmes' administrator, and what is there said need not be repeated here.

Bill of exceptions No. 2 is taken to the action of the court in giving certain instructions asked for by the plaintiff.

The first instruction is objected to upon the ground that there is nothing in the evidence to show that this was a place of any special danger, or that at the time of the accident there was any crowd in the neighborhood or anything requiring special precaution. The objection is wholly untenable. The opinion in the Holmes' Case discusses the evidence sufficiently to show that this instruction was fully justified, and could not have misled the jury.

The second instruction given for the plaintiff is objected to on the same ground as the first, and also for the reason that there was no sufficient testimony upon which to base it, and because of the plaintiff's negligence in failing to look and see the train. These matters are fully discussed and disposed of in the Holmes' Case, and what is there said can be read in connection with this case.

It is further urged that instruction No. 2 is objectionable because it left the jury blindly to impose fanciful requirements upon the defendant, and singled out and emphasized one charge of negligence.

We find nothing in this instruction to authorize an imposition by the jury of fanciful requirements upon the defendant. The conditions are given which show the unusual surroundings and dangerous condition of the place, and the jury are told that, if they believed such conditions existed, the defendant was bound to use such precautions as were proper, under the peculiar surroundings and circumstances, to give warning of the approach of the train. Nor was it objectionable for singling out and emphasizing one charge of negligence. It gave the jury the general conditions, as plaintiff believed them to exist, and said, if they believed that such conditions did exist, then unless the defendant, in view of these conditions, used such precautions as were proper, the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. If the conditions shown in the evidence and described in the instruction existed, it was for the jury to say whether, in view of such conditions, the defendant had used such precautions as were proper for the protection of persons passing on the street when its engine was emerging from the yard.

Bills of exceptions Nos. 3 and 4, as stated in the petition to this court, are not regarded by the plaintiff in error as of sufficient importance to be emphasized. It is therefore unnecessary to prolong this opinion with their consideration.

The fifth and last assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury.

The verdict of the jury cannot be disturbed upon the ground that it is excessive, and the discussion in the Holmes' Case, to which reference is here made, is sufficient to show that the verdict cannot be set aside upon the ground that it is contrary to the law and the evidence.

The judgment complained of must be affirmed.

BOWE v. CITY OF RICHMOND.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 11, 1909.)

1. TAXATION (§ 679*)—SALE TO STATE AND RESALE—TAXES FOR WHICH LAND MAY BE SOLD—CITY AND STATE TAXES.

Code 1887, § 666, as amended by Act Feb. 11, 1898 (Acts 1897-98, p. 343, c. 306; Code 1904, p. 326), authorizes the sale of land sold and bid in by the commonwealth for the amount for which the sale to the commonwealth was made, but other provisions of the section make the purchase dependent upon the payment of all taxes, penalties, fees, and costs. Code 1887, § 636 (Code 1904, p. 311), makes the taxes due the city as well as those due the state a lien on the property. Code 1887, §§ 638, 639 (Code 1904, p. 313), provide for the sale of the property for a sum sufficient to pay the unpaid state and city taxes thereon, with interest, costs, and charges connected therewith. By Code 1887, § 662 (Code 1904, p. 324), when any real estate is offered for sale as provided by section 638, and no one bids the amount chargeable thereon, the treasurer shall purchase it in the name of the auditor of public accounts for the benefit of the state, city, or town respectively, unless it has been previously purchased in the name of the auditor, when it shall be sold for what it will bring. A lot was sold by the city of Richmond under authority of its charter for nonpayment of city taxes for certain years, and at each sale was bid in by the city, but no proceedings were taken to invest it with title, and in 1897 the lot was sold for nonpayment of delinquent state taxes and purchased by the state in the name of the auditor of public accounts, and was thereafter sold to defendant pursuant to his application to purchase it, filed under section 666; he paying only the taxes due the state and not those due the city. Held, that though the provisions of the city charter under which it sold the lot and bid it off for nonpayment of city taxes, and those of chapter 28, were conflicting, when considered together so far as possible, they authorized the sale of property only upon payment of taxes due the city, as well as those due the state.

Cognate statutes should be construed together and made to harmonize so far as possible.

3. TAXATION (§ 805*)—SALE—ACTIONS TO TRY TITLE—ACTIONS AGAINST CLAIMANT—DEFECTS IN SALE.

Under Code 1887, § 661 (Code 1904, p. 321), providing that a suit to set aside the deed of a purchaser under Code 1887, § 666 (Code 1904, p. 326), which relates to the sale by the state of property sold for nonpayment of delinquent taxes, shall not be brought, except for fraud, unless brought within two years after the deed was recorded, a purchaser must comply with all the provisions of section 666 in order to plead the statute as a bar, so that one purchasing without paying city taxes due as well as state taxes, as required by that section, could not plead the statute as a bar to an action by the city to subject the property to payment of city taxes.

4. TAXATION (§ 761*)—TAX DEEDS—VALIDITY—TIME OF SALE.

Under Code 1887, § 666, as amended by Act Feb. 11, 1896 (Acts 1897-98, p. 343, c. 306; Code 1904, p. 326), providing that if no person who has the right to redeem land sold to the state for delinquent taxes at the time notice of the application to purchase is served shall appear within four months after such notice and redeem, the applicant may purchase within five days after the expiration of four months by paying all taxes, etc., a deed which showed that four months had not elapsed since service of notice of the application to purchase, when the deed was executed by the clerk of the hustings court of the city of Richmond, was void on its face, in absence of long acquiescence and possession, and hence was open to collateral attack in a suit by the city to subject the property to payment of taxes due it, which were not paid by the purchaser on the sale.

Appeal from Chancery Court of Richmond.

Suit by the City of Richmond against R. B. Bowe to subject property to the payment of city taxes. From a decree for complainant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stuart Bowe and Leake & Carter, for appellant. H. R. Pollard, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. For the year 1893 to the year 1899, inclusive, a lot lying in the city of Richmond, assessed in the name of Jane King, was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the city taxes or levies. Under the authority of the charter of the city, the lot was sold for each year's nonpayment of the said taxes, and at each sale was bid in by the city; but the proceedings under its charter necessary to invest the city with title to the lot were not taken. Acts 1869-70, pp. 139-141, c. 101, §§ 75-83.

In the year 1895 the said lot was returned delinquent for the nonpayment of the taxes due the state, and in the year 1897 sold therefor and purchased by the state. No person entitled to redeem the land having done so within two years, R. B. Bowe, the appellant, on the 15th of November, 1899, filed his application with the clerk of the hustings court of the city to purchase the same under the provisions of section 666 of the Code of 1887, as amended by an act approved February 11, 1896 (Acts 1897-98, p. 343, c. 306; Code 1904, p. 326). The notice required by that section to be given was served on the 17th day of November, two days after the application to purchase was filed. On the 17th day of March, 1900, the clerk of the hustings court executed a deed to the appellant, conveying the lot to him as purchaser thereof. The deed was acknowledged and recorded on the same day.

By section 83 of the city charter (Acts 1869-70, p. 140, c. 101), as amended by an act approved March 6, 1900 (Acts 1899-1900, p. 944, c. 864, § 1), it is provided that where real estate has been struck off to the city, when sold by it for delinquent taxes or levies due it, which has not been redeemed, and to which the city has not perfected its title in the manner prescribed by its charter, the city may enforce its lien for the taxes due it in a court of equity and release its right as purchaser, or to become a purchaser, of such real estate. Under that provision of its charter this suit was brought by the city to subject the said lot to the payment of the taxes due the city, and for which it had been sold and bid in by the city. The appellant and the parties interested in the lot under the will of Mrs. Jane King, who had died in the year 1895, were made parties defendant to the suit.

The appellant demurred to and answered the bill. The court overruled the demurrer and directed one of its commissioners to ascertain and report the amount of taxes due the city, all the liens upon the lot, its annual and fee-simple value, and who was the then owner thereof.

The commissioner reported that the amount of the city taxes (which was a little less than the amount claimed in the bill) was a lien upon the lot, that there were certain debts secured by deeds of trust which were also liens upon it, that the deed executed by the clerk of the hustings court to the appellant conferred no title upon him, and that the lot passed under the will of Mrs. King to John King, trustee for Mary M. J. K. Haynes and Maggie A. K. Dicken.

Each of the findings of the commissioner were excepted to by the appellant, the exceptions were overruled by the court, the report confirmed, and a decree entered setting aside and annulling the deed executed by the clerk of the hustings court to the appellant as to the taxes due the city, and directing the lot to be rented for the satisfaction of the same.

From that decree this appeal was allowed.

The first question to be considered is whether or not the trial court erred in holding that the tax deed conveying the lot to the appellant was invalid as to the taxes due the city.

Section 666 of the Code of 1887, as amended by the act of February 11, 1898, under which the appellant filed his application to purchase, provided that, if no person who had the right to redeem at the time of the service of the notice of the application to purchase shall appear within four months after such notice is served and redeem the land in the manner prescribed by the section, then the applicant shall have the right to purchase the same within five days from the expiration of the four months as aforesaid, by paying all taxes, penalties, fees, and costs.

The deed shows upon its face that when it was executed the clerk of the hustings court had no authority to make the conveyance, because four months had not elapsed since the service of the notice of the application to purchase. It further appears from the deed itself that the applicant to purchase had not paid the taxes due the city, and that he had not is one of the admitted facts in the case.

While the provisions of the charter of the city, under which it made sale of and bid off the lot in question for the nonpayment of the city taxes due thereon, and the provisions of the general law of the state governing the sale of land returned delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes, as found in chapter 28 of the Code of 1887 as amended and in force when the said lot was sold and purchased by the state for the nonpayment of taxes due on it, are incongruous and difficult to construe so as to give effect to all the provisions of the charter of the city and of the general law in force when the applicant filed his petition to purchase, it is clear, we think, that when the provisions of both are considered together and made to harmonize as far as possible, as they must be, they did not authorize a sale and conveyance of the lot to the appellant without his paying the taxes due thereon to the city as well as those due the state.

There is language in section 666 of the Code, as amended by the act approved February 11, 1898, which, if it stood alone, would have given the appellant the right to purchase the lot "for the amount for which the sale to the commonwealth was made"; but there is also language in the section which made his right to purchase dependent upon "his paying to the clerk all taxes, penalties, fees and costs" due on the lot and connected with his application to purchase. Which of these conflicting, or apparently conflicting, provisions is to control, must be determined by looking to the other provisions of chapter 28 of the Code of 1887 and especially sections 636, 638, 642, and 662 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, pp. 311, 313, 314, 324).

Section 636 of the Code makes the taxes due the city as well as those due the state a lien upon the lot. Sections 638 and 639 provide for a sale of the lot for a sum sufficient to pay the unpaid state and city taxes thereon, with interest, costs, and charges connected therewith. Section 662 provides that: "When any real estate is offered for sale, as provided by section 638, and no person bids the amount chargeable thereon, the treasurer shall purchase the same in the name of the auditor of public accounts, for the benefit of the state and county, city or town, respectively, unless such real estate has been previously purchased in the name of the auditor, in which case it shall be sold for such price as it will bring."

When all the provisions of law bearing upon the question, as before stated, are considered together, it is clear that the lot, when purchased in the name of the auditor of public accounts in 1897, was held for the benefit of the city as well as for the state, and that the appellant had no right to purchase it without the payment of the taxes thereon due both.

But it is insisted that, even if this be so, this suit was not instituted until more than two years after the recordation of the appellant's deed, and is therefore barred by section 661 of the Code, which provides, among other things, that a suit to set aside, annul, and cancel the deed of a purchaser under the provisions of section 666 of the Code shall not be brought except for fraud, unless it be brought within two years after the deed has been duly admitted to record.

In order to claim the benefit of the provisions of section 661, as was held in Virginia Building & Loan Co. v. Glenn et al., 99 Va. 460, 39 S. E. 136, a purchaser under section 666 of the Code must comply with all the provisions of the latter section. This, as we have seen, the appellant did not do.

It is further insisted that this suit is a collateral attack upon the appellant's deed, and cannot therefore be maintained under the decisions of this court in the cases of Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Grat. 526, and Machir v. Funk, 90 Va. 284, 18 S. E. 197.

It was held in the first-named case that the tax deed offered in evidence in an action of ejectment could not be collaterally attacked for irregularities upon its face. The deed in that case was made under and confirmed by decrees of a court having jurisdiction of the proceedings in which the deed was made. In disposing of the question of the irregularities in the proceeding, Judge Lee, speaking for the court, said: "It is not a question of jurisdiction, but of the regularity of the mode in which the jurisdiction has been exercised; and if there be jurisdiction, whatever irregularities may have occurred in the course of the proceeding, the decree will yet be evidence, at least as against strangers, in a subsequent collateral proceeding. That mere irregularities in a case of this kind will not suffice to exclude the record as evidence in a subsequent controversy, when offered by the party claiming under the sale, has been expressly decided by this court in Smith v. Chapman, 10 Grat. 445, and it cannot be considered as any longer an open question."

In Machir v. Funk, the other case relied on, it was held, upon the authority of Hitchcox v. Rawson, that the validity of a sale of land delinquent for the nonpayment of taxes, which is regular on its face, cannot be collaterally assailed.

This is a different case from either of those. The deed in this case is invalid on its face. The clerk of the hustings court had no authority to make a deed to the applicant until the four months had expired after the service of the notice required by section 666 of the Code. He was clothed with a mere naked power and could only exercise it in the manner prescribed by law.

Such a deed is invalid, unless there has been such a long acquiescence and possession under it as to justify a presumption in favor of the deed, as was the case in Robinet v. Preston's Heirs, 4 Grat. 141. See Sulphur Mines v. Thompson's Heirs, 93 Va. 316, 25 S. E. 232, and authorities cited.

That a tax deed, which shows upon its face that the law which authorized its execution has not been complied with, is invalid, see, also, Redfield v. Parks, 132 U. S. 239, 250, 10 Sup. Ct. 83, 33 L. Ed. 327; Swope v. Prior, 58 Iowa, 412, 10 N. W. 788; Bowman v. Wittig, 39 Ill. 416, 428; Black on Tax Titles, § 208.

We are of opinion that the chancery court did not err in holding that the tax deed of the appellant was invalid as to the claim asserted by the city of Richmond against the lot in question, and in directing it to be subjected to the payment of the taxes ascertained to be due the city.

There being no error in the decrees appealed from to the prejudice of the appellant, they must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. GOODWIN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 18, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1024*)—WRIT OF ERROR—PETITION OF COMMONWEALTH.

Const. art. 6, § 88 (Code 1904, p. cccxx), and Code 1887, § 4052 (Code 1904, p. 2134), giving the Supreme Court of Appeals jurisdiction to grant a writ of error on petition by the commonwealth in a case for violating a law relating to the state revenue, applies to a prosecution for unlawfully selling malt liquor, where the issue was whether accused could sell malt beverage under the revenue law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1024.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 134*)—"MALT BEVERAGES"—SALE—"MALT LIQUOR."

Byrd Law (Acts 1908, pp. 275-287, c. 189) § 23½, defines "malt beverage" a nonintoxicating liquor, and requires the manufacturer to pay a special license tax and give a bond. Section 28 provides that the act shall not affect municipal charter provisions respecting licenses. Manassas Charter (Acts 1901-2, p. 216, c. 215; Acts 1906, p. 204, c. 128) § 14, requires the payment of license to sell "malt liquors." Held, on a prosecution for unlawfully selling malt liquor, that "malt beverage" is a malt liquor within the charter provision, and that compliance with the Byrd law does not avoid necessity for complying with the charter provision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4314-4315.]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 134*)—"MALT LIQUORS."

"Malt liquors" include nonintoxicating, as well as intoxicating, liquors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 142-144; Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

Error to Circuit Court, Prince William County.

Wade Goodwin was acquitted of unlawfully selling malt liquor by the circuit court on appeal from a conviction before a justice, and the Commonwealth brings error. Reversed.

Robt. A. Hutchison, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth. S. G. Brent and Julien Gunn, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The defendant in error, Wade Goodwin, was convicted by a justice of the peace of Prince William county of unlawfully selling "malt liquor," or a mixture thereof, in the town of Manassas.

Upon appeal to the circuit court of that county, the whole matter of law and fact being by agreement submitted to the court, there was a judgment in favor of the accused. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded on the petition of the commonwealth.

Upon the calling of the cause, the defendant moved the court to dismiss the writ of error as improvidently awarded upon the ground that this is a prosecution for the violation of the "local option" law of the state, and not for a violation of the law relating to state revenue.

Whether or not a prosecution for the violation of the local option law where there is no pretense that the sale for which the accused is prosecuted was made under a license authorizing it need not be considered in this case. The defense of the accused in the circuit court, as appears from the facts agreed, was that he had the right to make the sale of "malt beverage," the article sold by him, and at the place where it was sold, under the revenue laws of the state. This is denied by the commonwealth.

The question involved in the case would seem, therefore, to come clearly within the provisions of section 88, art. 6, Const. (Code 1904, p. ccxxx), and section 4052 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 2134), which confer jurisdiction upon this court to grant a writ of error upon the petition of the commonwealth in a case for the "violation of a law relating to state revenue."

By section 23½, c. 189, p. 285, Acts 1908 (Acts 1908, pp. 275-287, c. 189, known as the "Byrd Law"), it is provided:

"That 'malt beverage' within the meaning of this section shall be construed to be the product of a brewing plant, or brewery, and shall, as to its composition, comply with the standards now, or as may hereafter be prescribed by the pure food commissioner of the United States, but shall be nonintoxicating and in no event contain in excess of two and one-quarter per cent. in volume of alcohol.

"No person, firm, or corporation shall manufacture 'malt beverage,' as herein defined, except subject to the provisions of this act.

"'Malt beverage' shall be manufactured only by some person, firm or corporation having a manufacturer's malt liquor license, and who shall, before manufacturing the same, pay an additional special license tax of two hundred and fifty dollars ($250.00) per year, and execute a bond in the penalty of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) before and with security (either personal or corporate), approved by the judge of the circuit or corporation court of the county or city in which such manufacturing is proposed to be done; the condition of said bond shall be to faithfully comply with the provisions of this act.

"'Malt beverage' shall be sold by the manufacturer direct to the consumer (not to be drunk where sold) and in quantities of not less than one half dozen bottles, nor more than four dozen bottles at any one time, and shall not be sold or offered for sale by any other person, firm or corporation. 'Malt beverage' shall be sold only in bottles in which shall be blown, in letters at least one half inch in height, the name and address of the manufacturer and the words 'malt beverage.' No person, firm or corporation shall place in such bottles and sell or otherwise transfer any liquid containing alcohol in excess of two and one quarter per cent. in volume.

"Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than five hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or, in the discretion of the jury, confined in jail for not less than three months nor more than twelve months for each offense."

By the facts agreed, it appears that the "malt beverage" sold by the defendant answered the description of that article as defined by that section, was sold directly to the consumer, not to be drunk where sold, in quantities of six bottles, with the name and address of the Robert Portner Brewing Company of Alexandria, the manufacturer, blown into each bottle one-half inch in height; that the defendant was acting as the agent of said brewing company in the town of Manassas, which had a license as a manufacturer of malt liquors and had paid the additional special tax and had given the bond required in order to entitle it to manufacture and sell "malt beverage," and, except a state tax of $5 and a town tax of $2.50 for a merchant's license, neither the said brewery nor the defendant had paid any license in the said town or county.

Upon the facts agreed, the guilt or innocence of the accused depends upon the question whether a compliance with all the provisions of section 23½ of the said act in all respects authorizes the brewing company to sell "malt beverage" in the town of Manassas through an agent located and doing business in that town.

Several grounds are relied on by the Attorney General to sustain his contention that the brewing company had no such right; but, in the view we take of the case, it is only necessary to consider one of them.

By section 14 of the charter of Manassas (Acts 1901-02, p. 216, c. 215; Acts 1906, p. 204, c. 128), it is provided that "no license shall be granted to any person, club or corporation to sell ardent spirits, malt liquors or any mixture thereof, or any bitters containing alcohol, either by wholesale or by retail, or to be drunk at the place where sold, within the corporate limits of said town, unless the applicant shall first produce before the court authorized to grant such license the written consent of the town council that the applicant is a corporation under the laws of some state of the United States, or that the person is sober, discreet and of good moral character, and that the place is suitable and convenient, and such certificate shall further show that the said applicant has paid into the town treasury a sum not less than seventy-five dollars nor more than the sum of three hundred dollars, as shall be prescribed by the said council.

By section 28, c. 189, p. 287, Acts 1908, it is provided that nothing in this act shall be construed as changing the provisions of the charter of any town or city touching the granting of licenses.

If "malt beverage" be a malt liquor or a mixture thereof, then under the provisions of the charter of the town of Manassas no license could be granted for its sale therein except with the consent of the town council and a compliance with the other provisions of the charter. That there was no such compliance is clear from the facts agreed. While "malt beverage," as defined by section 23½ of the Byrd law is not intoxicating, it is a malt liquor. It seems to be well settled that the general term "malt liquors" includes both intoxicating and nonintoxicating malt liquors.

Black, in his article on Intoxicating Liquors in 23 Cyc. 41, 60, says that, "if the statute specifically forbids the unlicensed sale of malt liquors, the question of the intoxicating properties of the liquor sold is immaterial. It is only necessary to determine whether it was a malt liquor." Eaves v. State, 113 Ga. 749, 39 S. E. 318, 321.

See, also, the following cases, where it was held that if the law prohibits or regulates the sale of "cider" by name, without any qualifying word, it applies to all cider, without regard to its intoxicating qualities. Commonwealth v. Dean, 14 Gray (Mass.) 99; State v. Roach, 75 Me. 123; State v. Spalding, 61 Vt. 505, 17 Atl. 844.

In State v. Kauffman, 68 Ohio St. 635, 67 N. E. 1062, it was held that a malt beverage which contained less than 2¼ per cent. alcohol, and which was not intoxicating, was embraced within the meaning of an act which related to trafficking in spirituous, vinous, malt, and intoxicating liquors. See U. S. v. Ducournau (C. C.) 54 Fed. 138, 139; U. S. v. Cohn, 2 Ind. T. 475, 52 S. W. 38.

"Malt beverage" being a malt liquor within the meaning of the charter of the town of Manassas forbidding its sale without a license acquired in the manner prescribed by the charter, the accused had no right to sell it in that town, even if the effect of section 30 of the Byrd law (Laws 1908, c. 168, p. 287), as contended by the counsel of the defendant, were to repeal section 587 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 291), so far as it forbids the sale of "malt beverage" in non-license territory.

It is insisted by the defendant that section 23½ of the act known as the "Byrd law" is unconstitutional. If it were, the result in this case would be the same, since he is not convicted of the violation of any of its provisions.

The judgment of the circuit court must therefore be reversed, and this court will enter such judgment as the circuit court ought to have entered.

Reversed.

OLIVER REFINING CO. v. PORTSMOUTH COTTON OIL REFINING CORPORATION.

PORTSMOUTH COTTON OIL REFINING CORPORATION v. OLIVER REFINING CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 24, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 216*)—DEMURRER—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

In an action on a written agreement, where one count is the common count in assumpsit and the other counts are based on the agreement in writing, the question whether the agreement upon which the other counts were based could be introduced to sustain a recovery upon the common counts could not be determined upon a demurrer to those counts, but could only be determined on the trial when the evidence was offered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 216.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 204*)—GENERAL DEMURRER.

Where a count contains several breaches, any one of which is well assigned, a general demurrer to the count should be overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 487; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 183*)—RIGHTS OF ACTION BY PRINCIPAL OR AGENT—CONTRACTS OF AGENT.

Where an agent contracts by deed in his own name, his principal cannot sue upon it. If an agent makes a contract not under seal in his own name for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue upon it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 691-700; Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 189*)—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

A declaration, in an action on a contract, which states that in making the contract one of the parties named therein acted for plaintiff, that the contract was afterwards approved by the stockholders of the defendant company as a contract with plaintiff, that plaintiff furnished the whole consideration to the defendant provided for by the contract, and that defendant company conveyed and transferred all the property mentioned in the contract to plaintiff, sufficiently avers that the party who made the contract acted as the agent of plaintiff.

5. CONTRACTS (§ 164*)—CONSTRUCTING INSTRUMENTS TOGETHER.

Where two papers are executed at the same time or contemporaneously between the same parties in reference to the same subject-matter, they must be regarded as parts of one transaction and receive the same construction as if the several provisions were in one and the same instrument.

6. CONTRACTS (§ 246*)—MODIFICATION—OPERATION AND EFFECT.

Where parties to a contract, as preliminary to a conveyance of property under the contract, come together and make an agreement stipulating for the future adjustment of certain specific matters of difference between them, it will be assumed that they intended that, with the exceptions named, the provisions of the contract should in all other respects be treated as satisfied by the conveyance made, especially where the contemporaneous agreement in part relates to defects in property conveyed, which the original agreement provided should be in good condition when turned over, which turning over was done when the deed was made and the contemporaneous agreement entered into.

7. DEEDS (§ 94*)—CONSTRUCTION AND OPERATION—MERGER OF PREVIOUS AGREEMENTS.

Where a deed has been accepted as a performance of an executory contract to convey real estate, the rights of the parties rest thereafter solely in the deed, although the deed varies from the one provided for in the contract, and the law remits the grantee to his covenants in his deed, if there has been no fraud or mistake.

8. EVIDENCE (§ 442*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

An agreement for the transfer of certain property, including a manufacturing plant, specified that the plant was to be in good working condition when turned over, and that it was subject to the inspection of the party purchasing it as to its condition and working order before the acceptance of the deed. In an action by the purchaser for damages because the plant was not in working order, defendants offered in evidence an agreement between the parties, entered into at the time the deed was made, which provided that certain matters, including some that were specified as a cause of action by plaintiff, were reserved for future adjustment. Held, that the agreement was admissible in evidence.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the Portsmouth Cotton Oil Refining Corporation against the Oliver Refining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, from which each party brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Williams & Tunstall and C. J. Collins, for plaintiff. Thos. H. Willcox and J. W. Willcox, for defendant.

BUCHANAN, J. An action of assumpsit was brought by the Portsmouth Cotton Oil Refining Corporation against the Oliver Refining Company. There was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, a motion to set it aside, which was sustained upon the ground that the damages were excessive, and the trial court ordered that the verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted, unless the plaintiff would remit all of its recovery except a named sum. The plaintiff remitted under protest, and a judgment was rendered for the reduced amount. To that judgment each party applied for and obtained a writ of error.

There was a demurrer to the declaration and to each count thereof, which was overruled.

The fourth was the common count in assumpsit. The other three counts were based upon the following agreement in writing:

"This agreement made and entered into this 13th day of July, 1906, by and between Oliver Refining Company (a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Virginia), party of the first part, and Aspegren & Co., a co-partnership consisting of Adolph Aspegren and John Aspegren, having their office in the Produce Exchange in the city of New York, witnesseth:

"The said second party has offered and does offer to the stockholders, directors and officers of the first party to purchase at and for the price of $125,000.00 the property described as follows: All the buildings of the cooperage and refinery and the boiler house and all the machinery and fixtures therein contained, storage tanks, and thirty-one tank cars, railroad track and oil lands contained by a straight line running parallel to outside of railroad track of the refinery from the Norfolk & Portsmouth Belt Line Railroad, Paradise Creek, containing about seven acres of land, upon which said buildings and tracks are located, if more or less than seven acres are contained in said tract at the rate of five hundred dollars per acre shall be added to or deducted from said purchase price.

"The said first party also agrees to sell, and said second party agrees to buy at its present market value, all the stock in trade, consisting of barrels, caustic soda, fuller's earth and other material contained in said building and appertaining to said business and to pay therefor in cash.

"Said first party will cause a survey to be made of the lands included in this offer and will attach the same to this instrument, when presented to its stockholders, at a meeting called for the purpose of passing upon and ratifying this proposition.

"Payment of said sum of $125,000.00, the purchase price of said property in addition to said stock in trade, shall be made as follows: $25,000.00 thereof in cash upon the delivery of the deed by the first party, which delivery shall be made at the office of the said second party above stated; said deed to be made to Portsmouth Cotton Oil Refining Corporation, which last-named concern has been by said second party incorporated for the purpose of taking the title and issuing the securities hereinafter mentioned. Said second party agrees to take all proper and necessary steps to authorize the making, execution and delivery of a mortgage of $100,000.00 upon all of the property so transferred to it by the first party and to cause and procure the issue of $100,000.00 six per cent. bonds with coupons attached conditioned for the payment of said interest semiannually at the office of the trustee to whom such mortgage shall be made. Said mortgage and bonds to be a first lien upon all of the property of said corporation then owned by it and all improvements to or additions thereon or thereto, and the principal of said bond shall be payable in gold of standard weight and fineness in ten years from the date of such mortgage. Said bonds to be in denominations as follows: 200 bonds of $500 each.

"Said mortgage to contain provisions for the insurance and preservation of the property and all the ordinary and usual conditions attending like mortgages for securing a bond issue and shall be submitted for the approval of said first party before execution. The trustee therein shall be selected by said first party subject to the approval of said second party.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

"It is understood that a meeting of the stockholders of the said first party has been called at the office of the company in Portsmouth, Va., for Friday, July 20, 1906, for the purpose of considering this agreement and proposition with a view to ratifying the same and authorizing the proper officers of the company to execute the necessary deeds and transfers.

"The deed of said property when executed and delivered is to be free and clear of all incumbrance and the plant to be subject to the inspection of said second party as to its condition and working order before the acceptance by them of the deed.

"The stock in trade so to be transferred shall be inventoried by said first party (and) shall be paid for at the fair market value thereof for the purposes of this agreement. It is understood that the aggregate of such stock in trade is of the value of about $5,000.00. Plant to be in good working condition when turned over.

"It is agreed, however, that the deed to the Portsmouth Corporation shall be subject to the perpetual right to use the railroad track's scales and use of tracks leading to the tracks of the crushing plant to the party of the first part."

The object of the action was to recover damages for the alleged breach of the provision in the contract of sale that "the plant should be in good working condition when turned over" to the plaintiff.

The first error assigned by the Oliver Refining Company in its petition for a writ of error is to the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration.

The objection made to the common counts is without merit. They are in the usual form. Whether or not the agreement upon which the other counts are based could be introduced to sustain a recovery upon the common counts was a question to be determined upon the trial when the evidence was offered, and not upon a demurrer to those counts.

The objection made to the first and second counts that upon a proper construction of the agreement sued on there could be no recovery of damages against the defendant on account of losses resulting from the necessity of purchasing new presses, since the parties in entering into the agreement could not have contemplated any damage on that account, is equally without merit. Conceding for the purposes of the demurrer that this were true, there were other grounds of damage alleged, which, if sustained by proof, would have entitled the plaintiff to recover. The demurrer to each count is a general demurrer. It goes to the whole of each count, and an objection which, if sustained, would not vitiate the whole count, cannot be thus made. The assignment of a special cause as ground of demurrer does not narrow the scope of the demurrer. Where a count contains several breaches, any one of which is well assigned, this is sufficient to maintain the action, and a general demurrer to the count should be overruled. See Henderson v. Stringer, 6 Grat. 130; Wright v. Michle, 6 Grat. 354.

The other grounds of demurrer are that the agreement on its face shows that the plaintiff is not a party to it, that the provisions therein contained were not made for its sole benefit, and that there is no privity between it and the defendant. The cases of Newberry v. Newberry, 95 Va. 119, 27 S. E. 899, and McIlvaine v. Big Stony Lumber Co., 105 Va. 613, 54 S. E. 473, are relied on to sustain this ground of demurrer.

The instrument sued on in each of those cases was under seal, and the rigid rule of the common law applied except so far as modified by statute. What is said in those cases must therefore be read and considered in connection with their facts. If the agreement sued on in this case had been under seal, it may be that under the principles announced in those cases the plaintiff could not maintain an action upon it, because not made solely for its benefit, even though Aspegren & Co. were acting as its agents in the transaction, for it seems to be well settled at common law that, where an agent is contracted with by deed in his own name, his principal cannot sue upon it. See Dacey on Parties, side page 134, and cases cited; Story on Agency, § 422; 3 Rob. Pr. (New Ed.) 34-37. But it is a well-established rule of law that, where a contract not under seal is made by an agent in his own name for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue upon it. Nat. Bank v. Nolting, 94 Va. 263, 26 S. E. 826; 3 Rob. Pr. (New Ed.) 34; Dacey on Parties, side pages 138, 139; Mechem on Agency, § 769.

It is averred in the first count in the declaration that in making the contract sued on Aspegren & Co. were acting for the plaintiff, that the contract was afterwards approved by the stockholders of the defendant company as a contract with the plaintiff, that it (the plaintiff) furnished the whole consideration to the defendant provided for by the contract, and that the defendant conveyed and transferred all the property mentioned in it to the plaintiff. If these averments are true, Aspegren & Co., in making the agreement sued on, were the agents of the plaintiff company, and it had the right to bring this action.

The averments of the second and third counts, if true, show that the plaintiff is the assignee or beneficial owner of the contract sued on in each of those counts, and under section 2860 of the Code of 1887 (Code 1904, p. 1500), it can maintain an action thereon in its own name.

We are of opinion therefore that the demurrer to the declaration and to each count thereof was properly overruled.

The next assignment of error which we will consider is the action of the court in refusing to permit the defendant to introduce in evidence an agreement between the plaintiff, the defendant, and Aspegren & Co. at the time the deed provided for by the agreement sued on was executed.

The rejected agreement commences as follows: "Memorandum. In the matter of the purchase of certain land and personal property by Portsmouth Cotton Oil Refining Corporation from the Oliver Refining Company, The parties to this agreement being about to pass the deeds relating to this property, and some unsettled matters not having been provided for, it is understood and agreed that those matters (naming them) are to be hereafter adjusted."

Two of the unsettled matters referred to in that agreement, and which were reserved for future adjustment, were the repairs of certain tank cars and of the floor of the cooerage building. The tank cars and cooerage building are specifically mentioned in the agreement of sale and are parts of the "plant" which that agreement provided should be conveyed to the plaintiff free of all incumbrance and in good working condition when turned over, and was to be subject to the plaintiff's inspection as to its condition and working order before the acceptance of the deed.

Where two papers are executed at the same time or contemporaneously between the same parties, in reference to the same subject-matter, they must be regarded as parts of one transaction and receive the same construction as if their several provisions were in one and the same instrument. See Anderson v. Harvey, 10 Grat. 386; Torrence v. Shedd, 112 Ill. 466, 467; Johnson v. Moore, 28 Mich. 3; and cases cited in notes to 13 Cyc. 614.

The plaintiff, having the right under its contract of purchase to inspect the plant as to its condition and working order before the acceptance of the deed, even if it were not its duty to do so, was under no obligation to accept the deed unless the plant was at that time in good working condition. It is true that the plaintiff insists that it could not ascertain whether or not the plant was in good working order until after it was conveyed and turned over to it. This contention, however, seems to contradict the language of the agreement of sale, which expressly provides for an inspection for that purpose before the acceptance of the deed.

If, when the deed was executed and delivered and the contemporaneous agreement entered into, the plaintiff did not intend to receive the plant as in good condition in all respects, except as to tank cars and the cooerage floor, the agreement ought and naturally would have contained some provision on that subject. When to complete the performance of a contract, and as preliminary to a conveyance of the property, the parties come together and make an agreement stipulating for the future adjustment of certain specific matters of difference between them, the law assumes that they intended that, with the exception of things named, the provisions of the contract should, in all other respects, be treated as satisfied by the conveyance made, especially where the contemporaneous agreement in part relates to defects in the property conveyed which the original agreement of sale provided should be in good condition when turned over, which turning over it is conceded was done when the deed of conveyance was made and the contemporaneous agreement entered into. Disbrow v. Harris, 122 N. Y. 362, 25 N. E. 356.

The general rule is, and no rule is better settled than, that where a deed has been executed and accepted as a performance of an executory contract to convey real estate, the rights of the parties rest thereafter solely in the deed. This is true although the deed thus accepted varies from that provided for in the contract, and the law remits the grantee to his covenants in his deed, if there is no ingredient of fraud or mistake in the case. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 850a; Shenandoah V. R. Co. v. Dunlop, 86 Va. 346, 10 S. E. 239; Trout v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 107 Va. 576, 59 S. E. 394; note to Clifton v. Jackson, 16 Am. St. Rep. 621.

Whether the deed of conveyance executed in this case and accepted by the plaintiff, in the absence of the contemporaneous agreement, would have come within the general rule and rendered the executory contract sued on functus officio by merger, and have furnished the only evidence of the rights of the parties, as is argued by counsel for the defendant, need not be considered, as that is not this case.

The action of the court in refusing to admit the contemporaneous agreement in evidence was error for which its judgment must be reversed.

The defendant assigns other errors, but as they are such as are not likely to arise upon another trial or depend upon the evidence in the case, which will be different, it is unnecessary to consider them.

It follows from what has been said in disposing of the defendant's assignments of error that the plaintiff was not prejudiced by the action of the court in requiring it to remit a part of its recovery, and that its assignment of error is without merit.

The judgment must be reversed, the verdict set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed.

HERNDON et al. v. COLQUITT COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

1. INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION PROPERLY REFUSED.

Regardless of the technical questions raised as to the form of the answer or its verification, under the evidence introduced on the hearing of the application for interlocutory injunction, there was no error in refusing it.

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 122*)—PUBLIC ROAD REGISTER LAW—RECOMMENDATION OF GRAND JURY.

Sections 516-519 of the Political Code of 1895, on the subject of a public road register, which were codified from the act approved October 16, 1891 (Acts 1890-91, p. 134), do not become operative in any county until the grand jury of that county shall so recommend.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

3. HIGHWAYS (§ 122*) — ALTERNATIVE ROAD LAW—RECOMMENDATION OF GRAND JURY.

What is known as the "alternative road law," embodied in sections 573-583 of the Political Code of 1895, which were codified from the act of October 21, 1891 (Acts 1890-91, p. 135), does not go into effect in any county until it is recommended by the grand jury thereof at a term of court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. HIGHWAYS (§ 122*)—PUBLIC ROAD REGISTER LAW—ALTERNATIVE ROAD LAW—ADOPTION.

The "public road register law" and the "alternative road law" are two separate laws, enacted on different dates, although by the same Legislature. The adoption of the alternative road law by recommendation of the grand jury in a particular county does not ipso facto put in force in that county the public road register law; and therefore the adoption of the alternative road law does not alone render it unlawful to work the roads of the county, unless they are shown on a public road register, as provided by section 516 of the Political Code of 1895.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

5. HIGHWAYS (§ 151*)—WORK ON ROAD BY RESIDENTS OF COUNTY.

Although citizens and residents of a portion of a county may contend that the county authorities have not had the public roads of that section worked with due diligence and care, and that such roads have fallen into bad condition, this does not authorize them to work certain portions of roads of their own selection and not under the supervision of the county authorities, and thereupon, when called upon by the duly constituted authorities to do road work or pay the commutation tax, to refuse to do so on the ground that they have already done an amount of work which was equivalent to that which the law requires them to do when duly summoned.

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§§ 138, 148*)—POWERS (§ 81*)—VALIDITY OF EXECUTION.

A power given in a will to the executor to sell any such portion of the lands devised as may become necessary by reason of some cause unforeseen to the testator, and then for the executor to sell such portion only with the consent of named devisees, was not validly executed by a parol agreement to sell, entered into, when no necessity for a sale had arisen, between the executor and one desiring to purchase, consented to and concurred in by such devisees, and the execution by such devisees to such person, at the instance and direction of the executor and for the purpose of carrying out such parol agreement, of an ordinary warranty deed, without any reference whatever to the power; the grantee in the deed paying a valuable consideration to the grantors, and all the parties understanding and believing at the time such transaction to be an effectual execution of the power in accordance with the terms of the will.

(a) Where such purchaser had notice, at the time of the transaction above stated, of the limitations upon the executor's power to sell, he took, under the deed executed by such devisees to him, only such estate in the land as the devisees had.

(b) While generally a court of equity will aid the defective execution of a power when the defect relates to matter of form in the execution, it will not render its aid where the exercise of the power is invalid for the reason that the donee at the time was not authorized to execute it.

2. WILLS (§ 545*)—CONSTRUCTION—ESTATES CREATED.

A will which devised lands to Lina and Amanda for the life of Lina, with remainder to Amanda, but, if they should both die without leaving child or grandchild, then all property not disposed of by the executor, in accordance with the power referred to in the preceding headnote, should revert to such persons as would be the testator's heirs at law at his death had he made no will, gave a joint life estate to Lina and Amanda during the life of Lina, and a defeasible vested remainder to Amanda, subject to be divested upon her dying without child or grandchild during the life of Lina; and, where Amanda's remainder has been so divested, the land, at the death of Lina, without child or grandchild, will go to such executory devisees.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Lumpkin County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Equitable petition by William B. Tate against Barilla D. Satterfield and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

William B. Tate filed an equitable petition in the superior court of Lumpkin county against Barilla D. Satterfield of that county and 74 other persons, some of whom resided in Lumpkin county, others elsewhere in this state, and still others beyond the limits of the state. The substance of the petition, so far as now material, was: Stephen Griffith, late of Pickens county, Ga., died November 11, 1873, testate, seised and possessed of lots of land 109 and 110 in the Fourth district and Second section of that county. His will was duly probated, and William Tate, the named executor, qualified thereunder.

The following are the material parts thereof:

"Item 3d. I give and bequeath and devise to Lina and my daughter, Amanda Griffith, persons of color, who were formerly my faithful domestic servants, lots of land number one hundred and nine (109), one hundred and ten (110), and the east half of one hundred and twelve (112), all of said lots of land situate, lying and being in the fourth (4th) district and second (2nd) section of said Pickens county, each lot containing one hundred and sixty acres, more or less, known as my home place, together with all the appurtenances belonging to the same, and also all of my personal property. * * *

"Item 4th. I desire and direct my executor, * * * to hold the lands named in item three until the death of Lina, unless from some unseen cause to me it should become necessary to sell some portion of it, in which event he is to sell only such portion of it as Lina and Amanda may consent to, and at her, Lina's, death the land together with all the property not otherwise disposed of, of every description, during Lina's lifetime, named in said third item, to go to and vest in my daughter, Amanda Griffith, daughter of Lina. But I desire and direct that my executor not to rent or control the lands, nor other property given in the above items, only to keep and sell such as may be necessary by and with the advice of Amanda and Lina. It being my desire and wish that the lands be a home for Amanda and Lina to control, rent, and enjoy the profits on together with all other property during Lina's lifetime, and at her death I direct my executor to turn over the land, together with all other property, to my said daughter, Amanda unreservedly, to do as she may think proper with."

"Item 6th. I desire and direct that all the property given in this will to my said daughter, Amanda Griffith, is given to her free from contracts, control, and sale of any husband that she marries, but is to be her sole and separate property; and if Lina and Amanda both die leaving no child or children nor grandchildren, then in that event the property not disposed of in their lifetime reverts to those who now by law would be entitled to the same if I had made no will.

"Item 7th. I desire and direct that my executor, * * * not to have any appraisal of my estate nor to make annual returns to the ordinary, * * * and that he make all sales by the advice and consent of Lina and Amanda, without order of the ordinary and at private sale, that may become necessary and after paying expenses, etc., to pay over the proceeds to Lina and Amanda, and to the other if one be dead. * * *"

On May 27, 1887, Lina and Amanda conveyed lots 109 and 110 to the petitioner by an ordinary warranty deed, making no reference therein to the will of Stephen Griffith, to the executor thereof, or to the power given by it to the executor to sell the land. Since the date of such deed petitioner has been in the open, notorious, continuous, and peaceable possession of such lots of land under claim of right. The executor was fully cognizant of and consented to the sale of the lands conveyed to petitioner by said deed, and petitioner purchased said lands from the executor, who acted in the premises on the authority of and by and with the consent and advice of said Lina and Amanda; said sale being made in pursuance of and in conformity with the provisions of said will. Lina and Amanda, as the lawful owners of said lands, had a right in and of themselves to convey the same, and said deed conveyed a full title to your petitioner; but the defendants named claimed to own an interest in said lands by virtue of the sixth item of the will. Lina Griffith had no child living then, save Amanda, and has had no children since, and possibility of further issue of the said Lina is extinct, she being now more than 80 years old, and since the execution of the deed to petitioner Amanda had died without issue; and the said sixth item of the will could have application only to property devised to Amanda and Lina which was not disposed of by them in manner and form hereinbefore stated. The claim of defendants operates as a cloud upon the title of petitioner, and,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

while without foundation, operates to his prejudice and embarrassment in the perfect ownership of the land. The prayers were that the defendants be required to set up in the proceeding their claim to the land in question. If they have any, that a decree be granted forever quieting and establishing the title of petitioner to such lands, and declaring him to be the owner thereof in fee simple, for injunction, general relief, and process. Some of the defendants failed to appear. The others demurred to the petition, and filed answers. Among the grounds of demurrer were that the petition showed no title to the fee of the land in the petitioner, and that no equitable right against the defendants was set forth. There was also a special ground of demurrer, in response to which the plaintiff amended as follows: The purchase of said lands was by a parol agreement with the executor consented to and concurred in by Lina and Amanda Griffith, and the deed from Lina and Amanda was executed at the instance and direction of the executor in fulfillment of the parol purchase. The agreement was for the purchase of the fee-simple title, and the deed was intended to convey the same, and was believed by all the parties to be effectual so to do under the provisions of said will. Petitioner is in possession of the land, and can bring no action at law to assert and quiet his title. The claims of defendants under the will may be used vexatiously and injuriously against him, impairing the marketability of his title, and he has reason to apprehend that some of the evidence upon which he relies to impeach the claims of defendants, and uphold his own title, may be impaired and lost by lapse of time. He paid the purchase money named in said deed, and the same went to the uses directed in the will; and, if his deed is not in form a proper execution of the power of disposition given in the will, he is at least invested with a perfect equity in the land (possession having been at once given him by reason of said purchase and payment). The executor, William Tate, is dead. After purchasing and paying for the land, petitioner was put in possession of it by the executor and by Lina and Amanda Griffith; and his possession and control has been absolute. The executor lived 10 years after the making of the sale, without even questioning the right and title of plaintiff in the property; and Lina, who is still in life, and Amanda, who died on July 11, 1892, aged 58 years, also allowed him to remain in absolute, adverse, and peaceable possession. The court overruled all the demurrers, and, after hearing the evidence submitted (the defendants offering no evidence), directed a verdict in favor of the petitioner against all the defendants, and entered thereon a decree that title to the two lots of land is vested in fee simple in the petitioner, and that all claims of the defendants thereto be declared to be void and the same be removed as a cloud upon petitioner's title, and the defendants be perpetually enjoined from asserting any claim to the lands. Defendants excepted.

R. H. Baker, O. J. Lilly, and H. H. Perry, for plaintiffs in error. H. H. Dean, F. C. Tate, S. H. Sibley, and W. A. Charters, for defendant in error.

FISH, C. J. In the view we take of this case, it is necessary to adjudicate only a few of the questions raised in the record. In our opinion the demurrer should have been sustained. The first point we will consider is whether, under the allegations of the petition, there was a valid execution of the power of sale conferred by the will on the executor. As to this question, some pertinent rules of law may be stated. The intent of the testator as the donor of a power governs. Mackey v. Moore, Dudley, 94, 96; Berrien v. Thomas, 65 Ga. 61; City Council of Augusta v. Radcliffe, 66 Ga. 469, 474; Taylor v. Atkins, 1 Burr. 60, 121; Thorley v. Thorley, 10 East, 442, 443; Daly v. James, 8 Wheat. 535, 536, 5 L. Ed. 670; 4 Kent's Com. (12th Ed.) 345. Consequently a person claiming title under the execution of a power takes under the authority of that power (Id.; Bradish v. Gibbs, 3 Johns. Ch. [N. Y.] m. p. 550; Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 Id. 48); for an act done under a power must have its validity from the grantor of the power, and not from the person that executes it (Id.; Middleton v. Crofts, 2 Atk. 662).

In Sears v. Livermore, 17 Iowa, 297, 85 Am. Dec. 564, the same principles are thus stated: "The appellant takes under the execution of a power, and, of course, under its authority, just as if the power and the instrument executing it had been incorporated in the same deed. Her title rests upon the act creating the power, and takes effect as if created by the original deed. Marlborough v. Godolphin, 2 Ves. 78; Cook v. Duckenfield, 2 Atk. 562; Doolittle v. Lewis, 7 Johns. Ch. [N. Y.] 45, 11 Am. Dec. 389. The authority to sell being derived from the power, it follows that the purchaser is bound to look for and to understand the extent of the power, or, as elsewhere expressed, 'taking under the power, he is bound to see that its terms are complied with.' Ormsby v. Tarascon, 3 Litt. 410. And, of course, in this, as in all other contracts, the object and design of the parties should be kept strictly in view in ascertaining the nature and extent of the power." In Stevens v. Winship, 1 Pick. (Mass.) 318, 11 Am. Dec. 178, it was held: "Where a testator devised certain land to his wife for life, and gave her power, in case of need, to sell all his estate, real and personal, for her comfortable support, * * * she took only a life estate with a power of sale depending on a contingency. Those who claim under a contingent power of sale in a will must show that the power was well executed, and that the contingency happened; and it is for the jury to decide whether it happened or not." In Griswold v. Perry, 7 Lana. (N. Y.) 98, it was held: "A purchaser of land from a trustee with power to convey only on the happening of an event, which is a condition precedent, must ascertain at his peril whether the condition has been fulfilled." In Ervine's Appeal, 16 Pa. 256, 55 Am. Dec. 499, it was held: "Power to sell, either in a will or deed, to be exercised on the happening of a particular event, cannot be lawfully exercised until that event happens." On same line, see Sweigart v. Frey, 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 299; Hall v. McLaughlin, 2 Bradf. Sur. (N. Y.) 107; Loomis v. McClintock, 10 Watts. (Pa.) 274; South Carolina R. Co. v. Toomer, 9 Rich. Eq. (S. C.) 270; Carlyon v. Truscott, 20 L. R. (Eq. Cas.) 348. "Every purchaser of realty for value takes the risk of his vendor being clothed with power to sell at the time of the sale, and by the mode of sale adopted." Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 289, 5 S. E. 38, 11 Am. St. Rep. 420. In the case at bar it appears that item 4 of the testator's will directs the executor to hold the lands described in item 3 during the life of Lina Griffith, but with the exclusive possession and control thereof in Lina and Amanda as a home for them, they to rent the land and receive and enjoy the profits thereof, and that the executor should sell only such portion of said lands as might become necessary for some cause unforeseen to the testator upon the consent of Lina and Amanda. The power was thus given to the executor alone, and to be exercised by him only on the happening of a particular event—that is, some unforeseen cause rendering a sale necessary—and then to sell only such portion of the land as should be necessary upon the consent of Lina and Amanda. There was no allegation or suggestion in the petition that anything had occurred rendering the sale of the land, or any portion thereof, necessary. Indeed, it may be fairly inferred from the petition and its exhibits that no necessity for a sale had arisen. It was made about 14 years after the testator's death, and presumably there were no debts of the testator then existing to be paid. Besides, it appears that the purchase money was paid, not to the executor, but to Lina and Amanda. And as Lina had no child except Amanda, and the latter had no children, it would be reasonable to presume, considering the amount of other property devised and bequeathed to them in the will, and their station in life and probable needs, they being negroes, that the sale of the two lots of land in question, 320 acres, all at one time, was not necessary for their support and maintenance. But, be this as it may, no necessity for a sale appears from the petition. In the present case we need not go to the full extent of some of the rulings above referred to; for it is apparent from the allegations of the petition that the petitioner had knowledge of the condition upon which the executor was authorized by the will to exercise the power to sell the land. Petitioner alleges that he entered into a parol agreement with the executor as such for the purchase of the land, which agreement was consented to and concurred in by Lina and Amanda, and that the deed made to him by Lina and Amanda was executed at the instance and direction of the executor in fulfillment of such parol purchase, and the deed was intended to convey the fee-simple title to the land, "and was believed by all said parties to be effectual so to do under the provisions of said will." (Our underscoring).

Clearly these allegations are equivalent to acknowledging and affirming that the petitioner, as well as the executor and Lina and Amanda, knew of the provisions of the will, of the particular power of sale therein conferred upon the executor alone, and that petitioner purchased the lands in question in view of this provision of the will. The only agreement to sell entered into by the executor was in parol. Even his request and direction to Lina and Amanda to execute the deed to petitioner was merely verbal. The deed so executed was simply a warranty deed in the usual form, and purported to be a conveyance by Lina and Amanda Griffith of the fee-simple title to the land in question to the petitioner in consideration of $1,250 paid by him to them. There was no reference therein to the executor's power to sell, nor even any reference to the executor or to the will wherein this power was conferred upon him. While it has been held that a court of equity will aid the defective execution of a power, when the defect relates to matter of form in the execution, it has never been ruled, so far as we are informed, that it will render its aid where the execution of a power is not merely defective in form, but invalid by reason of the fact that the contingency upon which the power was to be exercised has never happened. See 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 590; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 1130; Cockerell v. Chalmeley, 1 Russ. & M. 418.

2. What title was devised by the will of Stephen Griffith to Lina and Amanda Griffith, whose deed of bargain and sale is held by the defendant in error? The third and fourth item of the testator's will, which must be read and construed together, gave a joint life estate, for the life of Lina, to Lina and Amanda, with a vested remainder to Amanda at Lina's death. This vested remainder to Amanda is, however, made defeasible by the sixth item of the will, which declares that, if Amanda dies leaving no child or grandchild, the property "not disposed of"—that is, by the executor in the lifetime of Lina in accordance with the power of sale in the will—shall revert to his heirs who would be such by law when he died if he had made no will. All divesting clauses, especially of remainders, are to be construed so as to vest the estate indefeasibly at the earliest possible period of time.

The period of possession or distribution indicated in the will now under construction is the death of Lina. Consequently, if Amanda had survived Lina, either with or without a child or grandchild, her defeasible, vested remainder would then have become indefeasible, and belonged to her, in the words of the testator, "unreservedly to do as she may think proper with." It is therefore clear that the contingency for the divesting of the remainder to Amanda refers to her dying in the lifetime of Lina without leaving a child or grandchild in esse at Lina's death. These legal principles need not be enlarged upon here; for they are thoroughly covered by the opinion in the case of Sumpter v. Carter, 115 Ga. 893, 899, 900, 42 S. E. 824, 60 L. R. A. 274, and the authorities there cited. As the contingency upon which Amanda's remainder was to be divested has happened by her dying, without a child or grandchild, in the lifetime of Lina, and as the latter had no other child than Amanda, and is 80 years of age, without the possibility of having another child, upon her death the fee in the lands now in controversy, in the absence of a valid disposition of the same by the executor under the power of sale, will go to the testator's heirs under the sixth item of his will. The deed of Lina and Amanda, which purports to convey a fee-simple estate to the petitioner, passes only the title which they respectively had under the terms of the will. A purchaser of the entire estate from the life tenant acquires only the interest of such life tenant. Civ. Code 1895, § 3095. And a purchaser of the entire estate from the holder of a defeasible vested remainder takes the title subject to the contingency upon which it becomes divested before the period of possession or distribution. Nothing but the survival of the life tenant by the remainderman or by a child or grandchild of the remainderman, according to the terms in the limitation over, could make the remainder indefeasible or absolute, and give the fee to the grantee of the holder of such remainder. Sumpter v. Carter, 115 Ga. 893, 900, 42 S. E. 824, 60 L. R. A. 274, and cases cited. So that the death of Amanda Griffith without a child or grandchild before the death of Lina, the life tenant, which contingency divested Amanda's defeasible vested remainder, left the petitioner with no other than that of a tenant per autre vie; that is, for the life of Lina.

8. This being the extent of the title held by the petitioner, what force is there in his claim to the title by prescription? Most clearly none. The executor held no greater estate than for the life of Lina, the life tenant, though his investment with the power of sale extends to a sale of the fee, if made in accordance with the terms and conditions of sale authorized by the power. Civ.

Code 1895, §§ 3191, 3171. This power, of course, does not enlarge the estate with which the will clothed him. See Luquire v. Lee, 121 Ga. 624, 628, 629, 49 S. E. 834, where these legal principles are fully stated. It could have made no difference in this case, so far as prescription is concerned, if the executor had held an estate in fee. In no event could he bring an action for possession of the land against the petitioner who holds the deed of the life tenant until after the death of the life tenant. Lamar v. Pearre, 82 Ga. 354, 363, 9 S. E. 1043, 14 Am. St. Rep. 168; Napier v. Anderson, 95 Ga. 618, 628, 23 S. E. 191; Fleming v. Hughes, 99 Ga. 444, 450, 27 S. E. 971. Neither could the heirs of the testator to whom the whole estate reverts upon the death of Lina, the life tenant, and whose right of possession therefore only accrues at that time, commence an action against petitioner for possession of the land until after the death of Lina, the life tenant. It follows that, as the petitioner could not be ousted by these parties during the life of Lina, the life tenant, he, of course, cannot claim title by prescription against them during the same period of time.

What has been said above as to the demurrer controls the case as to the verdict directed, and shows that the direction of a verdict in favor of the petitioner against the defendants was erroneous, and should be set aside.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WILLIAMS v. GIDDENS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*) — ADJUDICATION BY PUBLIC AUTHORITIES — PROCEEDINGS BY PROCESSIONERS.

The evidence submitted in behalf of the applicants did not require a finding that the processioners had run and marked a line between the adjoining lands of the applicants and the protestant, where no boundary line had been previously located and established; and therefore the court did not err in overruling the motion of the protestant to dismiss the proceedings on the ground that the processioners had run and marked a new line.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 257; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 52*) — ADJUDICATION BY PUBLIC AUTHORITIES — PROCEEDINGS BY PROCESSIONERS.

"Where actual possession has been had, under a claim of right, for more than seven years, such claim shall be respected" by the processioners in cases of disputed land lines, "and the lines so marked as not to interfere with such possession." Civ. Code 1895, § 3248. The provisions of this section being, according to some of the evidence submitted, applicable to the case, the court erred in instructing the jury as follows: "If you believe from the evidence * * * that [the protestant] had the exclusive and continuous possession of this property to the line which he claims, and that it is the true line, for seven years, and had it up until this line was run by the processioners, then the court charges you that the processioners had no right to interfere with that line. That is the simple question for you to determine: Which is [the] true line?" The phrase "and that it is the true line" was erroneous, as it qualified the provisions of such Code section.

McCLAREN v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 11, 1909.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 180*)—DEMUR- RER RAISING DEFENSE.

Where a petition shows that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations, it is subject to demurrer on this ground. Thornton v. Jackson, 129 Ga. 700, 59 S. E. 905; Lang v. Camp Phosphate Co., 113 Ga. 1011, 39 S. E. 474.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 670-675; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—REVIEW— REASONS FOR DECISION.

Where a demurrer to a petition contained general and special grounds, and the court sustained "the demurrer" and dismissed the petition, there is no presumption that the ruling was based on any particular ground of the demurrer; but the judgment will be treated as sustaining the entire demurrer upon all of its grounds, and the judgment will be affirmed if the petition was properly dismissed for any reason set forth in the demurrer. Gunn v. James, 120 Ga. 482, 43 S. E. 148; Huggins v. Southeastern Lime & Cement Co., 121 Ga. 311, 48 S. E. 933; Killough v. Simmons, 125 Ga. 101, 53 S. E. 819.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3410; Dec. Dig. § 854.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 199*)—DEMURRER—SPECIAL DEMURRER—WAIVER.

Where a demurrer containing general and special grounds states therein the grounds of the general demurrer first, there is no merit in the exception that "the grounds of special demurrer could not follow a general demurrer, and that the judgment of the court sustaining these grounds following the general demurrer was and is error, and that the filing of a general demurrer first in the order of demurrers by defendant was and is a waiver of any and all grounds of special demurrer."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 199.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 53*)—ACCOUNT- ING.

The administrator of the deceased owner of a judgment brought suit against the executrix of the administrator of one who, as attorney for such owner, had the judgment in his hands for collection, to recover the amount collected by such executrix on the judgment, making the following allegations: The attorney obtained such judgment for the owner in 1875, and died with such judgment in his hands for collection. The administrator on his estate was appointed in 1883, and kept the judgment in life until his death. The defendant, who was executrix of the administrator of the attorney, undertook the collection of such judgment, and received the proceeds of the collection thereof in September, 1896. The owner was dead when the collection was made. His heirs at law had heard that the debt was discharged in bankruptcy proceedings, but were ignorant of the fact that any property was subject to the judgment, and did not know of the collection until about six months before this suit was brought. Soon after they knew of the collection by the defendant, the plaintiff was appointed administrator of the deceased owner of the judgment, and brought this suit, which was filed on the 19th day of October, 1907, against the defendant as an individual and as executrix to recover the amount she received in the collection of the judgment. Held, that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and the court committed no error in dismissing the petition on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

5. OTHER GROUNDS OF DEMURRER NOT CON- SIDERED.

In view of the ruling above made, it is unnecessary to consider the other grounds of the demurrer.

WILLIAMS v. GARBUTT LUMBER CO.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 253, 259, 261*)— INJURIES TO SERVANT—PETITION—SUFFI- CIENCY.

In a suit by a servant against a master for a personal injury resulting from a log which was being loaded on a tram car slipping and rolling against him, the petition alleged in substance as follows: The injury resulted from the condition of a cant hook which was being used by a fellow servant, and which was so worn at the point of the hook and at the place where it joined the handle that it would not hold the log. Plaintiff was without fault, and he was not injured by any negligence of his fellow servant, but by reason of negligence of the master in furnishing a defective and unsafe cant hook to the fellow servant of plaintiff, and in not inspecting it. The plaintiff and his fellow servant were principally engaged in cutting logs, and were called to assist in loading only when necessary. The cant hooks were all carried on the log train and kept there or at the mill, at a distance of several miles from the place where the plaintiff and his fellow servant were cutting logs. They were engaged in a different department of the work from that to which was intrusted the furnishing and taking care of cant hooks. The defect could only be discovered by inspection. The hook was not regularly used by or kept in the custody of the fellow servant. Neither the plaintiff nor the fellow servant knew of the defective condition of the tool, and they had no opportunity to know of it, as they would be called to where the cant hooks were, and would take any hook accessible, and immediately proceed to loading logs, having neither time nor opportunity for inspection. The fellow servant was only 18 years of age, and had not reached such years of discretion as to be trusted with such a tool, unless it had been inspected or he had been warned of the danger. The master knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care ought to have known, of the unsafe condition of the tool. Held, that the petition was not subject to general demurrer.

The other grounds of the demurrer did not authorize the dismissal of the case.

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—"FLOGGING HAMMER."

A "flogging hammer" is a small sledge hammer used for striking a large cold-chisel in chipping castings.

Error from Superior Court, Ben Hill County; W. V. Whipple, Judge.

Personal injury action by S. P. Williams against the Garbutt Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant sustaining a demurrer to the amended petition, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

S. P. Williams brought suit against the Garbutt Lumber Company, alleging, in substance, as follows: On March 23, 1906, the plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant, his duties being to cut logs which were to be used at the sawmill of defendant, and which it was customary to transport by hauling them to the defendant company's tram road, and loading them on trucks which were drawn by a steam engine. The loading of the logs would sometimes require the work of more men than were engaged on the cars or trucks, and it was a part of the plaintiff's duties, whenever called upon to do so, to leave his business of sawing logs, and assist in loading them for transportation. He was subject to the orders of the woodman of the defendant in this respect. The usual method employed for getting the logs on the trucks was this: The logs would be hauled up and placed upon skids, and, when ready to be loaded upon trucks, laborers would slide or push the logs along these skids on what were called "jumpers," which were other logs or timber running from the skids in an inclined direction upward to about the level of the top of the trucks. A long chain would be put around the logs, and mules would be hitched to it, and by driving the mules forward the logs would be pulled up the inclined plane and carried upon the trucks of the logging train. While they were thus being loaded, it was necessary that the logs should be handled by laborers using "cant hooks" for the purpose of turning them, holding them in proper position, and otherwise working with them to get them upon the trucks. On the date named the plaintiff and other laborers were called to assist in loading logs in the manner mentioned. They proceeded to do the loading in the usual way. Nick Williams, who was a laborer of the same kind as the plaintiff and engaged in the same work, was assisting in carrying the logs up the "jumpers" in the manner described. Plaintiff, having aided him in getting the logs started up the "jumpers" toward the trucks, turned for the purpose of starting the next log, as was necessary and proper to be done, in order to load the logs quickly, as it was their duty to do. Nick Williams placed the cant hook which he had under one end of the log which was then on its way up the "jumpers," for the purpose of keeping it from slipping back. This was the proper way to do in carrying out that work. The cant hook which Nick Williams was using was defective; the wooden part of it being so badly worn that the metal hook would not hold properly. By reason of such defective condition the pressure of the log upon the cant hook caused it to slip out of place and fail to hold the log as it should have done, and would have done save for the defendant. This caused the log to slip or roll down the "jumper," near which the plaintiff was standing, engaged in his duty of bringing forward the next log. The log thus sliding or rolling struck the plaintiff on the leg, breaking it and causing a serious injury (which was described). It was the duty of the defendant to furnish to its laborers safe tools and appliances for their work, and it was negligent in furnishing a defective cant hook for that purpose. This duty rested upon the defendant corporation, and the failure to discharge it was not due to any fault on the part of the plaintiff or any fellow servant. Plaintiff was not negligent, but used all reasonable care and diligence in the performance of his duty, and the injury was not due to the negligence of any fellow servant.

By amendment, it was alleged, in substance, as follows: The cant hook used by Nick Williams had become from long use somewhat worn at the point, and was not sharp enough to catch and hold the log upon which it was being used. The defects in it as set out here and in the original petition were not perceptible unless closely examined.

and, it being kept in the custody of the Garbutt Lumber Company, and not being regularly used or kept by Nick Williams, he had no occasion to inspect or examine it carefully. In fact, he did not do so, but took it and proceeded immediately to use it, relying upon it, thus furnished to him, as being in proper and safe condition for the work to be done. At the time of the injury to the plaintiff Nick Williams was a boy about 16 years of age, and, while physically able to perform the portion of the work expected of him, he had not reached the age of discretion and judgment at which it was proper to intrust him with the use of such a tool as a cant hook, unless it was carefully examined and inspected by the Garbutt Lumber Company or its agent employed for that purpose to see that the cant hook was a safe one for the work to be done with it; or unless the attention of Nick Williams was specially called to the danger of handling and using a cant hook that might not be in a perfect condition. The cant hooks used by the laborers were all carried on the logging train of the defendant, and were kept there at the mill, at a distance of several miles from the point where the plaintiff and Nick Williams were engaged in cutting logs. Nick Williams and the plaintiff were engaged in an entirely different department of work from that to which was intrusted the furnishing and taking care of the cant hooks. Nick Williams did not know of the defective condition of the cant hook used by him, nor did the plaintiff. When it became necessary to load the logging train, the plaintiff, Nick Williams, and other laborers, would leave their axes with which they were cutting logs and go to the logging train, where each laborer would take for his use any cant hook accessible; no particular one being assigned to any laborer. Immediately upon taking up the cant hooks, the plaintiff and other laborers would load the logs as they did on this occasion. Therefore they had no time or opportunity to inspect the cant hooks. Neither the plaintiff nor Nick Williams had a reasonable opportunity to know of the unsafe condition of the cant hook; but the Garbutt Lumber Company did have knowledge of its unsafe condition, or ought to have had by the exercise of ordinary diligence.

The defendant demurred to the petition as amended, the court sustained the demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The general rule requires a master to use ordinary diligence to furnish his servant with appliances reasonably suited for the use for which they are intended, and to use like diligence in inspecting and keeping them in proper condition for use. To this general rule some courts of other states have declared that there exists what has been denominated an exception as to "simple tools." The basis on which this has been placed by some of the courts is that where a tool or instrumentality is so entirely simple in its nature and character that its condition can be seen at a glance, or that one who uses it has as good an opportunity as the master for knowing its condition, the servant cannot recover on the ground that the master did not inspect it. In some of the decisions there is a broad announcement that the master is under no duty to inspect such simple tools. It will be found, however, that in most of the cases where this rule or exception was applied the controversy was between the master and the servant to whom he furnished the tool, and where the defect and danger were so apparent that the servant was guilty of negligence in using the tool, or where he knew of its condition, or had equal opportunity with the master for knowing it. The apparent hardship of holding the master to a high degree of diligence relatively to his servant in regard to inspecting very simple things, the condition of which must be patent to the person using them, appears also to have had weight in some instances. Thus in the case of Martin v. Highland Park Mfg. Co., 128 N. C. 264, 38 S. E. 878, 83 Am. St. Rep. 671, where an injury occurred from a fragment of steel which flew off from a hammer that was being used to drive a new key into a shaft, it was said: "Well, then, if defendant furnished its employes with tools known to it to be defective, or by ordinary care and inspection could have known of such defects, and the injury was caused by reason of such defects, then there would have been evidence of negligence to be submitted to the jury. But was there any apparent defect in the hammer? Or was there a defect known to the defendant or its agent? Or was the hammer used in a negligent, careless, or unworkmanlike manner? If such state of facts existed, the plaintiff failed to offer any evidence to prove it." And, after referring to whether the hammer was properly tempered or not, it was added: "Surely, it cannot be seriously contemplated that every employer is responsible for injuries occurring from improperly tempered axes, hoes, scythes, trace chains, lap links, bridle bits, etc., the imperfection of which could not be known till used, or for defective whiffle-trees, ax helves, hoe handles, hand spikes, plow lines, and such like (the defects of which would be first discovered by the party using them), unless the employer is shown to have had knowledge of such defects. If such be the rules of law, then the contentment of the farmer must give place to anxiety and dread lest injury, resulting to a servant from a splintered hoe helve or hand spike, defective bridle bit, whiffle-tree, or plow line, et id simile, may at any time occur, and sweep from him his farm and belongings in compensation of the damage done. To the same experience would the contractor expect to be subjected should a defective nail, while being driven by one of his carpenters, break and do injury. To this doctrine we cannot subscribe." It was accordingly held that the mere occurrence of the injury was not sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence; it being stated that "in the case at bar there was no evidence that any defect in the hammer was known to exist either by the plaintiff or the defendant, nor is there any evidence to show that its condition was such as to incite an inquiry or suspicion."

The Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in Stork v. Stolper Cooperage Co., 127 Wis. 318, 106 N. W. 841, discussed the basis of what is called the "simple tool" exception, as follows: "It may be conceded that, generally speaking, a monkey wrench is in such category; and the rule of law is well established in this state and elsewhere that in case of such simple tools no liability rests on the master for the ordinary perils resulting from their use, nor for those latent and usual defects or weaknesses which, by reason of the common, usual character of the appliances, are presumed to be known to all men alike. This exception from liability is, we believe, in all cases based upon the condition that the defect and peril are such that no superiority of knowledge in the master over the employé exists or can be presumed [citing authorities]. Another qualification of the master's liability indulged in case of such simple tools and appliances is exemption from a duty to inspect to ascertain the development of defects or disrepair in the course of their use, based also upon the assumption that such conditions are as much within the observation of the employé as of the master, if not more so [citing authorities]. While these rules result practically in a relaxation of the master's duty and liability in the case of such simple tools, they are not at all in denial of the general underlying principle of the law of negligence that one who knowingly exposes another to a likelihood of injury is liable therefor, in the absence of consent by such other or of contributory negligence. As stated above, the relaxation of the master's duty and liability rests on the assumed equality of knowledge and ability to discover the defect complained of. It can have no application to a defect of which the master is actually cognizant, and which, as a reasonable man, he should appreciate is likely to result in injury to one using the implement as it is likely to be used, and which is neither known to the employé nor of such a character as to be obvious to that observation which may be expected to accompany its use."

In a note to Vanderpool v. Partridge, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 668, is collected a number of cases on the subject. The annotator makes the following general observation: "The rule of respondeat superior rests upon the assumption that the employer has a better and more comprehensive knowledge than the employé, and therefore ceases to be applicable where the employé's means of knowledge of the danger to be incurred is equal to that of the employer. Such is the case where the instrument or tool, the defect in which is the cause of the injury, is of so simple a character that a person accustomed to its use cannot fail to appreciate the risks incident thereto. The mere simplicity of a tool, as is apparent upon consideration of the basis above stated of the rule of respondeat superior, will not exempt the master from all care, or relieve him from liability under all circumstances; but the capacity, intelligence, and experience of the servant, the character of the defects, his opportunity for detecting them, his situation and the circumstances calculated to withdraw his attention from them, as well as the fact that the servant has a right to rely upon the master to protect him from danger and injury, and in selecting the agent from which it may arise, are factors of varying importance, which must also be taken into account. The manner in which they operate will be further considered in connection with the various instrumentalities involved." And see 1 Labatt on Master & Ser. § 154. In Chicago, Kan. & Western Ry. Co. v. Blevins, 46 Kan. 370, 26 Pac. 687, an employé of a railway company who was working on a bridge was thrown off his balance, and injured by the fall. He claimed that this was caused by the rebound of a maul which he was using, and that this resulted from the unsafe and dangerous condition of the tool furnished him by the company, in that it had a cracked and crooked handle, and had become so badly battered and worn that it was uneven on the surface, which caused it to glance and rebound in such a way as to jerk him over and off his balance. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff. The case was carried to the Supreme Court, where the judgment was affirmed. That court held that the question of liability of the company depended upon whether its agents were negligent in furnishing an unsafe tool to the employé, or whether he was guilty of contributory negligence, and that what might be held ordinary care on the part of an employé under some circumstances might not be sufficient under others. It was said: "So, in this case, while there does not seem to have been a great degree of care exercised by Blevins (the plaintiff), yet, when we consider that the maul was handed him by the representative of the railroad company, which gave him a right to suppose it was safe, that he was in a high and dangerous position, which limited his opportunities for the inspection of the maul, and that the work at the time was being rushed, so that he was hurried and his opportunity for inspection of the maul thus interfered with, we do not care to say he did not exercise ordinary care under the circumstances." It would seem that an ordinary maul was a simple kind of tool, and that its battered condition could be easily seen, but the circumstances under which it was furnished and the situation and surroundings were such as to leave the question of the diligence or negligence of the respective parties to be determined by the jury. What ordinary care requires a master to do in reference to a tool or instrumentality may be affected by the character of such tool or instrument; and so the simplicity of a tool and the obviousness of its condition may affect the servant in his use of it, and bear upon the question of diligence or negligence on his part. But the master is bound to use ordinary care; and if, under the circumstances of the particular case, it appears that he has not done so, he will not be freed from liability if the other elements necessary to a recovery by the servant exist. In most of the cases involving the matter of the simplicity of the tool used the question arose, under the evidence, as to whether the facts were such as to show a want of diligence on the part of the master, or negligence on the part of the servant, or equal opportunity for knowledge on the part of both. In a smaller number the sufficiency of the pleadings was involved. In nearly all of the adjudications where the simple-tool idea was considered, the question arose between the master and the servant to whom he furnished the tool for use, and not between the master and another servant who was injured by the breaking of the tool or its defective condition while being handled by the servant to whom it was furnished. In a few cases another servant was injured. The difference between the two does not seem to have been very carefully considered or discussed, but among the adjudicated cases, bearing on that subject there is conflict. In Michigan no distinction appears to have been made between the servant who used the tool and a fellow servant, where both were working together in making holes through a section of boiler iron. Rawley v. Colliat, 90 Mich. 31, 51 N. W. 350. And in a Minnesota case the injured employé was at work with another in cutting bolts from a rod of iron, and a piece of steel flew from the hammer in the hands of the other employé, causing the injury. Koschman v. Ash, 98 Minn. 312, 108 N. W. 514, 116 Am. St. Rep. 373. On the other hand, in Campbell v. Gillespie Co., 69 N. J. Law, 279, 55 Atl. 276, it was declared that, "when the defect in the tool taken by the servant is obvious, the servant who takes it, although it is the only one on the premises, assumes the obvious risk of danger to himself, but he cannot assume an obvious risk in such case for a fellow servant who does not know of the danger." The case is cited, however, by the same court in a later decision where a somewhat broad view was announced. Demato v. Hudson Co. Gas Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 67 Atl. 28. But there the employé injured was the same one who used the tool. In L. & N. R. Co. v.

Roberts (Ky.) 70 S. W. 833, it was said: "In this case it was not shown that it was appellee's duty to handle the implement found by the jury to have been defective; that is, the spike maul. Therefore the question of his opportunity to know its condition does not appear to have been relevant to this cause, because, at the outset, his opportunity for knowing would not be carried further than an examination of those tools with which he himself was required to work." In De La Vergne Ref. Mach. Co. v. Stahl, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 471, 60 S. W. 319, in an action by an employé for an injury caused by a piece of steel flying off from a rivet hammer, the defendant requested the court to charge that as it was shown that such hammers were of the best make, and it was agreed that they had to be highly tempered, and were on that account necessarily to some degree brittle and liable to chip off, the plaintiff had assumed the risk of being injured by such chipping off. The evidence showed that the hammer had become cracked from use, and was more liable in that condition to chip off than when new. It was held that there was no error in refusing the request. "Nor was it error, under such state of facts, for the charge to submit the question as to whether or not defendant had used ordinary care in furnishing safe rivet hammers for the purpose for which they were being used. Where plaintiff's part of the work was merely to hold the rivet hammer while it was being used by another employé, and he had been engaged at such work only a few days, and there was testimony that he knew nothing about the condition of the hammer, it was for the jury to determine whether he knew, or was negligent in not knowing the danger, although the cracked condition of the hammer was apparent on a casual examination."

While in a number of cases, in dealing with the particular facts involved, it has been held that the tool then being used (such as a stick with which to push cars, an ordinary hammer, or the like) was so simple in its character that the servant had at least equal opportunity with the master for observing it, and that he was at fault for not doing so, or that the master could not be charged with negligence as a matter of law for not inspecting it, and that, therefore, in such cases there could be no recovery, no arbitrary and invariable rule can be laid down by which it can be declared that a master is relieved from the duty of inspecting certain specified tools, regardless of the circumstances of the case. Nor can a court well undertake to make a catalogue of tools by name, and say that as to injuries caused by them there shall be an arbitrary exemption from liability on the part of the master. At last the duty of the master must necessarily to some extent depend, not merely upon the name of the tool, but also the circumstances under which it is furnished or kept for use and under which it is used. The underlying principle, rather than the name of the tool, is the important matter. An illustration of this may be seen in the fact that a hammer has sometimes been referred to as falling within the simple-tool exception, and yet a "flogging hammer," which is a small sledge hammer used for striking a large cold-chisel in chipping castings, was differentiated from it. See Vant Hul v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 90 Minn. 329, 96 N. W. 789; Morris v. Eastern Ry. Co., 88 Minn. 112, 92 N. W. 535; Koschman v. Ash, 98 Minn. 312, 108 N. W. 514, 116 Am. St. Rep. 373, supra. In the Koschman Case the Vant Hul Case was also distinguished from that then under consideration, because "the defendant not only manufactured the hammers, but kept them in a room fenced off for the purpose, and provided a tool inspector, whose duty it was, on the application of the workman, to hand out the tool for the particular purpose." In the Morris Case, too, it was alleged that there was a defect in the making of the tool; the defendant being also the manufacturer. In Banks v. Schofield's Sons Co., 126 Ga. 667, 55 S. E. 939, a piece of steel flew from the end of a chisel which an employé was using in dressing or chipping the iron on the truck frame of an engine. It was held that, under the facts of the case as set out in the plaintiff's petition, the servant was not entitled to recover from the master damages on account of the injury so caused. The law in reference to the duty of a master in furnishing machinery to his servant, and the duty of the servant in regard thereto, as codified (Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2611, 2612), and the declaration there made, that, in a suit by a servant against the master for an injury arising from a defect in a machine, "it must appear that the master knew or ought to have known * * * of the defect or danger in the machinery supplied, and it must also appear that the servant injured did not know and had not equal means of knowing such facts, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof," were treated as applicable in principle to the case then under consideration. It was said that: "The plaintiff's petition is fatally defective in three particulars: It fails to show that he did not know of the condition of the chisel before he was injured by its use; it shows that his means of knowing its condition were as good as those of the defendant; and it is apparent that by the use of ordinary care he could have known its condition." In this state, also, the character of the duties performed, whether the nonassignable duties of the master or not, has been adopted as the test of whether one is a fellow servant of an injured employé, rather than the grade of ranks of the servants respectively. Moore v. Dublin Cotton Mills, 127 Ga. 610, 56 S. E. 839, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 772.

We do not find it necessary in this state to adopt any arbitrary rule as to tools bearing certain names or described somewhat indefinitely as "simple tools." If what is called the "simple-tool rule" is based on the principle of equality or superiority of opportunity for knowledge on the part of a servant, that principle forms a part of the test applied by our Civ. Code 1895 (sections 2611, 2612) in a suit against a master by a servant for an injury claimed to have arisen from the negligence of the master in failing to comply with the duties imposed on him in regard to machinery, and which, as already seen, has been held to apply in principle to cases arising from defective tools. The application of the rule that it must appear that the master knew or ought to have known of the defect or danger, and that the servant injured did not know and had not equal means of knowing such fact, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have known thereof, to the facts of the particular case under investigation, will furnish a solution of the question of liability or nonliability. In the determination of each case, the nature, character, and simplicity or complexity of the tool is, of course, an important factor for consideration. The case may be so plain, on the pleadings or evidence, that but one conclusion can legitimately be drawn, as in decisions of this court cited below; or it may be of such a character as, under the facts disclosed, requires submission to the jury. We do not in what is here said conflict with former rulings of this court as to what a petition must allege in a suit by an injured servant against a master; nor with those rulings where, under the evidence, considering the nature of the tool as well as the circumstances of the case, it was held that no negligence on the part of the master was shown, or that there was a want of ordinary care on the part of the servant, or that there was knowledge or equal opportunity for knowledge by the servant and assumption of risk by him, and that there could be no recovery. See Lee v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 125 Ga. 656, 54 S. E. 678; E. Tenn., etc., Ry. Co. v. Perkins, 88 Ga. 1, 13 S. E. 952; Stewart v. Seaboard Air-Line Ry., 115 Ga. 624, 41 S. E. 981; Moseley v. Schofield's Sons Co., 123 Ga. 197, 200, 51 S. E. 309, and similar cases. But the reason for each decision is the application of the underlying principles of the law governing the relation of master and servant to the facts as shown by the pleadings or evidence in the case before the court, rather than any arbitrary rulings as to a particular instrumentality bearing a given name. Nor is there anything contrary to this ruling in the decision in Ga. Railroad & Banking Co. v. Nelms, 83 Ga. 70, 9 S. E. 1049, 20 Am. St. Rep. 308, where it was held that a hammer used by a track hand on a railroad was not a part of the "machinery" of the railroad company within the meaning of the statute which declares that such a company shall be liable for any damage done to persons, stock, or other property "by the running of the locomotives or cars or other machinery" thereof.

In the case now before us it was alleged that the plaintiff and his fellow servant, Nick Williams, were employed by the lumber company to cut and saw logs which were to be used at the sawmill of the company; that it was customary to transport the logs by loading them on trucks drawn by a steam engine over a tram road; that the log cutters were sometimes required to leave their principal work and assist in loading the trucks; that the cant hooks used in loading were not regularly kept by them, but were kept in the custody of the company, being all carried on the log train and kept there, or at the mill, a distance of several miles from the point where the plaintiff and Nick Williams were engaged in cutting logs; that they were employed in an entirely different department of the work from that to which was intrusted the furnishing and taking care of the cant hooks; that when it was necessary in loading the logging train the plaintiff, Nick Williams, and other laborers, would leave their axes and go to the train, where each laborer would take for his use any cant hook accessible, no particular one being assigned to any laborer; that immediately upon doing so they would load the logs as they did on this occasion; that they had neither time nor opportunity to inspect the hooks, and that neither the plaintiff nor Nick Williams knew of the defective condition of the hook used by the latter, or had any reasonable opportunity to know of its condition, which was not perceptible unless closely examined, but the lumber company did have knowledge thereof, or ought to have it by the exercise of ordinary diligence; that Nick Williams did not keep or regularly use the cant hook, and had no occasion to inspect or examine it carefully, and did not do so, but took it and proceeded to use it, relying upon its being in proper and safe condition for the work to be done; that Nick Williams was a boy about 16 years of age, and, while physically able to perform the work expected of him, he had not reached the age of discretion and judgment at which it was proper to intrust him with the use of such a tool unless it was carefully examined and inspected by the company, or unless his attention was specially called to its dangerous condition; and that the cant hook used by Nick Williams was so badly worn, both as to the wooden part and at the point of the hook, that the metal hook would not hold a log properly. It was further alleged that the plaintiff was not injured by reason of negligence on the part of his co-employé, but by reason of that of the master. Under these allegations it cannot be said as matter of law that the master was free from fault, or that the plaintiff, or even his fellow servant, had equal opportunity with the master for knowing of the danger, or that the plaintiff was lacking in ordinary care. Nor does merely calling the tool a "cant hook" alone serve to free the master as matter of law from liability under these allegations. The evidence when introduced may or may not make out a case authorizing a recovery by the plaintiff, but it cannot be said that the allegations of the petition failed to do so.

It was contended that if the master furnished tools which were good, and another which was bad, and a fellow servant selected the defective tool, this was the act of the fellow servant, and the master was not liable for the result. The allegations on this subject have already been mentioned. If the master discharged the duties imposed on him by law, and a fellow servant by virtue of his negligence caused the injury, the master would not be liable. But, if the master is guilty of negligence proximately causing the injury, he would not be freed from liability, although the fellow servant may likewise have been negligent. Under the plaintiff's allegations it does not appear that he was injured by reason of negligence of a fellow servant without negligence of the master. Ocean Steamship Co. v. Matthews, 86 Ga. 418, 12 S. E. 632; Cheaney v. Ocean Steamship Co., 92 Ga. 726, 19 S. E. 33, 44 Am. St. Rep. 113; Loveless v. Standard Gold Mining Co., 116 Ga. 427, 42 S. E. 741, 59 L. R. A. 596; Jackson v. Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Co., 118 Ga. 651, 45 S. E. 254.

The demurrer raises the contention that the plaintiff himself was negligent in turning to get another log, in not perceiving the danger, and in choosing a more dangerous way to perform his work, when he could have selected a safer one. It cannot be said from the face of the petition that the plaintiff was negligent, or chose between two ways to perform his work, one of which was fraught with danger. The demurrer is in part speaking in its character.

The case must be remanded to the trial court, where the facts may be fully developed by the evidence, and the question of liability determined under the law as applicable thereto.

DIXON v. MINNESOTA LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

1. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 79*)—DISMISSAL BY COURT OF ITS OWN MOTION.

When, upon the call of a suit pending in the superior court, neither party appeared, and, referring to the case, the judge merely made an entry on the trial docket, "November term, 1904, dismissed for want of prosecution," and the case was stricken from the docket, but no order was ever taken, nor entry made on the minutes, by the judge, such entry, without more, was insufficient to accomplish a dismissal of the suit. Williams v. Rawlins, 33 Ga. 117 (10), 123. See, also, Greenfield v. Vason, 74 Ga. 126 (3).

(a) In a direct proceeding afterwards brought, attacking the validity of the entry and moving the court to re-enter the case upon the docket, it affirmatively appearing, from statements in the bill of exceptions, duly certified, that no order of dismissal was taken and entered upon the minutes of court, and that nothing else was done by the judge, except as first above indicated, it was erroneous for the judge to refuse to re-enter the case on the docket, to be disposed of in accordance with law.

2. OTHER DECISIONS DISTINGUISHED.

Nothing said here is in conflict with the rulings made in Clarke v. Western Union Tel. Co., 112 Ga. 633, 37 S. E. 870, Thornton v. Perry, 101 Ga. 608, 29 S. E. 24 (1), and Armstrong v. Lewis, 61 Ga. 680. The rulings there made dealt with the entry of the judge merely as evidentiary in character, and held that, there being no direct attack upon the entry, and the recitals thereof being presumed to be true, the entries could not be controverted in a collateral proceeding.

FLURY v. HIGHTOWER BOX & TANK CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NONSUIT.

This being a suit for recovery of damages on account of personal injuries, and it appearing from the evidence for the plaintiff that his opportunities of discovering the defective condition of the machine, in the operation of which the injuries complained of were received, were equal or superior to those of the master (defendant), and that he had in fact observed the defects, recovery by the plaintiff would have been unauthorized by the evidence, and the court did not err in granting a nonsuit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by J. A. Flury against the Hightower Box & Tank Company. Judgment for defendant, and both parties bring error. Affirmed, and cross-bill of exceptions dismissed.

Ben J. Conyers and Walter T. Colquitt, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant company for the recovery of damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by him while engaged as an employé of the company in operating a machine known as a "rip saw." In the declaration it is averred that the machine, which he was directed to operate, was defective, in that the opening of the table, through which the saw ran, was worn by constant use until it was larger than it should have been, and that the saw had too much play while in operation through the opening. It is also alleged that the defective and dangerous condition of the saw was not known to the petitioner, but was known to the defendant. The plaintiff further alleged that he did not know of the defects, that they were not discoverable by him in the exercise of ordinary care, and that he had not equal means with the defendant of discovering the defects. While he was engaged in sawing narrow strips of lumber upon said saw, one of the strips was caught in the saw, pulled down in the opening through which the saw revolved, and plaintiff's right hand was carried with the piece of plank down and against the saw, with the result that the thumb and fingers on that hand were cut off. After the plaintiff had introduced testimony and closed his case, the court, upon motion of the defendant, granted a nonsuit; and this judgment is excepted to.

Under the evidence, the court did not err in rendering the judgment complained of. The defects in the machine which the plaintiff was engaged in operating when he received the injuries stated, as appears from the testimony of the plaintiff himself, were not only discoverable in the exercise of ordinary care, but they were defects which were as well known to the plaintiff as to the defendant, if not better. He was a man of intelligence and experience. He had been employed for several months in the operating of saws of different kinds, and had been engaged for two months, or longer, in the operation of the rip saw by which his hand was mutilated. He had seen and noticed the width of the aperture through which the saw revolved. He saw and knew the width and thickness of the plank that was being sawed at the time his fingers were brought in contact with the revolving saw. While the specific defects in the fitting of the saw had not been pointed out to him, he had observed them, and he had been cautioned generally as to the danger of coming in contact with the saw itself. If the operation of the machine was dangerous at the time the injuries complained of were received, the plaintiff assumed the risk, with all the defects patent and staring him in the face. Under the facts of this case, a verdict for the plaintiff would have been entirely unauthorized by the evidence.

But counsel insist that a general demurrer to the petition had been overruled, and that all the material allegations were supported by evidence. This proposition cannot be assented to. The vital and essential allegation that the defective condition of the machine—that is, the table and the aperture of the same, through which the saw revolved—"was unknown to plaintiff, was not discovered by him in the exercise of ordinary care, and plaintiff had not equal means with defendant of discovering said defect," does not find support in the evidence of plaintiff himself. Besides this, other material allegations in the declaration were contradicted by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed. Cross-bills of exceptions dismissed. All the Justices concur.

ROBERTSON v. HEATH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 85*)—OBJECTIONS TO EVIDENCE.

Where, on a proceeding by writ of habeas corpus to determine the custody of a child, certain affidavits were offered, and objection was made to them as a whole on the ground that they were irrelevant, hearsay, and stated opinions, instead of facts, and many of the statements contained in them were not subject to such objection, there was no error in overruling it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-225; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

2. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 85*)—PROCEDURE—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

Where the writ of habeas corpus is used as a means of determining the custody of an infant, the better practice is to hear evidence viva voce, or taken by deposition or interrogatories, after notice and with opportunity for cross-examination. But this is not an absolute and inflexible rule, and the presiding judge is vested with discretion as to admitting affidavits under the circumstances of a particular case which render it necessary or proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

3. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 85*) — CUSTODY OF CHILD—EVIDENCE.

On the merits of this case, there was no error in awarding the custody of the child to the father, instead of to the maternal grandmother.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Richmond County; H. C. Hammond, Judge.

Application by C. F. Heath for a writ of habeas corpus against S. E. Robertson to obtain possession of a child. Judgment for petitioner, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Boykin Wright, for plaintiff in error. C. Henry & R. S. Cohen, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. C. F. Heath obtained a writ of habeas corpus against Mrs. S. E. Robertson, for the purpose of securing the custody of his child, a girl four years of age, alleged to be illegally held by the respondent, in disregard of his parental rights. The respondent, who was the maternal grandmother of the child, claimed that the father had relinquished to her his parental control, by a valid and binding contract, when the child was only a few weeks old, and after the death of its mother. The father, who had remarried, denied this. The evidence was conflicting. The presiding judge awarded the custody to the father, and the grandmother excepted.

1. On the hearing most of the evidence was delivered orally by the witnesses. Three affidavits were offered by the plaintiff, tending to support other evidence in his favor, by which it was sought to prove, among other things, that he expressed unwillingness to part with the custody of the child permanently and declined to do so. Objection was made to their admission, "on the ground that they were irrelevant, hearsay, stated opinions, instead of facts, and for the further reason that respondent was denied the right and privilege of cross-examining the witnesses." The objection was overruled. Many of the recitals in the affidavits were relevant, were not hearsay, and were not mere opinions. Thus there were statements that the father sent money and clothes to the respondent for the support of the child, and that he has asked the respondent if she needed any more money for that purpose and received a negative answer. The objection was to the affidavits as a whole. If any special parts of them were subject to objection, they were not pointed out.

2. The question then arises, were these affidavits properly admitted over objection on the ground that the respondent was denied the right of cross-examination? Properly exercised, this is an important right. Its function is not merely to confuse or harass adverse witnesses, but to develop the whole truth, which does not always fully appear from the testimony of a witness on his examination in chief. Facts may be omitted, without any wrongful intent, which give an entirely different appearance to the case; or, if feeling or interest colors the evidence of a witness, whether intentionally or not, this can often be made to appear. Generally speaking, testimony is not admissible, on a final trial of the issues in a case, where there has been no opportunity for cross-examination, save in certain special instances, which the law writers treat as exceptions to the rule excluding hearsay evidence. On the hearing under a writ of habeas corpus, involving the custody of a child, the better practice is to require the testimony to be delivered from the stand, or by depositions or interrogatories duly taken, with the privilege of cross-examination preserved, where practicable. Affidavits are often unsatisfactory at best. The affiant swears that what he states is true; but he does not swear that it is the whole truth, nor has the adverse party an opportunity to inquire whether it is so. We do not commend the practice of determining so important a question as the awarding of the custody of a child, with all the possible consequences to its future life and happiness, upon mere ex parte affidavits, as a general practice. Such a decision is final, under the circumstances then presented.

But the introduction of affidavits in certain instances is permissible. It has long been the recognized practice to use affidavits on the hearing of applications for interlocutory injunctions or for the appointment of receivers pendente lite. It has been held permissible, on the hearing of applications for temporary alimony, to cause witnesses to be sworn, subject to cross-examination, or to admit affidavits. Rogers v. Rogers, 103 Ga. 763, 30 S. E. 659. Personally, when he was a judge of the superior court, the writer found the former method far more satisfactory, though less expeditious; and no doubt other trial judges have had the same experience. To see and listen to a witness for ten minutes, with the privilege on the part of the court to interpose a question when it is necessary for the full development of the truth, often gives the presiding judge a clearer insight into the real situation, in an alimony case, where his discretion is invoked, where the feelings of the parties are frequently deeply stirred, and where the judgment may be enforced by imprisonment, than to listen to affidavits for an hour. In such a case, there is not infrequently an indisposition to tell the whole truth, and thus open the door of the closet where the family skeleton may lie concealed. Affidavits on the same side are sometimes as uniform in appearance as eggs in the shell; but, if one of them be prodded with the point of a cross-question or two, the yolk is at once exposed.

Still the rule is not arbitrary or inflexible in certain hearings. On the subject of writs of habeas corpus to test the legality of the detention of one deprived of his liberty, Pen. Code 1895, § 1222, provides as follows: "If the return denies any of the material facts stated in the petition, or alleges others upon which issue is taken, the judge hearing the return may, in a summary manner, hear testimony as to the issue, and to that end may compel the attendance of witnesses, the production of papers, or may adjourn the examination of the question, or exercise any other power of a court which the principles of justice may require." The writ is also used as a means of determining the custody of minor children. The presiding judge often has to use great discretion in judging of the status of parties and what is for the welfare of the child. He needs all the light he can obtain for the just and faithful discharge of his duty. It may be that a witness is beyond seas, or inaccessible, or for other reason cannot be put upon the stand. The writ is a speedy writ. The proceeding is summary in its nature. It is a judicial proceeding, and to be conducted in an orderly manner as such. But it is not exactly a lawsuit in the ordinary sense of the term. Simmons v. Ga. Iron & Coal Co., 117 Ga. 309, 43 S. E. 780, 61 L. R. A. 739. To delay its hearing until a witness absent from the state or the country can return, or until interrogatories can be prepared, notice given, cross-questions propounded in writing, and commission forwarded to a distant state or country, and there formally executed, might require so much time that the hearing under the writ would be unreasonably delayed. It may be necessary to admit an affidavit, or, in default of it, to exclude much needed light altogether; or there may be other circumstances rendering the use of affidavits proper. On this subject the presiding judge must be allowed some discretion. This is certainly true when the question is entirely of a civil nature, and not involving criminal law. In 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 208, referring to habeas corpus cases, it is said: "The use of affidavits in evidence is now authorized by statute both in England and in the United States, though the practice existed in England before the enactment of the statute. Thus affidavits may be used to enlarge the time of the return, to fortify the return, or to controvert the truth of its recitals, but not to deny the existence of any facts found by the court. So, too, affidavits are admissible in proof of facts which, conceding the return to be true, will show the detention to be illegal." In so far as this statement is based on the express provisions of statutes, it does not apply in this state, where the only statute bearing on the subject is that quoted above. Nor does it mean that the guilt or innocence of a person indicted or arrested under regular process for a criminal offense can be tried and determined in this summary manner.

In Hurd on Habeas Corpus (2d Ed.) 304, it is said: "It was not provided by statute in England, until the passage of St. 56 Geo. III, c. 100, § 3, that the truth of the facts set forth in the return, in cases other than commitments for criminal or supposed criminal matter, might be examined into by affidavit; but it was nevertheless the practice to do so long before that period. And the same practice prevails in other summary proceedings, such as interlocutory applications in chancery, and various motions in actions of law, to set aside judgments, to obtain attachments, to enter satisfaction, etc., and in criminal proceedings, for leave to file a criminal information, and, after conviction of misdemeanor, for leave to show matter in aggravation by the prosecutor, or in mitigation by the defendant." In Church on Habeas Corpus (2d Ed.) p. 289, § 207, it is said:

"This species of evidence is of very low order, and it is with reluctance that judges and courts will receive it in many cases. It is received with caution and closely scrutinized. Affidavits are highly objectionable if not taken before competent authority and properly authenticated; but when they are so taken, though without notice to the adverse party, they may be offered and received in evidence, but their reception is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which must be regulated by the circumstances of each particular case. Affidavits should not be used where the attendance of witnesses can be obtained with reasonable diligence, and when this can be done the attendance of witnesses will be required in examinations in criminal proceedings." In State v. Lyon, 1 N. J. Law, 409, on the original hearing had upon the return of the writ of habeas corpus, an affidavit, taken ex parte and not entitled in the cause, was offered in evidence, and objection was made to its admission. The court said: "This evidence has been objected to on the ground that it is ex parte and taken without any notice being previously given to the person against whom it is designed to operate. The party adducing it is bound to show that the testimony is legal, and taken in a mode conformable to law. The fact which constitutes the ground of objection has not been denied, and, as we are not satisfied that there exist any reasons to take it out of the general rule, the evidence must be overruled."

In Hurd on Habeas Corpus, pp. 306, 307, it is said: "In the D'Hautville Case, in the Court of General Sessions of the City and County of Philadelphia, in 1840, ex parte affidavits, taken before the writ of habeas corpus was sued out, were rejected by the court, which thought the 'admission of such evidence would be a dangerous precedent.' The court, however, admitted that it was within their discretion to receive the affidavits. They held that the party offering them could not insist upon their reception as a matter of right, and that under the circumstances of the case, the conduct of the relator in giving notice of the taking of other evidence subsequent to the date of the writ, and the lapse of time, affording ample opportunity to take the evidence contained in the affidavits objected to on like notice, they ought not to be received." In Verser v. Ford, 37 Ark. 27, it is said: "In deciding contests upon writs of habeas corpus for the custody of infant children, the principles adopted in the chancery court must govern. No rigid rules to govern the practice have or can be formulated." See, also, Church on Habeas Corpus (2d Ed.) §§ 154, 212.

As an illustration of an English case arising under a writ of habeas corpus to test the custody of a minor, in which affidavits were used, mention may be made of the celebrated case of King v. Delaval, 1 Wm. Bl. 410, 439.

Without entering into a discussion of St. 31 Car. II, or St. 56 Geo. III, c. 100, touching the writ of habeas corpus, or whether it is permissible to use affidavits in cases involving criminal matters in this state, it is sufficient to say that, where the writ is used as a means of determining the custody of an infant, the better practice is to hear evidence viva voce, or taken after notice and with opportunity for cross-examination, where practicable, but that this is not an inflexible rule, and that the presiding judge is vested with discretion as to admitting affidavits, under the circumstances of the case.

In the proceeding now before us, the presiding judge, in the exercise of his discretion, admitted certain affidavits. The plaintiff in error, who assigns this ruling as error, carries the burden of showing that it is such. The record discloses nothing as to the circumstances on which the court based his ruling, nor any facts which would show that there was an abuse of discretion in it. They were cumulative, also, of very positive testimony delivered on the stand by the applicant for the writ. Under the facts as disclosed by the record, we cannot say that there was any such error in this ruling as to require a reversal.

3. On the merits of the case it may be said that there is no unusual feature to differentiate it from others of like kind. The child's mother died. The father left his infant daughter with her maternal grandmother. Later he remarried, and desired the custody of his child, which was refused. Prima facie, in the absence of anything to the contrary, the father is entitled to the custody of his child. No question of unfitness or inability to care for the child was made. The grandmother contended that the father had relinquished to her his parental control by contract. He denied that he had done so. The evidence was conflicting, but was amply sufficient to sustain the finding of the presiding judge in favor of the father. No sufficient reason is shown why this judgment should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

Where a deed under seal was made, conveying title in order to secure an indebtedness represented by a promissory note, under Civ. Code 1895, § 2771 et seq., and on its face it recited the debt and the purpose to secure it, although suit on the note became barred by the statute of limitations, the creditor could foreclose the deed as an equitable mortgage within 20 years from its execution.

While an instruction to the jury "that the presumption of law is against usury, and the burden would then be upon the defendant in this case, who sets up usury as a defense, to establish the existence of usury in the contract to your satisfaction," was not entirely apt or exact in expression, yet, when taken in connection with the entire charge, it does not require a reversal.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by A. J. Thompson & Co. against David Pusser and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

On February 6, 1892, David Pusser made to A. J. Thompson & Co. a promissory note for $410.71, due on the 1st day of October after date. It was not a sealed instrument, under the law of this state. On the same day he executed to Thompson & Co., who were stated to be a firm composed of A. J. Thompson and G. P. Stubbs, a deed conveying certain described land. In the body of the instrument, as set out in the record, was the following clause: "This conveyance is intended to operate as provided in sections 1869, 1970, and 1971 of the Code of 1882, in regard to the sale of property to secure debts, and to pass the title of the property described into the said A. J. Thompson & Co., the debt hereby secured being one promissory note, for $10.71 [$410.71?], dated this day and due October 1, 1892." It was also provided that, if the debt should not be paid promptly at maturity, the grantees, their agents, or legal representatives, should be authorized to advertise the property and sell it at public outcry, making a conveyance to the purchaser in fee simple, "thereby divesting out of the said David Pusser all right and equity that he may have in and to said property, and vesting the same in the purchaser or purchasers aforesaid." In that event the proceeds were to be first applied to the payment of the debt and expenses of the sale, and the balance, if any, to be paid to Pusser. The note was not paid at maturity, and thereafter the right to bring suit on it became barred by the statute of limitations. In 1906 the holder of the security deed (the surviving partner of the firm) filed a petition in the superior court, alleging the making of the note, the giving of the deed to secure the debt, that it had not been paid, and that Pusser had remained in possession continuously since the note and deed were made. It was prayed that the security deed be foreclosed as an equitable mortgage; that the land be sold, the proceeds be applied to the liquidation of the debt specified in such deed and the payment of costs of the proceeding, and the surplus, if any, be paid over to Pusser; and that his equity of redemption be forever barred. A general judgment on the note and for attorney's fees was also prayed, but this was stricken on demurrer. A demurrer was interposed on the grounds that the instrument referred to in the petition was not a mortgage, but a deed to secure a debt, and could not be foreclosed as a mortgage, and that the plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law, and was not entitled to any decree of foreclosure. These grounds of demurrer were overruled. The defendants pleaded that there was usury in the transaction, that the title which the deed purported to convey was thereby rendered void, and that accordingly the instrument could not be foreclosed or enforced. The jury found for the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and the defendants (Pusser's wife having been joined with him) excepted.

Herbert L. Grice and Tomlinson Fort, for plaintiffs in error. H. F. Lawson and W. G. & Warren Grice, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The principal question in this case is whether the plaintiff could proceed by equitable petition to foreclose the security deed as an equitable mortgage. At common law a mortgage was originally treated as a conveyance of property, defeasible by the payment of the debt secured when due. The title conveyed was like other estates defeasible upon condition subsequent. To relieve debtors from the hardship resulting from a forfeiture or loss of the property by mere failure to pay promptly, often resulting in an unconscionable advantage to the creditor and the obtaining by him of property valued far beyond the debt secured, equity interposed and permitted them to redeem the land by the payment of principal and interest, instead of losing it entirely. Efforts were made by creditors to shape contracts which would forfeit the property to them on non-payment, or prevent redemption; but such attempts met with but little favor in courts of equity. Thus grew up the somewhat peculiar situation that in courts of law a mortgage conveyed a title defeasible upon condition, while in courts of equity the real nature of the transaction—the securing of payment to the creditor—was considered, and redemption was allowed after default in making payment according to the promise. Thus came to be established what is known as the "equity of redemption," which in modern times has been recognized as the right of the mortgagor, and for many purposes he has been treated as the substantial owner of the land, except as against the secured creditor. Lord Mansfield went quite far in expressing this view, and in referring to a mortgage as only a security. In America a number of states have adopted the plan of treating a mortgage only as a security or lien, rather than as a conveyance of title. 1 Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 6 et seq. Such is the status of a mortgage in Georgia, where Civ. Code 1895, § 2723, declares that "a mortgage in this state is only a security for debt, and passes no title." As a natural result of holding a mortgage to be a mere lien, other things might intervene and seriously interfere with the security. A power of sale contained in a mortgage was held to terminate upon the death of the mortgagor. A year's support for the family or dower for the widow might claim precedence. In order to provide greater security for the creditor, and to prevent matters of the kind referred to from endangering the collection of the debt, the Legislature provided that a conveyance of the actual title could be made, with bond to reconvey upon payment. Provision was also made by which the creditor, upon upon recovering judgment against his debtor, might file and have recorded a deed reconveying the property to the latter, and levy on and sell it for the debt; and priority was given to him, upon pursuing the statutory remedy, over other judgments against the debtor.

It will be observed that this authorized the conveyance of title as security, somewhat analogous to the common-law mortgage. Upon nonpayment, the creditor could proceed as above indicated, or he could bring ejectment against his debtor, and recover possession of the land. Still the substantial fact that this conveyance was for the purpose of security, and not to convey an indefeasible title, was recognized. In 1889 the Legislature passed an act providing that, where such deed was made to secure a debt, the surrender and cancellation of the deed in the same manner that mortgages are canceled, on payment of the debt, should operate to reconvey the title, "and such cancellation may be entered of record by the clerk of the superior court in the same manner that cancellations of mortgages are now entered." Civ. Code 1895, § 2774. By section 2775 it is declared that the vendor's right to reconveyance of the property, upon compliance with the contract, shall not be affected by any liens, incumbrances, or rights which would otherwise attach to the property by virtue of the title being in the vendee; but the right of the vendor to a reconveyance shall be absolute and permanent upon his compliance with his contract with the vendee, according to the terms thereof. It has been held that if the holder of such a deed sues the maker in ejectment or complaint for land, and recovers possession, he does not hold it absolutely freed from all claim on the part of the debtor; but the latter may still bring him to an accounting, and repossess himself of the land upon payment of the debt. Polhill v. Brown, 84 Ga. 338 (10), 10 S. E. 921. If suit is brought by the holder of the deed to recover possession of the land from the maker, the latter may file an equitable plea, and prevent the recovery by paying the amount due. Id.; Lackey v. Bostwick, 54 Ga. 45. As against the rest of the world, except the creditor or one claiming under him, the debtor remaining in possession is so far treated as the owner that he may defend an action of ejectment, or may bring one if evicted, and the security deed which he has made, subject to the contract to reconvey on payment of the debt, cannot be set up against him as paramount outstanding title by a person who does not connect his title therewith. Ashley v. Cook, 109 Ga. 653, 35 S. E. 89.

These illustrations will suffice to show that while a conveyance may be made to secure a debt, which will carry the title, and not stand exactly like a mortgage in the ordinary form, yet in many ways the substance of the transaction, that the underlying purpose is to secure a debt, and that there are equities remaining in the debtor, is recognized. The deed made in this case on its face recognized an equity in the debtor after failure to pay the debt at maturity, by authorizing the creditor, if he saw fit, to make sale, discharge the debt, and pay the balance to the debtor. A consideration of what has been said naturally leads to an understanding of the reason underlying decisions which have been made on the subject of whether such a deed can be foreclosed as an equitable mortgage, by petition invoking the equitable jurisdiction of the court. By section 2725 of the Civil Code of 1895 it is declared that "a deed or bill of sale, absolute on its face and accompanied with possession of the property, shall not be proved (at the instance of the parties) by parol evidence to be a mortgage only, unless fraud in its procurement is the issue to be tried." Where such a deed was given without referring to the indebtedness, and apparently conveying an absolute title, but the debtor remained in possession, it was held that he (or rather his widow, in a contest with other creditors) could show that the conveyance was only intended to secure a debt, and thus operated as an equitable mortgage. Carter v. Hallahan, 61 Ga. 314. On such a title the creditor could bring ejectment, or, if he chose, the deed could be foreclosed in equity as an equitable mortgage. Bateman v. Archer, 65 Ga. 271. In Wofford v. Wyly, 72 Ga. 863, a deed made to secure a debt, though absolute in form, where the debtor remained in possession, was treated as an equitable mortgage, and subject to equitable defenses, when an action of ejectment to recover the land was brought upon it. In Broach v. Smith, 75 Ga. 159, it was held that "a conveyance made under section 1969 of the Code [section 2771 of the Civil Code of 1895] to secure a debt, and which is void as title on account of usury, cannot be foreclosed as an equitable mortgage." The inference may be drawn that, if the deed had not been void for usury, it might have been so foreclosed, though this was not affirmatively ruled. In Merrihew v. Fort (C. C.) 98 Fed. 899, the District Judge of the United States, presiding in the Circuit Court, held that, "under Civ. Code Ga. 1895, § 2771 et seq., a deed to real estate, given to secure a debt, may be foreclosed by the grantee as a mortgage, notwithstanding a provision therein that it is to be construed as a deed passing title, and not as a mortgage; such provision being one for the benefit of the grantee, which he may waive at his election." See, also, Ray v. Tatum, 72 Fed. 112, 18 C. O. A. 464; Bank of the Metropolis v. Guttschlick, 14 Pet. 20, 10 L. Ed. 335. In North Carolina and West Virginia deeds of trust to secure an indebtedness, as there customarily made, have been treated as equitable mortgages. Arrington v. Rowland, 97 N. C. 127, 1 S. E. 555; Criss v. Criss, 28 W. Va. 388; 1 Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) §§ 62, 162, et seq. See, also, Hester v. Gairdner, 128 Ga. 531, 58 S. E. 165.

While the statute provides a method by which a judgment can be obtained against a debtor, a reconveyance made for the purpose of levying and a sale made, with certain advantages and priorities in favor of the creditor pursuing such method, and while he also has the option to bring suit for the recovery of possession of the land by virtue of the title conveyed by the security deed, yet this does not prevent him, if he so chooses, from treating the instrument as an equitable mortgage and proceeding to foreclose it by equitable petition. If he elects to do so, what effect, if any, it may have on the priorities and advantages given to him, where he proceeds in strict conformity to the statute, is not in question. The contention now made is as to whether he can pursue the remedy of filing an equitable petition to foreclose the instrument as an equitable mortgage, instead of pursuing the statutory plan. We think that he can do so. Even if ordinarily such a deed could not be treated by the grantee as an equitable mortgage, and foreclosed as such, there is a special reason why he should be allowed to do so in this case. Suit on the note is barred by the statute of limitations. He cannot, therefore, recover judgment on it, file a deed and levy upon the land on the manner pointed out by the statute. But the debt remains unpaid. If he should bring ejectment against the debtor and recover possession, that would not satisfy the debtor, nor would it operate as a finality as to the equities between them; but, as already stated, it has been held that, after recovery of possession, he could not hold the land as the absolute, indefeasible owner, but would be subject to an equitable accounting for rents, issues, and profits, and to have the land ultimately restored to the debtor when the debt had been discharged. Why should the creditor be compelled to recover possession and hold it subject to an equity on the part of the debtor? He may do so, but will the law hold him to that method of procedure? If there are equities which may ultimately require adjustment between parties, why should a court having equitable jurisdiction refuse to adjust them now, instead of compelling one of the parties to wait until, at some definite time, he may be called on to do so by the other, or perhaps by lapse of time, death, forgetfulness, or other reason it has become difficult to clearly prove the facts? One of the maxims of equity is "Vigilantibus, non dormientibus, jura subveniunt." If to the vigilant, rather than to those who sleep over their rights or delay in asserting them, equity gives aid, and if laches in appealing to a court of equity sometimes furnishes reason for refusing relief, why should a court which administers equitable remedies refuse to finally adjust and determine the equities existing between the parties in a case like the one before us, and compel the secured creditor to resort to an inadequate legal remedy, and one which neither gives him absolute and infeasible title nor repays him his money, and postpones indefinitely the final settlement or adjustment between him and his debtor? This would be not merely to permit the exercise of a privilege similar to that which existed in England of entering upon mortgaged property and working out the debt, but would compel the creditor to take that course.

The decisions in the cases of Story v. Dorris, 110 Ga. 65, 35 S. E. 314, and Duke v. Story, 116 Ga. 388, 42 S. E. 722, do not conflict with what is here held. In the former of those two cases the debt to secure which an absolute conveyance was made became barred by the statute of limitations. The deed made no reference to it, but was absolute on its face. It was executed, also, not by the debtor himself, but one from whom he had contracted to purchase the land. The agreement that the title so conveyed should be held as a security rested entirely in parol. It was held that, after the right to sue upon the debt had become barred, equity would not undertake to foreclose "the equivalent of what might be termed an oral mortgage," there being nothing in writing or under seal to bind the debtor or prove an unbarred debt. So, likewise, in the case of Duke v. Story, it was held that "a security deed which does not refer in any way to the debt to secure which it was given, or furnish any evidence of its existence, cannot be foreclosed as an equitable mortgage, and a money judgment obtained thereon, if the obligation secured by the deed is barred by the statute of limitations." Neither of these decisions repudiate, but both recognize, the doctrine announced in Elkins v. Edwards, 8 Ga. 325, where it was held that "when a creditor takes a mortgage to secure the payment of a promissory note, and the remedy on the latter is barred by the statute of limitations, his remedy, on the mortgage, is not necessarily barred, the debt being unpaid; but the creditor may avail himself of the statutory remedy to foreclose his mortgage, in satisfaction of his debt." In that case the mortgage was given to secure certain notes; and, the debt being thus referred to and described in a sealed instrument made to secure it, the fact that the remedy by suit upon the notes was barred did not destroy or bar the right to foreclose the mortgage. The difference will be readily perceived between a deed absolute on its face and containing no reference to a debt, where the only evidence of the indebtedness rests in parol or in a separate note suit on which is barred by the statute of limitations, and a mortgage or security deed under seal, which contains in itself evidence of the indebtedness which it was given to secure.

There was no error in overruling the demurrer. It contained one or two other grounds besides that above discussed, but they are not referred to in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error.

2, 3. The grounds of the motion for a new trial contain nothing which requires a reversal. The evidence was conflicting as to whether there was usury in the original transaction when the security deed was executed, or whether some time thereafter, as an independent transaction, an effort was made to charge usury; but it was not such as to demand a finding that the deed was infected with usury, and was therefore void.

The court instructed the jury "that the presumption of law is against usury, and the burden would be upon the defendant in this case, who sets up usury as a defense, to establish the existence of usury in the contract to your satisfaction." This expression was perhaps not technically accurate or apt; but, when taken in connection with the entire charge, it practically informed the jury that when a deed to secure a debt was apparently regular and lawful, and did not disclose any usury on its face, and the defendant sought to have it declared void by setting up that it was infected with usury, this was an affirmative plea, and the burden of establishing it would rest upon the defendant.

Exception was taken to the use of the expression "the presumption of law is against usury." It might be interesting, but would be aside from the necessities of the case, to trace the history of many presumptions of law—how at first they were mere inferences of fact, which the jury might draw if they saw fit; how, after having undergone a novitate in the jury box alone, they then arose to the dignity of furnishing a prima facie presumption, which was rebuttable; and how some of them were ultimately graduated into the circle of conclusive presumptions of law.

From the entire charge it was evident that the court did not lead the jury to believe that there was any conclusive presumption against usury, but merely that he who set up affirmatively the existence of usury, and sought to avoid a deed by doing so, carried the burden of sustaining his contention. In McBrayer v. Walker, 122 Ga. 246, 50 S. E. 95, an entry on the deed itself indicated that it was void as title, because a part of a usurious transaction. The burden was thus on the plaintiff to explain the entry.

Objection is also taken to the expression "to your satisfaction," without adding specifically that a preponderance of evidence would suffice for that purpose. No request to charge appears to have been made on that subject. It has been held that, in the absence of a request, it is not error requiring a reversal to omit to define what constitutes a preponderance of evidence, or what may be considered in determining it. That point is not, of course, identical with the one now made, but is somewhat similar. Gunn v. Harris, 88 Ga. 439 (5), 14 S. E. 593; Ga. Sou. & Fla. Ry. Co. v. Young Investment Co., 119 Ga. 513, 46 S. E. 644. In view of the whole charge, in the absence of any request for additional instructions, we do not think that the jury were at all likely to have been misled by this expression, or by the omission to state specifically that "in all civil cases the preponderance of testimony is considered sufficient to produce mental conviction."

RAILROADS (§ 345*)—INJURY TO PERSONS ON TRACK—NONSUIT.

The evidence introduced by the plaintiff being insufficient to support the essential allegations in the petition, the court did not err in granting a nonsuit upon motion of the defendant.

Action by Anton Motz against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Oliver & Oliver, for plaintiff in error. H. W. Johnson and Lawton & Cunningham, for defendant in error.

BECK, J. Anton Motz brought suit against the Central of Georgia Railway Company to recover damages for the homicide of his son Horace, alleging that the deceased had been killed in consequence of the negligent operation of a train by the agents and employees of the defendant company, and that at the time of his death the deceased was in the exercise of all due and reasonable care. This case was before the Supreme Court at a previous term, and is to be found reported in 130 Ga. 414, 61 S. E. 1. A complete statement of the facts, as alleged in the petition, is there to be found. In the decision in that case it was held that the court below erred in dismissing plaintiff's case upon demurrer. The cause, having been remanded, again came on for trial, and resulted in a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted. It is unnecessary to restate in full the allegations of the petition here, as they may be seen upon reference to the report of the case in 130 Ga. 414, 61 S. E. 1.

After a careful examination of the evidence in this record, we are of the opinion that the court below did not err in granting the judgment of nonsuit. The evidence for the plaintiff failed completely to establish the essential allegations of the petition; and, beyond the proof of circumstances from which the jury might have inferred that the deceased met his death by being struck by the engine or cars of the defendant company, there is no proof to support the material allegations of the petition. The petition alleges that the deceased stood on a public crossing, which was blocked by one of the defendant's trains; but the evidence shows that when struck the deceased was about opposite the depot, 75 or 100 feet from the crossing. There is no evidence that the crossing was a public road crossing. One witness referred to it as a "dirt road crossing," and said: "It is open to the public." Another witness for the plaintiff testified: "It is a regular railroad crossing, like most stations have." But the witness last referred to also testified: "I do not mean to say that this is a public road, laid out and maintained by the county authorities. I mean that it is used by the public." In the petition it is alleged that, while the deceased was standing on the crossing, a through freight approached at the "rapid rate of speed of about 20 miles per hour, and proceeded along said side track in the direction of said crossing, without reducing its speed, and without blowing any whistle, or ringing any bell, or checking speed, or otherwise complying with the requirements of the laws of Georgia relative to the duties imposed in approaching a public crossing." A witness for the plaintiff testified that the through freight was moving at an "ordinary rate of speed, about 7 or 8 miles per hour."

In the declaration the petitioner accounts for the presence of his son in the perilous position between the local freight train, which is alleged to have been on the main line, and the incoming through freight train, passing over the switch, by alleging that his son did not know of the approach of the through freight until "same was upon them, and they were caught in the narrow space between the two tracks on which the moving trains were passing." No facts or circumstances are proved to support this allegation. It does not appear from the petition that any member of the crew of either the local freight or the through freight actually knew of the presence of the deceased. It is not proved, nor is it alleged, as in the case of Crawford v. Southern Ry. Co., 106 Ga. 872, 33 S. E. 826, that on account of circumstances there was reason to apprehend the presence of any one at the place where the deceased was at the time he met his death. There is no evidence whatever that the locality at which the plaintiff's son was killed was populous, or in a place where the employees in charge of defendant's train were bound to anticipate the presence of any one upon or between its tracks. It is not shown by the evidence that the public, or any portion thereof, was accustomed to use the place on the track near the depot where the evidence shows the boy was struck. There was nothing to show why the deceased was at that place, nor that he had any right to be there. Under the facts of this case, as developed by the evidence, mere proof that the deceased was killed by one of defendant's trains did not raise a presumption of negligence against the defendant.

In other respects than those mentioned, there was a variance between the allegations and the proof; but the defects in the case as made by the evidence, and pointed out above, show that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and that the grant of a nonsuit was proper.

GILLESPIE et al. v. POWELL.

DEEDS (§ 119*)—ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)
—QUESTION FOR JURY—EVIDENCE—IDENTITY OF LAND.

Under the pleadings and the evidence, the court erred in directing a verdict for the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Gordon County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by W. J. Gillespie and others against J. H. Powell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

O. N. Starr and R. J. & J. McCamy, for plaintiffs in error. J. G. B. Erwin, Jr., for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiffs filed a statutory complaint to recover from the defendant a tract of land described in the petition as follows: "Two acres, more or less, of lot No. 263 in the Seventh district and third section, and described as follows: Located near the southeast corner of the south half of said lot, and bounded on the north, east, and west by Pine Log creek, and on the south by lands of Henry Langston, and lying in the bend or fork of said Pine Log creek, and the same lands deeded to J. H. Powell by Z. T. Terrell." The defendant filed an answer, denying that plaintiffs had any title to the land, and setting up a prescriptive title of 20 years' adverse possession, and 7 years' adverse possession under color of title. Plaintiffs and defendant claim under a common grantor, Lewis. Upon the conclusion of the evidence, the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs excepted.

Upon the trial the plaintiffs introduced in evidence a deed from Lewis to a mortgage company to secure a debt, dated February 1, 1889, conveying all of lot No. 263, except 2 acres on the west side of Pine Log creek, containing 158 acres, more or less. Other deeds were introduced to show that the property conveyed in this deed was sold under judicial process, and the title finally passed into the plaintiffs under a deed describing the property as it was described in the deed from Lewis to the mortgage company. It appears from the testimony that Lewis conveyed 2 acres of this land lot, located on the creek, to Butler. This deed does not appear in the record, and the deed of its execution nowhere appears. Plaintiffs claim that the 2 acres excepted in the deeds above named refer to the land conveyed by Lewis to Butler. The defendant contends that the 2 acres excepted in the deeds above named refer to the land sued for, and lie across the creek from the balance of the lot. The Butler land, as shown by the testimony, lies on the creek, but is not separated from the balance of the tract by the creek. The testimony of one of the plaintiffs was that the land in dispute was surrounded by the creek, and that it lay on the south side of the creek, and that "the piece that Powell bought from Claiborne Butler is in the southeast corner of the lot. The way the creek runs, the creek kinder runs around it; and that's why I say that it lies west of Pine Log creek." Lewis testified that the land in dispute lay south or west of the creek; that the Butler land does not lie west of the creek, but lies northeast of the creek; that the land in dispute was in the horseshoe bend of the creek. There was other testimony as to the location of these two tracts, but no plat or survey of the land was introduced in evidence. One of the plaintiffs testified that when he obtained an option on the land, before he bought it, Lewis told him the 2 acres excepted in the deed was the land he sold to Butler, and that it was not the land in dispute. One of the plaintiffs also testified: "He said that he bought it from Joe Ab Lewis, and that it was my land. He said: 'It's your land, and I consider I can't hold the land.' He went on to say he was satisfied that he bought it, that it was the land company's land, and that they kept after him six or eight weeks, and that he thought possibly—said he was getting it cheap, for $20, and if he got it a year or two it would pay. Mr. Powell said that. I went and had the land surveyed with the surveyor and the land proceSSIONERS, and they give that to me—laid it out and marked it out to me."

The testimony shows that the land sued for was in the bend of the creek, and across the creek from the rest of the land lot; and one of the plaintiffs testified that this land in dispute was on the south side of the creek. The land sued for was a part of land lot 263, and the deed under which the plaintiffs claimed conveyed all of this lot, except 2 acres on the west side of the creek. In view of all the evidence in the case, we think it was a question for the jury to decide whether or not the land excepted in the deeds under which the plaintiffs claim title referred to the land in dispute. If the 2 acres excepted in the plaintiffs' deeds referred to the land in dispute, across the creek, the plaintiffs could not recover. If this exception does not apply to this land sued for, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover, unless some good defense is shown.

The defendant contended that he had a good title by prescription by reason of seven years' possession under color of title. The deed made by Terrell to Powell was executed in 1903, less than seven years before the filing of this suit; hence Powell could not claim a prescriptive title by reason of his own possession for seven years under color of title. It appears from the testimony that Terrell, under whom Powell claims, obtained a deed from Lewis in 1886, and that this deed was lost, and a copy thereof at some time established. It does not appear that this deed was ever recorded. The deed of the plaintiffs' predecessor in title was made and recorded before Terrell made a deed to the defendant. Lewis testified: "I reckon this paper that I delivered to Terrell was to better secure a debt. It was already secured. It was my own proposition to secure the debt. I owed $630 here on an old judgment that was against the property that I had already mortgaged, and I deeded some property to get up that money; and he got the money for me, and in a short while he made me a trade on some land, and got Mr. Terrell to advance the loan that he had got for me, and Mr. Terrell come to my house, and I told him to better secure him I would make this deed to a little parcel of land to better secure him." If the deed from Lewis to Terrell was not recorded, and Terrell was not in possession of the disputed land when Lewis made the deed to the mortgage company, and the latter took and recorded its deed without being charged with notice of the deed from Lewis to Terrell, this deed to Terrell would not be valid as against the mortgage company or those claiming under them. It further appears from the testimony that Lewis made the deal in selling the land to Powell, and the testimony indicates that Terrell never got any of the purchase money paid by Powell. It does not appear that any one was a party to the suit to establish a copy of the lost deed from Lewis to Terrell, except the parties to the deed. Lewis further testified: "Terrell never rented this land. I rented it all the time. I don't think he ever got any of the rents."

It appears uncertain from the testimony that Terrell was ever in possession of the land, by himself or through any one else, and under the evidence in the record before us the court could not say as a matter of law that there was any possession under color of title by Terrell, under whom Powell held, which could be tacked to the possession of Powell so as to make out seven years' adverse possession under color of title. Under the record the defendant could not contend that he has a prescriptive title by possession for 20 years by himself and those under whom he holds, even if Terrell went into possession of the land when the alleged deed from Lewis to him was made, because this deed, according to the testimony, was made in April, 1886, and this suit was filed less than 20 years thereafter, to the February term, 1906. There is no contention that any one was in possession of this land adverse to Lewis, the common grantor, prior to the making of the alleged deed in April, 1886.

We think the court committed error in directing a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the judgment is reversed. All the Justices concur.

CULVER v. LAMBERT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 490*)—FORECLOSURE ACTION—EXECUTION—SALE—VALIDITY.

A borrower secured his note for the loan of money by deed to land, and upon default in payment at maturity the lender sued the note to judgment, upon which judgment an execution issued, and was levied on the land, without the lender having first reconveyed it to the borrower. At this sale the lender purchased the land, and a deed was made to him by the sheriff. Subsequently the lender, who had not previously conveyed the land to any one, after having made a deed to the defendant in execution, and after having had the same duly recorded, caused the execution again to be levied on the land, and the land sold thereunder by the sheriff. Held: (1) That the first sale was illegal and void; (2) that the second sale was valid. The case of Napier v. Saulsbury, 63 Ga. 477, distinguished. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 490.*]

2. EXECUTION (§ 285*)—INVALID SALE—RENTS AND PROFITS—LIABILITY OF PURCHASER.

Where the lender went into possession under the first sale, he would be accountable to the borrower for the rents, issues, and profits intermediate of the two sales; but, if such rents and profits were insufficient to discharge the judgment, the resale of the property would not be invalid on this account, even as to the lender.

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by Emma J. Culver against M. A. Lambert. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. O. Lovett, for plaintiff in error. O. L. Pettigrew, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. On February 5, 1895, Emma J. Culver borrowed $1,000 from the University of the South, and secured her note for the loan by a conveyance to the lender of a certain lot of land. Judgment was obtained on the note in May, 1898, and the execution issued thereon was levied on the land, and it was sold on August 2, 1898, and purchased by the lender, who was plaintiff in fi. fa., for $100. The plaintiff did not file any deed of reconveyance to the defendant in fi. fa. previous to the levy of the execution. Subsequently, on April 1, 1903, the University of the South conveyed the land to the defendant for the purpose of levy and sale, which deed was duly recorded, and thereafter caused its execution to be levied on the land, which was brought to sale after due advertisement, and the plaintiff in fi. fa. became the purchaser. On July 21, 1905, the University of the South sold and conveyed the land to M. A. Lambert. Afterwards the defendant in fi. fa., Emma Culver, instituted her action against M. A. Lambert to recover the land, and upon the foregoing facts appearing the court directed a verdict for the defendant, M. A. Lambert.

1. The controlling question in the case is whether the title of Emma J. Culver was divested under the last sale by the sheriff. It is admitted that the first sale was void. Where one borrows money from another, and makes him a deed to land to secure the debt, and the lender sues the borrower upon his failure to pay the debt at maturity, and obtains a judgment against him, before the execution is levied on the land given as security, the lender must reconvey the land to the borrower, and have the deed of reconveyance recorded; and a sale made under a levy without such deed of reconveyance is void, and will be set aside at the instance of the borrower. Benedict v. Gammon Theo- logical Seminary, 122 Ga. 412, 50 S. E. 162. The effect of the cancellation of the deed to the purchaser at the sheriff's sale by a court of equity on this ground is to nullify the proceedings had under the judgment from the time of the illegal levy. The judgment for the debt is not invalidated, but is still enforceable against the land by a levy of the execution, made after the record of a deed of reconveyance by the lender to the borrower. The parties to the illegal sale may voluntarily do what the courts will decree they shall do; that is, they may voluntarily cancel the illegal sale under the same circumstances where a court of equity would decree a cancellation. It is necessary, however, that a voluntary agreement to cancel a sale of this character shall be participated in by the purchaser at the sheriff's sale. He has been induced by the act of the plaintiff to put his money in the land, and the plaintiff will not be allowed to deprive him of his money, and retrace his illegal steps at pleasure, without restitution or adjustment of the purchaser's rights. Napier v. Saulsbury, 63 Ga. 477. But where the lender, who is the plaintiff, is also the purchaser at an illegal and void sheriff's sale, we see no reason why he cannot treat the sale as void, and proceed in the manner which he should have first adopted in the enforcement of his execution. The defendant cannot complain that the plaintiff treats as void a sale which the law pronounces invalid, and proceeds to sell again. The illegal sale did not change the status. It neither invalidated the plaintiff's judgment, nor divested the defendant's title. If the defendant had appealed to a court of equity to cancel the sheriff's deed to the plaintiff on the ground of the illegality of the sale, he could not equitably claim that the proceeds of the sale should be applied upon his debt. He could not have both the land and its proceeds. The second sale could hardly have had the effect of depressing the price of the land because of the prior illegal sale, since the rights of no new parties were injected into the transaction, and it was manifest that the only purpose was to bring the land to sale in a legal manner, under an execution issuing from a judgment founded on a debt to the plaintiff which the defendant had secured by conveying the land to the plaintiff. In the case in hand the plaintiff was the purchaser at the first sale, and in possession of the land at the time he caused the execution to be relevied; and this circumstance differentiates the case from that of Napier v. Saulsbury, supra, where a stranger was the purchaser at the first sale, and in possession at the time the plaintiff in execution undertook for the second time to have the land levied on and sold. We think that the last sale of the land was valid, and the title of the defendant was divested thereby.

2. At the conclusion of the evidence the plaintiff offered an amendment to the effect that, after the first sale of the land in 1898, the purchaser thereat, the University of the South, went into possession and remained in possession until 1903, when it conveyed the land to M. A. Lambert, during which time it received the rents, and had quarried enough stone from the land to pay off the judgment, if properly accounted for; and the plaintiff prayed that the University of the South be made a party to the suit, and "be made to account for the rents and for the value of the rock taken from said land, and said sums be placed as a credit on said judgment." It was also alleged that M. A. Lambert had received, since her purchase, large sums from the sale of rock quarried on the land; and an accounting was asked for the rents and the value of the rock quarried by her. The facts pertaining to the sales of the land, as they appear in the first part of this opinion, were also alleged, and it was prayed that the sales by the sheriff be canceled and set aside. The amendment was disallowed, and properly so. The first sale of the land did not divest the title of E. J. Culver; and when the University of the South entered into possession of the land by virtue of being the purchaser at this illegal sale, it became accountable to her for the rents and profits of the land. Polhill v. Brown, 84 Ga. 338, 10 S. E. 921; Dottenheim v. Union Savings Bank & Trust Co., 114 Ga. 788, 40 S. E. 825. Such rents and profits should have been applied to the credit of the judgment; and, if insufficient to have discharged it at the time of the second levy, the execution could legally proceed for the balance. The allegations that the University of the South had quarried sufficient rock to discharge its judgment while it was in possession of the land is too indefinite as an attack upon the judgment as being satisfied at the time of the second sale. The allegation is that the quarrying of stone by the University of the South occurred between 1898 and 1905. The second sale was legal, if the judgment was not satisfied, and this sale took place in 1903. How much stone was quarried before 1903 is not alleged. Since this last sale the University of the South had title, and, of course, could quarry the land ad libitum. No value is placed on the stone alleged to have been quarried, but only the vague statement made that enough stone was quarried, if properly accounted for, to pay off the judgment; and the prayer is that the amount found to be due on an accounting be credited on the judgment. This averment is too vague to raise the issue that the last sale was void, because had under an execution which had been settled. Indeed, the plaintiff does not pray for a cancellation of the sheriff's deed on the ground that the sale is void, because the judgment was fully paid off and discharged. If the defendant has a cause of action against the University of the South for rents and profits received from the land while in its possession intermediate of the two sales, it is an entirely different controversy from the present suit. If M. A. Lambert's title is good, she had the right to quarry the stone since her purchase.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurred.

LONG et al. v. ROSE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 142*)—OFFICERS—ELIGIBILITY—HOLDING OTHER OFFICE.

Pol. Code 1895, § 223, declares that "persons holding any office of profit or trust under the government of the United States (other than that of postmaster), or of either of the several states, or of any foreign state," are "held and deemed ineligible to hold any civil office in this state." Held, that this did not render one who held the office of solicitor of the county court of a county ineligible to hold the office of mayor of a municipal corporation located in such county; nor did it render persons who respectively held the offices of county treasurer and member of the board of education of the county ineligible to hold the offices of aldermen of such municipal corporation.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Camden County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Quo warranto by J. M. Long and others against D. P. Rose and others. From a judgment dismissing the case, relators bring error. Affirmed.

J. M. Long and others made application for leave to file an information in the nature of a quo warranto against D. P. Rose, W. H. Mullin, and J. R. Bachlott, in order to inquire into their right to hold the offices of mayor and aldermen of the city of St. Mary's. Permission being granted to file the information, the relators alleged as follows: They are residents, citizens, and taxpayers of St. Mary's. Under and by virtue of the charter of that city, on or about the first Monday in April, 1908, the Governor of the state appointed and commissioned respondent Rose as mayor of the city and respondents Mullin and Bachlott as aldermen, each for the term of one year. Each of them accepted the appointment and was duly commissioned, taking the oath of office and assuming and entering upon the discharge of the duties thereof, and is still doing so. They are without legal warrant or authority for so doing, each of them being ineligible to hold the office for the reasons hereafter stated: "Relators charge that respondent D. P. Rose is holding the office of mayor of said city without legal warrant and authority so to do, and is ineligible to hold said office, for the reason that at the time of his appointment and commission, and at the time of his taking the oath and assuming the discharge of the duties of said office of mayor, he was and is now commissioned, qualified, and exercising the duties of and holding an office of profit and trust under the government of the state of Georgia, to wit, solicitor of the county court of Camden." Respondent Mullin is holding the office of alderman of said city without legal warrant or authority so to do, and is ineligible to hold said office, for the reason that at the time of his appointment and commission, and at the time of his taking the oath and assuming the discharge of the duties of said office, he was and is now commissioned, qualified, and exercising the duties of and holding an office of profit and trust under the government of the state of Georgia, to wit, member of the board of education of Camden county. Respondent Bachlott is holding the office of alderman of said city without legal warrant or authority so to do, and is ineligible to hold said office, for the reason at the time of his appointment and commission, and at the time of his taking the oath and assuming the discharge of the duties of said office, he was and is now commissioned, qualified, and exercising the duties of and holding an office of profit and trust under the government of the state of Georgia, to wit, treasurer of Camden county. For these reasons respondents are mere de facto officials of the city, and relators pray that they be ousted. The respondents answered, admitting that they were appointed to the offices of mayor and aldermen, respectively, and that they were discharging the duties thereof, but denied that they were ineligible to do so. They admitted, also, holding the other offices described in the information. They alleged that respondent Rose was appointed mayor subsequently to his appointment as solicitor, and that he was no longer solicitor of the county court. They also alleged that each of them was a resident and freeholder of the city at the time of his appointment and qualification, and so remained. By consent of counsel for both parties the case was heard before the judge of the superior court at chambers on the petition and answer, there being no issue of fact. He denied the prayer of the petition, and dismissed the case. The relators excepted.

W. G. Brantley and Brantley & Butts, for plaintiffs in error. Osborne & Lawrence, for defendants in error.

ATKINSON, J. At common law there was no inhibition against the holding of more than one office, provided they were not inconsistent with each other. In many of the United States there are constitutional provisions or legislative acts on this subject, limiting the power to hold different offices or prohibiting the holding of certain different offices at the same time or rendering certain persons holding offices of a particular character ineligible to offices of another described character. In this state Pol. Code 1895, § 223, declares as follows: "The following persons are held and deemed ineligible to hold any civil office in this state, and the existence of either of the following states of facts is a sufficient reason for vacating any office held by such person, but the acts of such person, while holding a commission, are valid as the acts of an officer de facto, viz.: * * * (4) Holding Other Offices.—Persons holding any office of profit or trust under the government of the United States (other than that of postmaster), or of either of the several states, or of any foreign state." This first appeared codified in the original Code which took effect January 1, 1863. By act approved September 11, 1891 (Acts 1890-91, p. 102), an act was passed, the caption of which was "An act to prohibit in this state the holding of more than one county office by one person, at any one time, and for other purposes." It is now embodied in Pol. Code 1895, § 224, as follows: "No person shall hold, in any manner whatever, or be commissioned to hold at one time, more than one county office, except by special enactment of the Legislature heretofore or hereafter made; nor shall any commissioned officer be deputy for any other commissioned officer, except by such special enactment." On behalf of the plaintiffs in error it is contended that the purpose of paragraph 4 of section 223 of the Political Code of 1895 was to prevent one person from absorbing and holding more offices than one, and to prevent the evils which might accrue from professional office seeking; that the state of Georgia is one of the several states of the Union, and the expression, "or of either of the several states," is sufficiently broad to cover this state; that the section referred to renders ineligible "to hold any civil office in this state," any person holding any office of profit or trust under the government of this state; that each of the offices of mayor and aldermen in the city of St. Mary's falls within the designation, "any civil office in this state"; and therefore that the respondents, who held, respectively, the offices of solicitor of the county court, member of the board of education of the county, and county treasurer, and thus held an office of profit or trust under the government of this state, were ineligible to the offices of mayor and aldermen. On the other hand, it is contended that the purpose of the Code paragraph just cited was not to prevent any person in this state from holding more than one office in it, but was to prevent persons who held any office of profit or trust under other governments, and owed allegiance to them, from becoming officials of this state, and thus having a divided allegiance to two masters; that the words "or of either of the several states" meant either of the several states other than this state, and did not include the state of Georgia; and also that, if it were otherwise, the statement that the persons described should be "ineligible to hold any civil office in this state" had reference to civil offices of a state character, and did not include mere officials of municipal corporations; that officers of the latter character did not hold a "civil office in this state," within the meaning of the Code section to which reference has been made; and that the holding of the offices of solicitor of the county court, member of the board of education of the county, and treasurer of the county, whether they would have rendered the respondents ineligible to hold another state office or county office, or not, did not make them ineligible to hold the positions of mayor and aldermen in St. Mary's.

We think it requires no argument to show that the solicitor of the county court, member of the board of education, and treasurer of the county are offices of trust, and, if they have attached to them salaries or fees, also offices of profit. It is unnecessary to the determination in this case to decide the exact meaning of the expression, "or of either of the several states," as used in the Code, because, whichever of the two contentions above stated should be maintained, the result in this case would be the same. If it should be conceded that the expression "either of the several states" was intended to and did include the state of Georgia, and that thereby persons holding any office of profit and trust under the government of this state were rendered ineligible to hold any civil office in this state, the words employed in the statute declaring ineligibility to hold "any civil office in this state" do not refer to municipal officers such as a mayor and aldermen. In State v. Wilmington City Council, 3 Har. (Del.) 294, it was held that "the office of treasurer of a public corporation (such as the city of Wilmington) is not a 'civil office in this state' within the meaning of the constitutional exclusion of the clergy from the civil office." In the body of the opinion, Bayard, Chief Justice, said: "The question presented in the second point is whether the office of treasurer in this corporation comes within the true meaning and import of the terms 'civil office in the state,' as used in the Constitution. The word 'state' has two meanings, and is used in both of them, in different parts of that instrument. In one sense it signifies the territory inhabited by the people; in the other it means the body politic inhabiting the territory. So that the words 'civil office in the state' may mean either civil office within the territory, or civil office in the frame of government or political organization which it was the business of the convention to establish. As the purpose of a Constitution is to establish the principles of government for the community as a body politic, without any particular reference to the territory which they inhabit, the primary and leading sense in which the term 'state' is used is that of the body politic." It must be remembered, too, in construing the language used, that this was not a conferring or enabling act, but a law limiting the right to hold office, or rendering ineligible certain persons who otherwise might have lawfully done so; and in construing its terms consideration should be given to that fact in determining the legislative purpose, and how far it was intended to exclude municipal officers not necessarily falling within the meaning of the words employed.

In Pennsylvania the Constitution contained a provision that "no member of Congress of this state, nor any person holding, or exercising, any office of trust or profit under the United States, shall, at the same time, hold or exercise the office of judge, secretary, treasurer, prothonotary, register of wills, recorder of deeds, sheriff, or any office in this state, to which a salary is by law annexed, or any other office which future legislators shall declare incompatible with offices or appointments under the United States." Mr. Dallas was appointed by the President of the United States as attorney for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania. The Governor also appointed him recorder of the city of Philadelphia. Application was made to the Supreme Court for leave to file an information in the nature of a writ of quo warranto, to inquire by what authority the defendant exercised the office of recorder. The court held that the recorder of the city of Philadelphia was not a judge, within the meaning of the eighth section of the second article of the Constitution of the state of Pennsylvania; the section and article above quoted. Commonwealth v. Dallas, 4 Dall. (Pa.) 229, 1 L. Ed. 812. As there reported, Chief Justice Shippen said that, although the recorder of the city of Philadelphia possesses some power and performs some duties of a judicial nature, he is not a judge, within the terms, spirit, and meaning of the eighth section of the second article of the Constitution." The same case is more fully reported in Respublica v. Dallas, 3 Yeates (Pa.) 300.

In State v. Kirk, 44 Ind. 401, 15 Am. Rep. 239, the following ruling was made: "The office of councilman in a city is an office purely and wholly municipal in its character, and such officer has no duties to perform under the general laws of the state. The office of councilman in a city, although a lucrative office in the ordinary sense of the words, is not a lucrative office within the meaning of the ninth section of the second article of the Constitution, which provides that no person shall hold more than one lucrative office at the same time." The Constitution of Indiana contained a provision that "no person elected to any judicial office shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, be eligible to any other office of trust or profit under the state, other than a judicial office." Under the provisions of a general law of that state the mayor of a city was also a judge of the city court, and had jurisdiction to try and determine suits founded on contracts or torts, when the debt or damages claimed or the value of the property sought to be recovered did not exceed $100; to issue a venire, impanel a jury, receive the verdict, grant a new trial, or enter judgment thereon; to issue writs of replevin, attachments for property, and ne exeat, capias ad respondendum, and capias ad satisfaciendum. In state transactions his jurisdiction was coextensive with the county, and he had exclusive jurisdiction where the fine assessed could not exceed $8, and concurrent jurisdiction to try and determine all cases punishable by fine only, or by fine with discretion to imprison. It was held that all this jurisdiction which was not merely incidental to his government of the city, but was a direct conference of additional powers, made him a judicial officer, and he was therefore ineligible to hold the office of sheriff. It was held, however, that "the executive and administrative duties of the mayor of a city, under the act of 1857 (Acts 1857, p. 42), are not within the executive and administrative departments of the state government, as established by the Constitution. In respect to such duties, the mayor is merely an officer of a municipal corporation, and he may discharge such duties and his judicial functions at the same time, without violating section 1 of article 3 of the Constitution" (in regard to keeping separate the three departments of government). Waldo v. Wallace, 12 Ind. 569. Perkins, J., concurred in the view that the mayor of Indianapolis, while presiding in the city court, under the laws creating it and conferring jurisdiction upon it, was a judicial officer; but in reference to the fact that the state government and the municipal government are not identical he said: "The powers which are exercised by a city government are, it thus appears, superadded to those exercised by the state in the same locality. The people of towns and cities are governed that much more than are the people of the state generally. This is deemed a necessary incident to a dense population."

A similar ruling, though less clearly expressed, was made in Howard v. Shoemaker, 35 Ind. 111. The language there used in reference to lucrative offices might be subject to misconstruction; but it was explained in the opinion in State v. Kirk, 44 Ind. 401, 15 Am. Rep. 239, where the same justice who wrote the opinion in the former case said: "It was held by this court, in Howard v. Shoemaker, supra, that the office of mayor of a city was a lucrative office within the meaning of the ninth section of article 2 of the Constitution, not because he received compensation for the discharge of such of his duties as were purely municipal in character, but for the reason that he had duties to perform, under the laws of the state, aside from those which are judicial and those of a purely ministerial character," etc. The idea expressed by Perkins, J., in the quotation above made, is recognized in the decisions of this state, where it has been held that an affray within the limits of a municipal corporation might at once constitute an offense against the municipal laws touching disorderly conduct, and also an offense against the state laws in regard to assault and battery or assault with intent to murder, and in other similar instances, thus recognizing the distinction between the general state laws and government and local corporate laws and government, although the municipality could not punish for an infraction of the state law.

The only ground on which it was asserted that one of the respondents was ineligible to hold the office of mayor of St. Mary's was that he was solicitor of the county court. No contention was raised or urged that the mayor had duties other than those incident to that office, or of a character similar to those described in the Indiana cases above cited, or under the state government, and not such as might properly be exercised by a mayor as incidental to the duties of that office, and was therefore ineligible. The same is true of the other two respondents; the sole claim in regard to them being that they were ineligible to be appointed aldermen of St. Mary's because one of them was a member of the board of education of the county and the other was county treasurer.

We have not discussed the doctrine of inconsistent offices, because the pleadings do not raise the question; but the contention is that the defendants were ineligible to hold the second offices. If two offices are merely inconsistent, the acceptance of the second operates as a resignation or relinquishment of the first. If the statute renders the holder of one office ineligible to the second, it prevents his lawfully holding the second at all, and does not operate as a relinquishment of the first. McWilliams v. Neal, 130 Ga. 733, 61 S. E. 721. The mere fact that the mayor and aldermen of St. Mary's are appointed by the Governor of the state does not render them officers of the state; that being only a mode of selection of the officials of the municipality under the terms of its charter.

In the light of what has been said above, and of the issues raised by the pleadings, there was no error on the part of the court in denying the prayer of the relators to oust the respondents from the offices of mayor and aldermen of the municipality of St. Mary's.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

PRICE et al. v. HIGH SHOALS MFG. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 27, 1909.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 63*)—ACTION AGAINST UPPER PROPRIETOR — EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Upon the trial of a suit by one riparian proprietor against an upper riparian proprietor for damages because of the unreasonable diminution and detention of the water in the stream, evidence tending to show that the defendant was using water from the stream sufficient to propel machinery not adapted to the size and capacity of the stream was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 63*)—ACTION AGAINST UPPER PROPRIETOR — EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a suit of the kind named in the preceding headnote, where the damages claimed were loss of profits in operating a grist and flour mill from a specified time, testimony, offered by a witness for the plaintiffs, "that he had heard people say that they had quit carrying their grinding to plaintiffs' mill, because they could not get it ground on account of low water," it not appearing that the statements referred to were made since such time, was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

3. DAMAGES (§ 62*)—RIPARIAN OWNER—INVASION OF RIGHTS—DUTY TO LESSEN DAMAGES.

Where one riparian proprietor continuously diminishes or detains the water in the stream unreasonably with reference to the rights of another riparian proprietor, who is damaged thereby, there is an illegal invasion of the property rights of the latter, and he is under no legal obligation to exercise ordinary care to avoid or lessen such damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 124; Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

4. DAMAGES (§ 9*)—NOMINAL DAMAGES—INVASION OF PROPERTY RIGHTS.

Where there is such an illegal invasion of the property rights of another as that referred to in the preceding headnote, the injured party is entitled to nominal damages, even though he shows no special damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 63*)—ACTION AGAINST UPPER PROPRIETOR—INSTRUCTIONS.

The inaccuracies in the charge referred to in the fifth division of the opinion were not likely to mislead the jury, in view of the entire charge.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action by W. P. Price and others against the High Shoals Manufacturing Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Cobb & Erwin, George C. Thomas, and Napier & Cox, for plaintiffs in error. Hale G. Nowell and Foster & Foster, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiffs, under a bond for title, with part of the purchase money paid, were in possession of property on which was situated a mill on the Apalachee river. They brought suit for damages against the defendant, which owns property on the river above the plaintiffs' property, and operates machinery by means of the power derived from the water of the stream. They alleged that they had lost custom of patrons of their mill, by reason of being unable to operate the same with any regularity, on account of the wrongful conduct of the defendant. This conduct, was alleged to consist in the erection, in 1903, of a reservoir or storage dam on the river above the plaintiffs' mill, creating a pond of water covering a considerable area, which caused the evaporation and absorption of the water, thereby diminishing the supply to which the plaintiffs were entitled; that gates were placed in this dam by the defendant, which were closed at 6 o'clock p. m. every day, thereby shutting off the flow of the water until they were opened next morning, by reason of which a sufficient amount of water to enable the plaintiffs to operate their mill did not reach the mill until 12 or 1 o'clock, and that the bed of the stream between the plaintiffs' mill and the defendant's dam, owing to the fact of it containing only a small quantity of water while the gates were shut down, became dry and absorbed a quantity of water when the flow was turned on in the morning. The plaintiffs contended that the use and detention of water by the defendant was unreasonable and entirely beyond the size and capacity of the stream, and was resorted to by the defendants for the purpose of propelling machinery of a magnitude twice as large as was adapted to the size and capacity of the stream, and that the obstruction, detention, retardation, and diminution of the water were subversive of the rights of the plaintiffs and caused them damage in the sum of $1,000 per annum. The defendant filed an answer, admitting the construction of the dam and the shutting down of the gates, but denying that the shutting down of the gates entirely cut off the flow of the water, or rendered it impossible for the plaintiffs to operate their mill. Upon the trial a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, and to the order denying the same they excepted.

1. One assignment of error in the motion for a new trial is as follows: "The court erred in ruling out the testimony of plaintiffs' witness Hayne, 'They put in 5,000 more spindles after the new dam was built,' the purpose of which was to show that the amount of machinery being propelled was greater than the capacity of the stream, and necessarily took more water than the natural stream afforded; plaintiffs' counsel informing the court that he intended to show that the defendant doubled its machinery, and was running double the amount of machinery with the water from the new dam that it did before the dam was built, and that the machinery in the mill, before this addition, required all the water power of the stream." Under a proper construction of Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3057, 3802, 3879, every riparian owner is entitled to a reasonable use of the water in the stream. If the general rule that each riparian owner could not in any way interrupt or diminish the flow of the stream were strictly followed, the water would be of but little practical use to any proprietor, and the enforcement of such rule would deny, rather than grant, the use thereof. Every riparian owner is entitled to a reasonable use of the water. Every such proprietor is also entitled to have the stream pass over his land according to its natural flow, subject to such disturbances, interruptions, and diminutions as may be necessary and unavoidable on account of the reasonable and proper use of it by other riparian proprietors. Riparian proprietors have a common right in the waters of the stream, and the necessities of the business of one cannot be the standard of the rights of another; but each is entitled to a reasonable use of the water with respect to the rights of others. What is a reasonable use is a question for the jury, in view of all the facts in the case, taking into consideration the nature and use of the machinery, the quantity of water used in its operation, the use to which the stream can be applied, the velocity of its current, the character and size of the water course, and the varying circumstances of each case. In the case of Pool v. Lewis, 41 Ga. 162, 5 Am. Rep. 526, it was ruled: "The owner of a mill, whose dam and machinery are suited to the size and capacity of the stream, has the right to the reasonable use of the water to propel his machinery; but he must detain it no longer than is necessary for its profitable enjoyment, and he must return it to its natural channel before it passes upon the land of the proprietor below." See 2 Farnham on Water and Water Rights, p. 1612, § 476; Id. pp. 1608, 1609, § 475; Gould on Waters (3d Ed.) pp. 427, 428, § 218; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 372, 373. Under the facts of this case, we think the court committed error in ruling out the testimony of plaintiffs' witness that the defendant put in 5,000 more spindles after the new dam was built. In connection with the other testimony in the case, this testimony was admissible for the purpose of illustrating the question as to whether or not the defendant's machinery was adapted to the capacity of the stream, and therefore of throwing light on the question as to whether or not they were making a reasonable use of the water.

2. Another assignment of error is as follows: "That the court erred in ruling out the testimony of plaintiffs' witness Wagner that he had heard people say that they had quit carrying their grinding to plaintiffs' mill because they could not get it ground on account of low water." The plaintiffs sued for damages which they alleged occurred since the erection of a new dam by the defendant in 1903. It does not appear that the statements referred to were made since the new dam was erected by the defendant; and for this, if for no other, reason there was no error in excluding the testimony.

3. Another assignment of error is that the court committed error in charging the jury that the plaintiffs could not recover, even if they were injured by the conduct of the defendant, if the plaintiffs could have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence; and it further charging: "It is a question of fact whether ordinary care and diligence required them to build a storage dam, or adopt any other plan to protect them from loss. This is a fixed rule applicable to all cases of similar character." Civ. Code 1895, § 3802, provides: "Where by a breach of contract or negligence one is injured, he is bound to lessen the damages as far as is practicable by the use of ordinary care and diligence; but this does not apply in cases of positive and continuous torts." The conduct of the defendant complained of in this case is not a breach of contract or negligence. It is a positive and continuous tort. We do not think the rule of law announced by the court in the charge complained of was applicable in this case. In the case of Athens Mfg. Co. v. Rucker, 80 Ga. 291, 4 S. E. 885, it was held: "Whenever the right to enjoy one's property to its fullest extent is invaded, and injury arises therefrom, he may recover any damages sustained by reason of such invasion; nor is he bound to do anything to avoid the consequences thereof." On page 295 of 80 Ga., page 886 of 4 S. E., the court uses this language: "We do not think that this is a case of negligence. If this company raised their dam, thereby causing water in the creek to run over the plaintiff's land, and thereby injuring and damaging him, that was an invasion of his rights, and a positive act on the part of the defendant, and not a case of negligence; nor was it negligence on the part of the plaintiff not to do anything to avoid the consequences of their act. Every man has the right to enjoy his property to the fullest extent; and whenever that right is invaded by another, and injury accrues to him, he is entitled to his damages therefor. The evidence fails to show that the plaintiff did anything that led to or increased this damage. He did nothing, and he had a right to do nothing; and if they invaded his rights they were liable to him for any damages which he sustained by reason of such invasion." In the case of Satterfield v. Rowan, 83 Ga. 187, 9 S. E. 677, the following ruling was made: "The principle that the defendant may reduce the recovery for an injury resulting from his negligence, by showing that the plaintiff did not exercise ordinary care to diminish or avoid the damages, does not apply where the act complained of is not a mere act of negligence, but a positive, continuous, tortious act, committed by the defendant in carrying dirt and ore from a mine and washing it in a stream flowing through the land of both parties, and thereby producing continued adulteration of the plaintiff's water."

Riparian proprietors have no title to the water which flows over their land, but are entitled to a reasonable use thereof, and "they may insist that their right to thus use the water shall be regarded and protected as property." Gould on Waters, p. 395, § 204. In 2 Farnham on Water and Water Rights, pp. 1565, 1566, § 462, it is said: "The right to have a natural water course continue its physical existence upon one's property is as much property as is the right to have the hills or forests remain in place. * * * Such flow and use belong to the land through which it passes, as an incident, convenience, or easement which inseparably connects itself therewith as a part thereof, and frequently gives or adds value thereto, and is a private property right in the proprietor thereof, within the protection of the constitutional provision that private property shall be forever held inviolate, subject to the public welfare, and shall not be taken for public use without compensation being first made. The property, therefore, consists, not in the water itself, but in the added value which the stream gives to the land through which it flows. This is made up of the power which may be obtained from the flow of the stream, from the increased fertility of the adjoining fields because of the presence of the water, and of the value of the water for the uses to which it may be put. The right to the continued existence of these conditions is property, to protect which the owner may resort to any or all the instrumentalities which may be employed for the protection of private property rights."

If the defendant by an unreasonable use of the water diminished the supply to which the plaintiffs were entitled at all times, or from 6 p. m. until 1 p. m. detained and withheld from the plaintiffs the water which they were entitled to use, this was an illegal invasion of the plaintiffs' property rights. The shutting down of the gates in the defendant's dam every day at 6 p. m., thereby causing this detention, was a positive tort. We think the court committed error in giving the charges complained of. This charge was of harmful effect to the plaintiff in view of the testimony in the case. One of the plaintiffs testified: "If we had have provided a storage dam, we could have had water all the time. If we had the money that they did, we would have built a storage dam." One of the defendant's witnesses testified: "If Price built a storage dam, he would have storage enough to run until this reached him. If it was not for Price's large wheels, I think he could run anyhow, all the time, as a good many streams run in there." Another one of the defendant's witnesses testified: "The water that runs in from the creeks and branches, with a tight dam he would have enough water to run half a day. We have tested it. He could run till our water got there. * * * With a good dam, I should think he could run all the morning till the water got there; run a good deal more than they have." In view of this and other testimony in the case, the charge complained of was error of such harmful effect as to require a new trial. If the defendant made an unreasonable use of the water, so as to damage the plaintiffs, it was an illegal invasion of their property rights and a continuous and positive tort, and the plaintiffs could recover whatever damages they sustained, even though by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence they could have avoided the same. In this connection, see Brown v. Dean, 123 Mass. 255; McCarty v. Boise City Canal Co., 2 Idaho, 245, 10 Pac. 623; Gilbert v. Kennedy, 22 Mich. 117, 132-134.

4. Complaint is made in the motion that the charge of the court was such as not to inform the jury that the plaintiffs were entitled to nominal damages, even though they suffered no actual damage, if there was an illegal invasion of their rights. If there was on the part of the defendant an illegal invasion of the property rights of the plaintiffs, the latter were entitled to recover nominal damages, even though they proved no special damage. White v. East Lake Land Co., 96 Ga. 415, 417, 23 S. E. 393, 51 Am. St. Rep. 141; Ellington v. Bennett, 59 Ga. 286; Hendrick v. Cook, 4 Ga. 241; Gould on Waters, p. 422, § 214; 2 Farnham on Water and Water Rights, p. 1674, § 510.

5. Complaint is made of the following charge of the court: "On the other hand, I charge you, if the dam did not result in the diminution of the supply of water for mill purposes, then plaintiffs cannot recover." It is contended by the plaintiffs that this charge excluded the theory of the plaintiffs that they were entitled to recover for an unreasonable detention of the water, even though the quantity was undiminished. Plaintiffs complained that the water in the stream was diminished by evaporation, absorption, and percolation, and that the water was unreasonably detained by defendant, so that plaintiffs did not have sufficient water to operate their mill from 6 p. m. to 1 p. m. The words employed in the charge complained of, namely, "diminution of the supply of water for mill purposes," were not explicit enough to clearly embrace the contention that the supply was entirely cut off from 6 p. m. to 1 p. m.; but in view of the rest of the charge of the court, clearly setting forth the right of the plaintiffs to recover because of any unreasonable detention of the water, we do not think the jury misunderstood the meaning of the court's charge, considered in its entirety. We think, however, it would have been better to have more clearly expressed the contention of unreasonable detention in the charge of which complaint is made.

Complaint is also made of the charge wherein the court told the jury the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover, when he should have stated they were entitled to recover. In view of the rest of the charge, and what occurred between the court and counsel in reference to this mistake, it was not such error as to require a new trial.

Complaint is also made of the charge, set forth in the amendment to the motion, that if the rules of the defendant in the operation of its machinery, and in turning on and shutting off the water, were reasonable, "in the light of the law I have given you in charge," and damage resulted to the plaintiffs by reason of the enforcement of such rules, such damages should not be recovered. Movants complain of this charge, because it falls to state that such "rules must be reasonable relative to the rights of the plaintiffs, as well as to the rights of the defendant." The use of the water of a stream by one riparian proprietor must be reasonable with reference to the rights of other riparian proprietors. We do not think the charge complained of created on the minds of the jury any impression that this was not the law, in view of the words therein employed, "in the light of the law I have given you in charge," and in view of the rest of the charge, which plainly informed the jury that the use of the water by one proprietor must be reasonable with reference to the rights of other proprietors.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

LUMPKIN, J. (concurring specially). I concur in the judgment rendered in this case, but I cannot concur in all the reasoning by which the result is reached. Especially is this true as to the third division of the opinion. "The owner of a mill, whose dam and machinery are suited to the size and capacity of the stream, has a right to the reasonable use of the water to propel his machinery; but he must detain it no longer than is necessary for its profitable enjoyment, and he must return it to its natural channel before it passes upon the land of the proprietor below." Pool v. Lewis, 41 Ga. 162, 5 Am. Rep. 526. Every dam necessarily impedes to some extent the flow of the water. There is some evaporation from every mill pond. If the temporary and reasonable detention of water for the purposes of generating power to operate the mill constitute a positive tort, the result would be paralysis to the manufacturing interests of the state, which cannot operate without some detention of water and consequent loss by evaporation. If the owner of the mill has a right to detain the water reasonably for its profitable enjoyment, the mere allegation that he detained it longer than was reasonable would not constitute a case falling within the class of "positive and continuous torts" referred to in Civ. Code 1895, § 3302, which would free the lower millowner from any necessity or duty to use ordinary care.

Whatever those words may mean, I do not think that they apply to a case where a person has a right to do a thing reasonably (the thing itself being right, if reasonably exercised), because of a charge that the right was unreasonably exercised. The unreasonable exercise of a right more nearly approximates negligence than the commission of a positive, direct, or willful tort. If unreasonable exercise of a right is to be classified rather with negligent torts than those which the Code calls "positive and continuous," unquestionably the rule which requires the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the person claiming to be injured in order to lessen the damages applies.

This is quite different from a case where water is actually backed upon the land of another or caused to overflow his land. Such cases present instances of a direct invasion of the land itself. A person trespasses upon land as much by backing water upon it as he does by entering upon it himself. Thus, in the case of Athens Mfg. Co. v. Rucker, 80 Ga. 201, 4 S. E. 885, it was said: "If the company raised their dam, thereby causing water in the creek to run over plaintiff's land, and thereby injuring and damaging him, that was an invasion of his rights, and was a positive act on the part of the defendant, and not a case of negligence." In Satterfield v. Rowan, 83 Ga. 187, 9 S. E. 677, the tortious act complained of was committed by carrying dirt and ore from a mine and washing it in a stream which flowed through the land of other parties, thus producing continued adulterations of such water. The adulteration of a stream, thereby carrying upon the plaintiff's land foreign substances, or deleterious matter, is quite different from the detention of water for mill purposes, though claimed to be unreasonable.

The plaintiff here does not complain as a mere riparian proprietor, using the water in the natural flow of the stream for ordinary uses, but as a millowner of the hydraulic power capable of propelling machinery. He is not suing for damages resulting from a general depreciation in value of land by having water taken from it, but for injury to his mill and the water privileges connected therewith. When he contends that the damages which he has suffered have resulted from the conduct of the defendant, certainly it would be competent to reply by showing that they resulted, not from the conduct of the defendant, but because the plaintiff had built no dam for the purpose of running his mill, or that he had built a totally insufficient dam for that purpose, or that he had allowed his dam to rot down, or that he had permitted a hole to exist in it through which the water escaped, when, if he had built the dam, or repaired it, or stopped the hole, he would not have been damaged. In other words, it is competent to show that the damage resulted, not wholly or partly from the plaintiff's conduct, but wholly or partly from the defendant's conduct, or that it was not the defendant's dam which caused the damage, but the hole in the plaintiff's dam, and that if he had exercised ordinary care he would not have suffered the injury on account of which he complains. In Grant v. Kuglar, 81 Ga. 637, 8 S. E. 878, 3 L. R. A. 606, 12 Am. St. Rep. 348, it was said that sections of the former Code—2227, 2231, 2232, 3018 (but erroneously printed 2327, 2331, 2332, referring to what is now embodied in sections 3057, 3061, 3062, and 3879 of the Code of 1895)—made no substantial change in the common-law rights of landowners, with respect to ditching out and protecting their property. And see White v. East Lake Land Co., 96 Ga. 417, 23 S. E. 393, 51 Am. St. Rep. 141; Coldwell v. Sanderson, 69 Wis. 52, 28 N. W. 232, 33 N. W. 591.

I am authorized to state that Mr. Justice ATKINSON concurs with me in the views above expressed.

STALVEY v. STALVEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

1. DIVORCE (§ 210*)—TEMPORARY ALIMONY—CONDITION OF CAUSE.

Where there is no pending suit for divorce, until there is a proceeding for permanent alimony, the judge at chambers has no jurisdiction of the matter of granting alimony, under section 2467, Civ. Code 1895.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. § 610; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

2. DIVORCE (§ 210*)—TEMPORARY ALIMONY—CONDITION OF CAUSE.

Where a petition was filed seeking temporary alimony, the filing of a subsequent independent suit for permanent alimony would not save the former petition.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth Stalvey against G. M. Stalvey and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Stalvey brings error. Reversed.

Elizabeth Stalvey filed a petition against G. M. Stalvey and the Fourth National Bank, alleging, in brief, as follows: She was married to Stalvey in 1903, and two children were born to them. She has been informed and believes that Stalvey recently married another woman in South Carolina, and is now living with her. He has deserted the petitioner, and has contributed nothing, for some time past, toward the support of herself and her two children, and he and she are now living separate and apart. He has on deposit with the Fourth National Bank the sum of about $700. He has threatened to withdraw this money from the bank.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

It belongs in part to her, she having helped to earn it and save it. "Petitioner claims the whole of said sum as temporary alimony." Stalvey is guilty of a crime involving moral turpitude. She has no recourse at law, and will lose the money unless her prayers are granted. She prayed that Stalvey be restrained from drawing the money from the bank; that the bank be served with a copy of the petition and order granted thereon, and that it be restrained from paying the money to Stalvey; that pending the final hearing on the above petition the defendants be restrained from withdrawing and paying out the money or in any way changing its status; that Stalvey be required to answer, "on such day as may be named by the court, why said sum of money should not be paid over to petitioner"; and that process issue requiring the defendants to be and appear at the next term of the court.

By amendment it was alleged that Stalvey was insolvent and was without the state of Georgia, and that unless injunction should be granted the fund would be withdrawn beyond the reach of the process of the court. She prayed that the amount on deposit in the bank in the name of Stalvey should "be awarded her by the court as temporary alimony for support of herself and children, and that a decree issue requiring the defendant the Fourth National Bank to pay over to the plaintiff the said money, or so much thereof as the court may deem proper, for temporary alimony, and requiring the defendant Stalvey to pay over to the plaintiff said sum of money, or so much thereof as the court may deem proper, as temporary alimony." The presiding judge granted an order requiring the defendants to show cause before him, on a day named, why the prayers of the petition should not be granted, and in the meantime restrained Stalvey from withdrawing from the bank the fund on deposit there, the bank from paying such sum to Stalvey, and both of them from changing its status. The defendants demurred to the petition, and Stalvey filed an answer to it. On the hearing the judge ordered that out of the funds in the bank the sum of $150 should be paid to the attorney for the plaintiff, and the balance be paid to her for the support of herself and her two children. Stalvey excepted.

W. R. Hammond, for plaintiff in error.
Lamar Hill, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the decisions in Yeomans v. Yeomans, 77 Ga. 124, 3 S. E. 354, Stallings v. Stallings, 127 Ga. 467, 56 S. E. 469, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 593, and King v. King, 128 Ga. 54, 57 S. E. 227, the judgment of the judge of the superior court, granting temporary alimony and directing a sum which had been deposited in bank by the husband to be paid over by the bank to the wife and her attorney, must be reversed. The petition filed by the wife contained no prayer for permanent alimony, nor did it appear that there was any separate suit for alimony or divorce pending. The petition contained only prayers for temporary restraint against changing the status of the money in bank, that the entire amount be awarded to the wife as temporary alimony, and for process. An application for temporary alimony is only for an allowance ad interim, including counsel fees, if proper. It is interlocutory in its character, not final. It must have as a basis some proper action which will result in a final judgment and terminate the interim. A judge of the superior court cannot on a mere application for temporary alimony, without more, and with no foundation on which to base it, either by way of a suit for divorce or a suit for permanent alimony, grant the temporary alimony prayed, and order funds of the husband in bank to be paid over by the bank to the wife or her attorney.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant in error that the point was not sufficiently raised before the presiding judge, or in this court, to authorize a reversal. In this view we cannot concur. The husband filed a demurrer, one ground of which was because the plaintiff's petition failed to set forth any cause of action against this defendant, and another was because the plaintiff in her petition did not pray for any relief against the defendant, or for the recovery of any judgment against him. The demurrer appears to have been before the presiding judge as a ground of objection to the grant of the temporary alimony. In the bill of exceptions one assignment of error was because the court erred in awarding temporary alimony to the petitioner; there being no prayer in her petition or any in the amendment thereto for permanent alimony, and no prayer on which an award of temporary alimony could properly be based. Error in the judgment awarding alimony was also assigned on other grounds. The point of lack of a sufficient basis was more distinctly made than in Yeomans v. Yeomans, supra. In that case Chief Justice Bleckley said in the opinion (page 126 of 77 Ga., and page 355 of 3 S. E.): "There is no intimation of this objection in the husband's answer, and we doubt whether it was distinctly presented to the judge below, although it is substantially developed in the bill of exceptions. But as jurisdiction over the subject-matter is essential to the validity of an order made at chambers, and as to enforce the order may require the use of means that could not be employed without very grave consequences where jurisdiction is wanting, we feel constrained to sustain the exception."

In response to the contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error that the petition did not have sufficient legal foundation, counsel for defendant in error in his brief replied that there was in the record a petition for permanent alimony, filed on July 11, 1908, which had been sent to this court by the clerk of the superior court as a part of the record, though not specified to be sent up in the bill of exceptions. Counsel differed as to whether this could be considered by the Supreme Court. If it is not considered, then the application for temporary alimony appears to have been filed without the basis of a suit for divorce or permanent alimony. If it is considered, then the record shows on its face that the application for temporary alimony was first begun, and an effort was made to furnish a foundation for it by filing a separate suit for permanent alimony later. This would not save the application for temporary alimony.

As what has been said above necessitates a reversal, we need not consider at length other assignments of error, or deal with the sufficiency of the evidence to authorize the judgment. If a certified copy of the record of the trial and conviction of the defendant, in a court of South Carolina, of the crime of bigamy, was not admitted in evidence as an adjudication of the fact that the defendant had been twice married, as the presiding judge certified, we do not clearly perceive how it was admissible "as illustrative of the defendant's attitude to the plaintiff, of his separation from her, and of his treatment of her, in determining the question of alimony and the amount of it." If the presiding judge treated the proceeding as a general equitable petition, the proposed intervention by a person who claimed to have received a check from the defendant on the same day that the petition was filed and the restraining order granted, and by a bank, other than that of deposit, which also claimed to have cashed a check drawn by him on that day, do not make sufficient allegations to show that the judge erred in rejecting them. The only judgment entered by the court was one awarding alimony and counsel fees to the plaintiff, and directing the fund in bank to be paid over to her and her counsel. No formal order appears to have been passed upon the demurrers, though they were evidently considered as grounds of objection to the granting of temporary alimony. We will not, therefore, pass upon them formally as demurrers.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

SINKOVITZ v. PETERS LAND CO. (No. 1311.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 16, 1909.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 44*)—BUILDING ABUTTING ON HIGHWAY—DUTY OF OWNER.

It is the duty of the owner of a building which abuts upon a public highway to use ordinary care to keep it from being a source of danger to the public after its construction, as much as it is his duty originally to see that it is not a source of danger to the public by reason of improper or unskillful construction. While the owner of a building abutting upon a public street is not an insurer of the absolute safety of those who pass upon the sidewalk, reasonable care must be exercised by him to keep it in such condition as that neither the building, nor any part thereof, will fall and passers-by be thereby injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 59; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§§ 121, 136*) — EVIDENCE — "RES IPSA LOQUITUR."

Where something unusual happens with respect to a defendant's property over which he has control, and by such extraordinary occurrence a plaintiff is injured (the occurrence being such as does not happen if reasonable care has been used), an inference may arise that the injury was due to the defendant's negligence. The maxim res ipsa loquitur is a rule of evidence, to be applied by the jury, if applied at all. The inference which may in some cases arise from an unexplained occurrence which has worked an injury to another, that the defendant who had in charge the instrumentality which was the direct cause of the injury was guilty of negligence may or may not be drawn by the jury; but, like the fact of negligence or no negligence, the inference which the jury may be authorized to draw is peculiarly an inference of fact, and consequently, where the inference of negligence may as well be drawn as the inference that the casualty resulted from accident or the act of God, it is error to award a nonsuit.

(a) The maxim, "Res ipsa loquitur," is to be applied with the greatest caution, and its application depends greatly upon the circumstances of each particular case. But, where the physical facts surrounding an occurrence are such as to create a reasonable probability that the occurrence and consequent injury resulted from negligence, the physical facts themselves are evidential, and may or may not furnish evidence of the particular negligence alleged.

(b) If the extraordinary character of the occurrence is sufficient to raise an inference of the negligence alleged, a prima facie case is established, and the burden of disproving negligence, especially in a case where the parties do not sustain to each other the relation of master and servant, is cast upon the defendant to disprove negligence upon his part; this for the reason that it is more particularly within his power to explain the character and condition of the instrumentality which may have occasioned injury than within the power of the injured party.

(c) In the absence of any satisfactory explanation that the occurrence was accidental and providential, or other sufficient explanation, if something unusual happens in respect to a defendant's property or to something over which he has control, whereby the plaintiff is injured, and the natural inference on the evidence is that the unusual occurrence is due to the defendant's act, the occurrence, being unusual, is said to speak for itself that such act was negligence (citing Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6137-6138).

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Sarah Sinkovitz, by next friend, against the Peters Land Company. Judge ment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for plaintiff in error. Smith, Hammond & Smith and E. M. Underwood, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff, by her next friend, sued the Peters Land Company for injuries received from glass falling from a window in the Peters Building in the city of Atlanta, Ga. In her petition she alleges that as she was going up certain steps on Wall street, leading to Whitehall street viaduct (the building in question abutting on Wall street), she was struck by pieces of a window-pane falling from said Peters Building, by reason of which a serious and painful injury resulted to her. The defendant was charged with negligence in three particulars: (1) That the window-pane had not been properly placed or set and secured in the sash. (2) The omission to use flat sprigs to reinforce the putty, and the inferior quality of the putty which was the support of the pane of glass in the absence of the sprigs. (3) That the window-pane itself was defective and not capable of sustaining the force of the usual winds to be expected in Atlanta, and especially those to be anticipated at this particular location.

Upon the trial the plaintiff offered to amend the twenty-first paragraph of the petition by an additional allegation of negligence, but this amendment was refused. Paragraph 21 in the original petition was as follows: "Petitioner shows that said defendant was further negligent, in that said window-pane was itself defective and not capable of sustaining the force of the usual windstorms and furries of wind to be expected in Atlanta, and especially at the place where the Peters Building is located." In response to a demurrer, paragraph 21 was, by permission of the court, amended by amplifying its allegations as follows: "That said window-pane was defective, in that the same was too thin and too brittle, and did not have the tension required for its size; that, on account of said window-pane being so thin and brittle, it was not capable of sustaining the force of the usual windstorms and furries of wind to be expected in Atlanta and at this place. Atlanta is situated from 1,000 to 1,100 feet above the sea level, upon a ridge, where it is exposed to the windstorms and furries that are caused by the changes in climatic conditions; that strong furries of wind moving with great force are frequent in Atlanta; and that the same come up suddenly and unexpectedly, and require window-panes of strong tension to sustain their force. The Peters Building is located on one side of the railroad leading into the Union Depot, and is some eight stories high on the Wall street side."

By the amendment, which was rejected by the court, it was proposed to add to the twenty-first paragraph of the petition as amended the following: "It is adjacent to the Kimball House, which is about eight stories high. The buildings located on the south side of the railroads form a solid bank, and are three or four stories high. The buildings on Peachtree street west thereof are, respectively, four and sixteen stories high. The height of these buildings with the open space between, forming banks as it were for the currents of air, force these currents of air about and around these buildings with great force. At the southwest corner of the Peters Building, and on the west and south sides thereof, on account of the conditions herein set forth, windstorms and furries of wind are constantly to be expected, and the window-panes should be of such material, with sufficient thickness and toughness, to withstand the same. Petitioner shows that the window-pane in the window complained of was not of such thickness and toughness, and that the failure to have said window-pane of such thickness and toughness required to withstand the usual windstorms and furries of wind was negligence on the part of the defendant. The conditions herein described existed at the time that said injury occurred."

1. We think that the court should have allowed the amendment, which was offered by the plaintiff in error. The amendment was permissible either as a fit and full response to the demurrer or as an additional ground of negligence setting up reasons why the defendant, in the exercise of ordinary care, should have provided these windows with glass of more than ordinary thickness and toughness. We can see no reason why the learned trial judge should have rejected this amendment. It was suggested in the argument that the height of the buildings surrounding the Peters Building, which created the conditions as to the windstorms and furries alleged by the plaintiff in the proposed amendment, had been changed and increased since the original construction of the Peters Building, and, this being conceded to be the fact, the trial judge was of the opinion that it would not be the duty of the defendant company to change its building to meet the exigencies arising from conditions for which it was not responsible. The evidence in the record is meager upon this point; but, granting that the erection of these buildings of 14 stories in height near the Peters Building increased the force of the air currents, and that the panes of glass in the defendant's building before the erection of nearby buildings of great height were suitable and reasonably safe, we are nevertheless of the opinion that it was the duty of the defendant as the owner of the building to still keep its building and all of its appointments just as reasonably safe, if the conditions were so changed as to render w-had previously been safe unsafe to passers-by.

As was held in Monahan v. National Realty Company, 4 Ga. App. 680, 62 S. E. 127, not only must the landlord construct his building so that it will not be unsafe, but it must be so maintained as not to occasion injury to another. Of course, if a change in the condition or in the quality of safety of a building is effected by the unlawful act of another, or by the creation of a nuisance by another, over whose acts the owner of the building has no control, the owner of the building would in neither case be responsible for resultant injury; but there are many cases in which the lawful act of an adjacent landowner would call for the exercise of greater precaution for the safety of passers-by and others than might have been necessary in the original construction of a building. For instance, if an adjoining landowner should excavate a foundation, as he has a right to do upon his own land, by reason of which the wall of another's building might be endangered, it would be necessary for the owner of the endangered building in the exercise of due care for the safety of the public to use efficient means to prevent his building from falling into the street. Ordinarily artificial changes of conditions affecting a building which are legally effected must be regarded and acted upon by the owner of the building as much as the changes of condition which necessarily arise from the lapse of time and the ravages of the elements. To a lesser degree, but in the same sense, that a defendant could not defend against a claim for an injury resulting from the fall of an old wall or from the fall of tiles or slate from a roof which may originally have been perfectly constructed (if the fall of either was occasioned by long usage and decay), so the owner of a building which might, under its previous surroundings and conditions, have been reasonably safe as originally constructed, may, by a lawful change of conditions, have cast upon him the duty of changing his building so as to have it as reasonably safe under the changed conditions as it was originally and before the necessity for change arose. If, in lowering the grade of a street, the foundation should be impaired and the building become a menace to passers-by, the owner of the building might have his remedy in damages against a municipal corporation for the expense necessary to secure the safety of his building, but he could not escape liability in case a passer-by should be injured by the fall of his wall upon the ground that the city, and not himself, was responsible for the changed condition of his building from that of safety to that of danger. Or, if by the raising of the level of a street a sign under which passers-by could formerly go with safety should be brought in contact with the heads of pedestrians, and, by reason of this new danger, one who was walking the street at night, unaware of the presence of the sign, should be injured, the owner of the building could not absolve himself from liability upon the ground that the city and not himself had brought the sign in contact with the pedestrian's head; for, if the sign was appurtenant to his building, it would be the duty of the owner to so locate it as to avoid injuring a passer-by. It is the duty of the owner of a building which abuts upon a public highway to keep it from being a source of danger to the public after its construction, as much as it is his duty originally to see that the building is not a source of danger to the public by reason of improper or unskillful construction. While the owner of a building abutting upon a public street is not an insurer of the absolute safety of those who pass upon the sidewalk, reasonable care must be exercised by him to keep it in such condition as that neither the building nor any part thereof will fall, and passers-by be thereby injured.

2. Regardless of the refusal to allow the amendment we think the court erred in awarding a nonsuit and dismissing the plaintiff's case. The evidence showed that a pane of glass, without any apparent cause, fell from the window of the defendant's building, and injured the plaintiff. The plaintiff had the right to be where she was, and the duty was upon the defendant to use ordinary and reasonable care in the construction and maintenance of its building so as not to occasion injury to passers-by. Barring human intervention (which was negated in this case), panes of glass do not ordinarily fall from windows unless the glass is either not placed properly in the sash at the start or unless by reason of lapse of time the sash and glass stand in need of repair. When the plaintiff showed that the pane of glass which struck her fell out of the window of the defendant's building, and that its fall was not caused by the occupants of the suite of rooms, or by the agency of any other person, she had made a prima facie case which should have been submitted to a jury to say whether from the circumstances attending the fall of the pane of glass they would draw the inference that the fall of the glass and her consequent injury was due to the alleged negligence of the defendant company, or was a pure accident, or was attributable to such an extremely high wind as that the casualty might be considered the act of God. The maxim, "Res ipsa loquitur," is of limited application, but embodies a perfectly sound legal principle. It is frequently difficult to determine when it can be safely said that the thing speaks for itself. However, the process by which it is to be determined whether the physical facts and circumstances accompanying an injury are such that the act may be said itself to speak the negligence of the defendant is to be worked out by the jury, and not by the court. Not only is negligence or diligence in every case where either is involved a question solely for the jury, but it is also the prerogative of the jury to say in the first instance whether the evidence adduced to raise the inference of fact that an extraordinary and unexplained casualty authorizes an inference that the defendant was negligent is sufficient or insufficient for the purpose.

Few subjects have been more fully discussed than the maxim "Res ipsa loquitur." Counsel for defendant in error insists that the maxim is caged, and that the decisions of the Supreme Court in Palmer Brick Co. v. Chenall, 119 Ga. 837, 47 S. E. 329, and in the case of Hudgins v. Cocoa Cola Bottling Co., 122 Ga. 695, 699, 50 S. E. 974, practically renders meaningless for all time in Georgia this maxim. We do not so understand these rulings. The decision in the Hudgins Case is based upon the fact that the plaintiff was confessedly unable to state the cause of his injury, and thereby failed to charge the defendant with responsibility therefor. In the first appearance of the Chenall Case, 117 Ga. 106, 43 S. E. 443, Justice Lamar, delivering the opinion of the court, places upon the maxim, "Res ipsa loquitur," as a rule of evidence the same construction that has been applied in the majority of the states of the Union, as well as by the English courts. When the case was first carried to the Supreme Court, the precise point now before us was before that court for adjudication for the first time in Georgia. Upon the second appearance of the Chenall Case in the Supreme Court (119 Ga. 837, 47 S. E. 329), the particular question involved was how far the application of the maxim, "Res ipsa loquitur," was affected by the fact that the plaintiff was a servant of the defendant, and thereby had assumed the risks incident to his employment, and to the negligence of his fellow servants. In so far as the opinion in the later case, delivered by Justice Cobb, appears to confine or limit the application of the maxim it must be borne in mind that the learned judge was dealing only with that specific point. But there was no retraction or modification of the original holding (where the relation of master and servant does not exist) that "ordinarily extraordinary and external causes may be treated as the exception to be established by the defendant. All that the plaintiff should be required to do in the first instance is to show that the defendant owned, operated, and maintained or controlled, and was responsible for the management and maintenance of, the thing doing the injury; that the accident was of a kind which, in the absence of proof of some external cause, does not ordinarily happen without negligence. When he has done this, he has cast the burden upon the defendant, who may then proceed to show that the accident was occasioned by vis major, or by other causes for which he was not responsible." Chenall v. Palmer Brick Co., 117 Ga. 109, 43 S. E. 443.

In the Chenall Case, 119 Ga. 842, 47 S. E.

329, Justice Cobb, after alluding to the burden which a servant has to carry, says: "The maxim, 'Res ipsa loquitur,' is simply a rule of evidence. The general rule is that negligence is never presumed from the mere fact of injury, yet the manner of the occurrence of the injury complained of or the attendant circumstances may sometimes well warrant an inference of negligence. It is sometimes said that it warrants a presumption of negligence; but the presumption referred to is not one of law, but of fact. It is, however, more correct and less confusing to refer to it as an inference rather than a presumption, and not an inference which the law draws from the fact, but an inference which the jury are authorized to draw, and not an inference which the jury are compelled to draw. In the trial of an action by a servant against a master, when it has been shown that the servant was in the exercise of due care, and the manner of the injury or the attendant circumstances are such that the injury could not have resulted unless the master had been negligent in some respect in which the law required him to be diligent for the servant's safety, then the jury might be authorized to infer that the master had been negligent in respect of the matter which was the basis of the suit, and would be authorized to base a finding upon such an inference, in the absence of an explanation which would be satisfactory to them; and it is not necessary that this explanation should satisfy them as to the cause of the injury, but an explanation which satisfies them simply that the master has exercised all the diligence which the law requires of him would be sufficient to rebut the inference of negligence resulting from the happening of the occurrence, although the cause thereof might still be involved in unsolvable mystery. Under our system, where every question of negligence is left for determination by the jury, even in cases where the maxim under consideration is applicable, the judge should not charge the jury that there would be an inference of negligence from a given state of facts, but should instruct them in clear and unequivocal terms that negligence must be proved; and it is for them to consider whether the manner of the occurrence and the attendant circumstances are of such a character that they would, in their judgment and discretion, be authorized to draw an inference that the occurrence could not have taken place if due diligence on the part of the master had been exercised. And they should also be instructed that, while they are not required by the law to draw any inference of negligence from the matter, still it is within their province to determine whether the circumstances are such that such an inference might be properly drawn. If, in a given case, the jury see proper to draw an inference of negligence from the manner of the occurrence or the attendant circumstances, the drawing of this inference is not necessarily to result in a finding in favor of the plaintiff. It imposes upon the jury the duty of making further inquiry as to whether this inference has been overcome by a satisfactory explanation. If the jury have drawn the inference of negligence, and there is evidence which satisfies their minds, notwithstanding such inference of negligence, that the occurrence was really brought about by the negligence of a fellow servant, the inference is overcome, and the jury should find in favor of the defendant."

In the ordinary case, as well remarked by Blackburn, J., in Scott v. London & St. Katherine Docks Co., 8 Hurl. & C. 596, as to matters which lie more in the knowledge of the opposite party, the fact of the accident may be sufficient to call upon the defendant to prove that there was no negligence. The rule, as stated in the Scott Case, supra, by Erie, C. J. (who delivered the opinion of the court, while he himself dissented), is that "there must be reasonable evidence of negligence; but where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management of the machinery use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation by the defendant that the accident arose from want of care." In McDonnell v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 118 Ga. 86, 44 S. E. 840, which was a case of master and servant, the decision is not expressly based on the rule of evidence embodied in the maxim, "Res ipsa loquitur," but the court held that the lower court erred in awarding a nonsuit, because, as said by Justice Cobb, delivering the opinion: "The evidence disclosed a condition of affairs which would authorize a jury to find that the boiler was in a dangerous condition, entirely too dangerous for use. The defects in the boiler were shown to be of such a character that an inspection would have disclosed them, and from the evidence it is to be inferred that they must have existed for some time. It is to be inferred that the work in which the plaintiff's husband was probably engaged at the time of his death rendered it usual, proper, and necessary that the engine should be heated and the boiler filled with steam. Under these circumstances, was the plaintiff entitled to have a jury pass on her case? Has she carried the burden which the law imposes upon one suing for the homicide of an employé? There can be no question that there was sufficient evidence to authorize a jury to find negligence on the part of the defendant so far as the condition of the boiler was concerned. It is unnecessary to determine whether the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies. But see the following cases: Illinois Central R. Co. v. Houck, 72 Ill. 286; Dunlap v. Steamboat Reliance (C. C.) 2 Fed. 249;

Robinson v. Railroad Co. (C. C.) 9 Fed. 877, 20 Blatchf. 338; The Reliance, 2 Fed. 249, 4 Wood's C. C. Rep. 420; Ill. Cen. R. Co. v. Phillips, 49 Ill. 234. As boilers properly constructed and properly used do not generally explode, the explosion of a boiler would seem to be evidence of negligence in some one. It may have been that of the boiler maker, or of the one whose duty it was to inspect the boiler before using it, or of the one who was using the machinery to which the boiler was attached. It would seem therefore that, while the mere explosion of a boiler would raise a presumption of negligence on the part of some one, it would not necessarily be evidence of negligence on the part of the owner of the boiler. As we say, however, no decision as to this need be made in this case. There was evidence authorizing a finding that the defendant was negligent in furnishing such a boiler for use by an employé either at work with or upon the machinery with which it was connected. The evidence also authorized a finding that the company ought to have known of the defective condition of the boiler. The plaintiff has therefore successfully carried the burden which the law imposed upon her of showing that there was a latent danger to which her husband was exposed, and which the company ought to have known of before placing her husband at work upon the locomotive, and about which it was its duty to warn him."

The rule in New York seems to be similar to the rulings in Georgia. 7 Words & Phrases, 6137. "The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, as expounded by the Court of Appeals in its latest utterance on the subject, in Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188, 59 N. E. 925, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, relates simply to the probative force of evidence. It does not dispense with the necessity of evidence of the defendant's negligence in any case, but, on the contrary, expressly requires it. In its application in those cases where the accident is such as in the ordinary course of business does not happen if reasonable care is used the effect of the rule is that the evidence of the attendant circumstances is sufficient for an inference of negligence without proof of any specific act. But the attendant circumstances shown must be such as will warrant an inference of negligence without proof of any specific act. But the attendant circumstances shown must be such as will warrant an inference not of negligence only, but of defendant's negligence—an inference that the injury is attributable to some violation of defendant's duty. The learned judge who wrote the opinion in Griffen v. Manice, supra, in explaining the meaning and application of 'res ipsa loquitur,' quotes approvingly section 59 of Shearman & Redfield on Negligence as follows: 'It is not that in any case negligence can be asumed from the mere fact of the accident and injury, but in these cases the surrounding circumstances which are necessarily brought into view by showing how the accident occurred contain, without further proof, sufficient evidence of defendant's duty, and his neglect to perform it. The fact of casualty and the attendant circumstances may themselves furnish all the proof of negligence that the injured person is able to offer, or that it is necessary to offer.' The judge in his opinion also quotes approvingly from Benedict v. Potts, 88 Md. 52, 40 Atl. 1067, 41 L. R. A. 478; and concludes; "The res includes the attending circumstances, and, so defined, the application of the rule presents principally the question of the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence to establish or to justify the jury in inferring the existence of the traversable or principal fact in issue—the defendant's negligence. The question in every case is the same—whether the circumstances surrounding the occurrence are such as to justify the jury in inferring the fact in issue.' Thus it was held in an action for personal injuries that the doctrine did not apply, as, while the circumstances may have shown negligence, there was nothing to suggest that it was the negligence of the master rather than that of fellow servants. Flink v. Slade, 66 App. Div. 105, 72 N. Y. Supp. 824."

The doctrine is given a liberal construction in Breen v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co., 109 N. Y. 297, 16 N. E. 60, 4 Am. St. Rep. 450. In the Breen Case the rule is thus stated: "There must be reasonable evidence of negligence; but when the thing causing the injury is shown to be under the control of a defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of business does not happen if reasonable care is used, it does, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, afford sufficient evidence that the accident arose from want of care on its part." The application of the maxim as stated by the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, following the ruling in the New York case, is as follows: "Where the physical facts of an accident themselves create a reasonable probability that it resulted from negligence, the physical facts themselves are evidential, and furnish what the law terms 'evidence of negligence,' in conformity with the maxim, 'Res ipsa loquitur.'" Seybolt v. New York, L. I. & W. R. Co., 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75. Thus, where a loud and unusual noise came from an electric car, and a volume of smoke issued therefrom, frightening plaintiff's horse, an instruction that such noise and smoke raised a presumption that it would not have been caused had defendant used proper care in relation to the machinery of the car, and that the jury may infer that the defendant was guilty of negligence, was properly given." Richmond Railway & Electric Co. v. Hudgins, 100 Va. 409, 41 S. E. 736, 738. For additional authorities, see citations in 7 Words & Phrases, 6137, 6138.

No exact classification can be made of the instances in which the maxim, "Res ipsa loquitur," as a rule of evidence, is to be applied by the jury. But, in almost numberless decisions in which no specific reference is made to the rule or doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, it is not only plain that the existence of this rule of evidence is recognized, but also that the finding reached is supported by nothing else than the conclusion that in the case under consideration the application of the rule was warranted, and that it was properly applied. Among many cases which might be cited, in which this is true, and where the relation of master and servant existed, the leading case of Byrne v. Boston Hose & Rubber Co., 191 Mass. 40, 77 N. E. 696, and King Mfg. Co. v. Walton, 1 Ga. App. 403, 58 S. E. 115, may profitably be referred to. In the Byrne Case, supra, it is ruled that "if a machine, which is stopped by means of a shipper shifting the belt which transmits the power from a tight pulley to a loose one and is started again by reversing the process, after having been stopped in the proper manner by the person operating it, starts of itself and injures the operative, this fact unexplained is evidence of some defect in the machine and of negligence on the part of its proprietor in allowing this defect to exist." The Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, upon the necessity, in some cases, for explanation by the defendant, says that "where the thing causing the injury complained of is shown to be under the management of a defendant or his servant, and the occurrence is such that in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by defendant, that the occurrence arose from want of care." Peters v. Lynchburg Light Co., 108 Va. 333, 61, S. E. 745 (1), citing the Scott Case and other authorities. A similar ruling is found in Bice v. Wheeling Elec. Co., 62 W. Va. 685, 59 S. E. 626 (3). "This phrase [res ipsa loquitur]' * * * is merely a short way of saying that the circumstances attendant upon an accident are themselves of such a character as to justify a jury in inferring negligence as the cause of that accident." Benedict v. Potts, 88 Md. 52, 40 Atl. 1067, 41 L. R. A. 478.

The maxim, "Res ipsa loquitur," is simply a rule of evidence authorizing the jury to infer negligence on proof of circumstances indicating it. Monahan v. National Realty Co., 4 Ga. App. 680, 62 S. E. 127 (3); Alexander v. Nanticoke Light Co., 209 Pa. 571, 58 Atl. 1068, 67 L. R. A. 475; Cockrell v. Langley Mfg. Co., 5 Ga. App. 317, 63 S. E. 244. Where circumstances are proved from which reasonable men might fairly disagree as to the existence of negligence, the question is for the jury. Roanoke Ry. & Elec. Co. v. Young (Va.) 62 S. E. 961 (4). When there is no other rational way to account for the existence of a fact, the jury may infer that it happened in that way, whether you call it res ipsa loquitur or not. Chesapeake Ry. Co. v. Rowsey (Va.) 62 S. E. 364, 368 (14); Smith v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (Ga. App.) 62 S. E. 1020. A plaintiff who shows that he was injured by the falling of a building into the street (Mullen v. St. John, 57 N. Y. 567, 15 Am. Rep. 530), or by the falling of a pole of a toll gate as he was passing thereunder (Hydes Ferry Co. v. Yates, 108 Tenn. 428, 67 S. W. 69), or by the falling of a brick from defendant's wall (Murry v. McShone, 52 Md. 217, 36 Am. Rep. 367), or by an electric shock from one of defendant's poles (Moglia v. Nassau Elec. Co., 127 App. Div. 243, 111 N. Y. Supp. 70), thereby makes out a prima facie case, which, unless rebutted by the defendant, is sufficient to legalize an inference of negligence by the jury. See Burdick on Torts (2d Ed.) 427.

We think, therefore, that the plaintiff established a satisfactory prima facie case which should have been submitted to a jury. It was for the jury to determine whether the circumstances were sufficient to authorize them to infer upon the facts at issue whether the defendant was negligent. Learned counsel for the defendant in error insists however, that there was no evidence to sustain either of the three allegations of negligence to which we have referred. Of course, if this be true, the court would not have erred in awarding a nonsuit. We think, however, that the evidence is sufficient to authorize the jury to infer, although they would not be required to draw such an inference, either that the window-pane had not been properly placed in the sash originally, or that the window-pane was defective and not capable of sustaining the force of such winds as are usual in the locality in question. On the other hand, the inference may be drawn from the testimony that the fall of the glass was due to an unusual hurricane. But no one can say which inference would be drawn by the jury, whose experience in such matters is more to be trusted than the more limited knowledge of the profession upon such practical subjects; and it is the peculiar province of the jury to draw all inferences of fact, just as it is the province of the court to draw the inferences of law.

As we see it, there is no force in the argument that testimony could have been brought from the camp of the defendant to show that the glass was secured in the sash, or that the glass was of sufficient thickness. It is well known that glass does not ordinarily fall out of windows that are properly constructed. It is peculiarly within the power of the defendant to show that, for the reason that all ordinary care had been used in the selection of proper glass and in the proper glazing of the window, the fall of the window-pane could not have been prevented by the exercise of ordinary care. The plaintiff was only required to make a prima facie case. This she did, and her case, was not altered by the fact that the fracture of the glass might have been caused by an excessive draft from the interior of the building, if it was such a draft as was to be expected in the building as it was constructed. It is as much the duty of the owner of a building to see that his building is safe (so far as pedestrians passing by are concerned) from dangers which might arise from the interior construction of his building as from those dangers which depend upon a defective exterior. It is the cause of injury which must be guarded against.

Judgment reversed.

SIMS v. SCHEUSSLER. (No. 1,385.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 23, 1906.)

1. CHARGE NOT ERRONEOUS.

The charge of the court submitted fully and clearly the law pertinent to the issue.

2. WITNESSES (§ 897*)—CREDIBILITY—EFFECT OF IMPEACHMENT.

Where it is sought to impeach a witness by proof of contradictory statements, the jury may in its discretion believe the witness, whether corroborated or not.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1265; Dec. Dig. § 897.*]

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 91*)—RECORD—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE—NOTICE TO MORTGAGEE.

The constructive notice implied from the record of a mortgage does not necessarily import that the mortgagee has actual knowledge of such mortgage, or any interest in the property upon which the mortgage is alleged to create a lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see ChatTEL Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

4. CONTRACTS (§ 48*)—CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 243*)—DEFENSES—WANT OF FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—CONTRACT UNDER SEAL—CANCELLATION OF MORTGAGE—PRESUMPTION OF CONSIDERATION.

Either want of consideration or failure of consideration may generally be pleaded to a contract under seal. There being no requirement that a cancellation of a mortgage should be under seal, the court did not err in refusing to charge that the law conclusively presumed that the mortgagee received a consideration for the cancellation of the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 48; ChatTEL Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 508; Dec. Dig. § 243.*]

5. ERRORS REQUIRING NEW TRIAL.

No error required the grant of a new trial. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court, Floyd County: Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Action by G. W. Sims against Christine R. Scheussler. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Denny & Harris, for plaintiff in error. C. N. Featherston and Dean & Dean, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. When this case was here before (2 Ga. App. 466, 58 S. E. 693), the judgment refusing a new trial was reversed upon the ground that the court erred in repelling a certified copy of a mortgage, duly probated and recorded; this court holding that "a copy of an instrument required by law to be recorded, taken from the proper registry and duly certified, is presumptive evidence of the existence of an original," and that "where it appears that due notice has been served on the mortgagee to produce the original mortgage, and that the mortgagor resides beyond the jurisdiction of the court, a sufficient foundation is laid to admit as secondary evidence a properly certified copy of the mortgage." Upon the trial now under review, the errors of the previous trial were corrected, and the jury again returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff's motion for new trial complains of errors in the charge of the trial judge and of his refusal to charge in accordance with certain requests. When the case was here before the judge's charge was approved as submitting fairly, fully, and clearly the issues involved and the law pertinent thereto, and a comparison of the charge in the record now before us with the charge in the record of the former case discloses that the charge in the instant case is practically identical with the charge which we approved. The only changes made are that the judge instructed the jury in the present instance on the subject of impeachment, and included in his charge a principle of law referred to in our previous decision, and supported by the rulings of the Supreme Court in Daniel v. Royce, 96 Ga. 568, 23 S. E. 493; Lowenstein v. Meyer, 114 Ga. 709, 40 S. E. 726; Atlanta Suburban Land Corporation v. Austin, 122 Ga. 374, 50 S. E. 124. As we have heretofore critically examined the charge of the court, and found no error in what was said by the judge, we deem it unnecessary to consider the assignments of error which are based upon his charge, and we shall address ourselves to what was left unsaid, so far as the omission of the judge to charge in accordance with the requests presented in the record is alleged to be error.

2. In the fifth ground of the motion for new trial it is insisted that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury that, "if a witness in a case is impeached on a matter material to the issue by proof of conflicting statements made by the same witness, then you could not accept the testimony of such witness on any subject, unless she was corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached witness." The plaintiff insists that the request to charge contains a sound principle of law, and one applicable to the facts of the case; that the defendant had testified during the trial that Judge J. H. Lumpkin was not her attorney, and did not represent her at the time the note was given; that in her testimony taken by interrogatories she stated that Judge J. H. Lumpkin was her attorney at the time and represented her; and that these conflicts were not explained by her. The plaintiff further contends that the testimony showed that the defendant had made conflicting statements as to whether her husband was or was not trying to protect her and endeavoring to save the proceeds of his stock of hardware for her, and that this conflict was not explained. The insistence of the plaintiff is that the jury should have been instructed that unless these conflicts were explained the testimony of the witness so impeached could not be received unless corroborated. We think the request was properly refused. We have already adverted to the fact that one of the additions made to his former charge by the judge of the city court was an instruction upon the subject of impeachment. Upon this subject the court charged that "a witness may be impeached by disproving facts testified to by him, or by contradictory statements previously made. The credibility of a witness is a matter wholly for the jury." We think that in the absence of a request more exhaustively embodying the law, or more fittingly adjusted to the evidence, the charge upon this subject is not only correct, but ample. If the plaintiff had desired the general presentation of the subject given by the judge to be more specific and exhaustive, a proper request should have been made. The judge did not err in refusing the request as made, because he was not required to correct the request so as to perfect it, and in the form in which it was presented it did not set forth a correct principle of law. The court correctly told the jury that the credibility of a witness is a matter wholly for the determination of the jury, and that they had the right to impeach the witness by contradictory statements previously made. But he would not have been authorized to have told the jury, as requested, that if a witness was impeached by proof of conflicting statements, and if the conflict was not explained, they could not believe the testimony of such witness on any subject, unless corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached testimony. This would have been a direction by the court to the jury that, if they believed the witness had made contradictory statements which she had not explained, they must disbelieve her entirely, and the court has no right to take away from the jury any portion of their prerogative in determining the credibility of witnesses sought to be impeached. The whole question of impeachment is one for the jury; and, while it would have been proper for the judge to charge that the jury would be authorized to disregard all of the testimony of a witness whom they believed to be impeached by proof of contradictory statements as to a matter material to the issue, yet to have told them that, if they believed from the evidence that the witness sought to be impeached had made unexplained contradictory statements, they could not accept the testimony of such witness, would have been an invasion of the jury box by the judge. In Railroad Co. v. Phinazee, 93 Ga. 488, 21 S. E. 66, a similar request was made, and was held to have been properly refused for an additional reason. In that case the request preferred was: "If the jury should believe that any of the witnesses sworn for the plaintiff have been successfully impeached or contradicted in material matters sworn to by him or them, then the jury can disregard the whole testimony of such witness, whether it be the plaintiff or other person." Chief Justice Bleckley, delivering the opinion of the court, held that the request (as is the request involved in the case at bar) "was open to the objection that it would apply as well to a contradiction resulting from honest mistake on the part of the witness attacked as to a contradiction due to willful and corrupt perjury." The request is also open to the further objection pointed out by Judge Bleckley, that "it might be clear to the jury that a witness contradicted in a material matter could be fully credited as to other matters, and, when this is the case, it is not a rule of law that the whole of his testimony can be disregarded. The rule of 'falsus in uno falsus in omnibus' has relation to willful falsehood, and should be restricted in giving it in charge to the jury. Skipper v. State, 59 Ga. 63; Ivey v. State, 23 Ga. 576." The request to charge in the present instance does not call the attention of the jury to the principle that contradictory statements must have been made knowingly and willfully.

8. In the sixth ground of the motion for new trial it is insisted that the court erred in refusing to charge as follows: "Where a mortgage on a stock of goods is duly probated for record—that is, executed before the proper witness—and is recorded in the place and manner required by law, such record is notice to the world of the existence of such a mortgage." And in the seventh ground of the motion complaint is made that the court refused to charge that "where a mortgage is executed by a husband to his wife, is properly probated and properly recorded, such record, from its date, is constructive notice to the mortgagee named, as well as the rest of the world, of the existence of such mortgage." We treat these two assignments together because they present practically the same point. The question is whether the charge is pertinent to the issue in the case, and whether the plaintiff in error was injured by the court's omission to give what is admittedly a principle of law correct in the abstract. We cannot see how the rights of the plaintiff could have been affected by the failure of the court to call the attention of the jury to the doctrine of constructive notice. The clear cut issue presented to the jury by the evidence was whether the defendant had actual notice of all the details of the transaction leading up to the execution of the note which she admitted she had signed. The conflict in the evidence was acute as to almost every material point, but there is absolutely no conflict as to the fact that the mortgage in question was executed by the defendant's husband and recorded, and therefore there could be no denial that she had constructive notice of its existence. The case, however, is of such a nature that the only practical issue is whether Mrs. Scheussler, the defendant, had actual notice of the existence of the mortgage, if it was necessary to the plaintiff's case to show that there was a mortgage at all. It was necessary that the plaintiff should show that the defendant, by the cancellation of a mortgage or otherwise, purchased the stock of goods which had been sold by the plaintiff to the defendant's husband, and that she thereby obtained as her property a stock of goods which it would be to her interest and benefit to protect by giving the note to the plaintiff. The only purpose of the introduction of the mortgage, so far as benefit could result to the plaintiff from its introduction, was to use it as basis for proof that in the cancellation of the mortgage Mrs. Scheussler became the owner of the stock of goods which was liable to be subjected to the payment of the note that the plaintiff held against her husband. The omission to give the request could not have been harmful to the plaintiff, because, even if Mrs. Scheussler had had no notice whatever of the mortgage, and even if it had never been recorded, and she had purchased the stock of goods, and had then for the first time ascertained that her husband had executed and recorded a mortgage in her favor, her cancellation of the mortgage (of the existence of which up to that time she had had no knowledge, either actual or constructive) might be a circumstance from which it could be inferred that, having bought her husband's stock of goods, she would have had such an interest in protecting her property from the attacks of Sims as would warrant her buying her husband's notes. She may have believed them to be a lien upon her property. The question involved was not one of priority of liens, but merely one of fact, as to whether Mrs. Scheussler had in any way become the owner of the stock of goods which had been sold by Sims to Scheussler, and for the purchase price of which Scheussler was still indebted to Sims. We think, therefore, that not only was the plaintiff not injured by the failure of the judge to give in charge the requests on the subject of constructive notice, but these requests were really not pertinent to the issues in the case.

4. The court refused to charge: "If you should find from the evidence that the defendant ever executed a paper in the form of a cancellation of a mortgage from her husband to herself, and if you find further that said cancellation was executed by the defendant under seal, then the law conclusively presumes that the defendant received a consideration in said transaction, and the defendant will not be heard in a court of justice, by herself or any other witness, to deny that she received said consideration." The plaintiff insists that the charge requested should have been given because he had introduced in evidence a certified copy of the cancellation, signed by the defendant, in which she declared that she canceled the mortgage in consideration of the transfer to her by her husband of a certain stock of goods described in the mortgage, which cancellation was executed before a notary public and under her seal, and that she is estopped from asserting that the cancellation was without consideration. If the plaintiff's contention is sound, the request should have been given; because, if there was a consideration for the cancellation of the mortgage introduced in evidence, there is ample evidence to warrant a finding that the same consideration constituted a consideration for the note sued upon. The exact question has not been decided by the Supreme Court, but it is clear to our minds that in this state, where there are no distinct courts of law and courts of equity, and where the courts of law may afford equitable relief, there is no reason why the maker of an instrument under seal should be estopped from setting up that the obligation was without consideration. The fact that it has been held that section 3656 of the Civil Code of 1895 declares that an instrument under seal generally imports a consideration does not lead us to the conclusion that, by the terms of section 3656, the makers of many instruments under seal which might be mentioned are estopped from pleading and proving that the instrument in question was without consideration. Especially must it be true that lack of consideration may be proved as to an instrument executed under seal, which is not required to be executed with such formality. Even if the law required that the cancellation of a mortgage should be under seal, we think that for the reasons stated by Starnes, J., in the well-considered case of Albertson v. Holloway, 18 Ga. 379, Mrs. Scheussler had the right, regardless of the fact that the cancellation was executed under her seal, to show that the cancellation was without consideration.

What is said by Justice Cobb in Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 170, 46 S. E. 67, upon the point now before us, is obiter, because the learned judge concludes his remarks upon the subject by saying: "We are not, however, to be understood as definitely committing ourselves at this time to the proposition that even want of consideration cannot be pleaded to a promissory note under seal, though this would seem to be true." Thus, while he previously said that the court was not prepared to adopt the reasoning upon which the decision in the Albertson Case, supra, rests, the court declined to overrule that earlier case. For the reason that the earlier case is controlling, as well as for the reason that it has more than once been held that section 3656 of the Civil Code is an adaptation from the common law, it seems to us that the force of the decision in the Albertson Case, supra, is not affected by the consideration that the decision was rendered prior to the Code. The language of that section, so far as the section relates to sealed instruments, is: "In some cases a consideration is presumed, and an averment to the contrary will not be received. Such are generally contracts under seal, and negotiable instruments alleging consideration upon their face, in the hands of innocent holders without notice," etc. The use of the word "generally" is to our minds significant of the fact that the framers of the Code had in mind the decision in the Albertson Case, and the distinction there drawn between two separate classes of sealed instruments, rather than the distinction drawn by the South Carolina court in Koster v. Welch, 57 S. C. 95, 35 S. E. 435, between want of consideration, which could not be pleaded, and failure of consideration, which might be pleaded, and which is adverted to by Judge Cobb in Sivell v. Hogan, supra. Especially must this be true when we consider that the Albertson Case had been decided before the laws of Georgia were codified, and was, no doubt, perfectly familiar to the distinguished jurists who were engaged in that labor, whereas the decision in the Koster Case, 57 S. C. 95, 35 S. E. 435, was not rendered by the Supreme Court of South Carolina until March, 1900. In the absence of binding authority, therefore, to the contrary, we must believe that, by the use of the word "generally" in the Code section, it was at least intended to provide for exceptions from the general rule which conclusively presumes a consideration where an instrument is executed under seal, and that the decision in the Albertson Case is the law defining the cases in which the presumption may be rebutted. Therefore the request to charge that the law presumed that Mrs. Scheussler had received a consideration by reason of the fact that she canceled the mortgage under her seal, and that she would not be heard in a court of justice to deny that she received consideration, would, in our opinion, have been properly refused even if the law had required mortgages to be canceled under the seal of the mortgagee. See Lacey v. Hutchinson (this day decided) 64 S. E. 106. Inasmuch, however, as section 2737 of the Civil Code does not require the formality of a seal, but provides only that "any mortgagor in this state, who may have paid off his mortgage, may present the same, together with the order of the mortgagee or transferee, directing that the mortgage be canceled and record the order across the face of the record, to the clerk of the superior court of the county or counties in which the same is recorded," and that such clerk shall thereupon write the word "Satisfied" across the face of the record in the mortgage, together with the date of the entry, and sign his name officially, there is no view in which it can be held that this defendant's right to plead lack of consideration would be affected. In Martin v. Bartow Iron Works (D. C. U. S.) 35 Ga. 320, 325, Fed. Cas. No. 9,157, Judge Erskine held that it is "the settled law of Georgia that to an action on what is commonly known as a sealed note or single bill the defendant may plead either a total or (by statute) a partial failure of consideration," and consequently he applied it in the United States court in Georgia as a rule of the local law, controlling as to an instrument made and to be performed in this state.

In the trend of modern jurisprudence, as well pointed out by Judge Lumpkin in Lowe v. Morris, 13 Ga. 147, the importance of the seal as an affix to one's signature and as a mark of identity has been greatly diminished. In that case each member of the court wrote an opinion, and one who is interested either in the origin and history of seals or in the reasons assigned for their use will be richly repaid by a perusal of the delightful opinion of Judge Lumpkin, or may even more enjoy the choice satire of the dissenting opinion of Judge Nisbet, who thought the writ of error should be dismissed because the seal of the court was not attached to it, and defended the forms of the common law (which forms he declared to be substantial, because consecrated by time and usage, although they might be in themselves unmeaning or even ridiculous), and, in decrying the prevailing desire for change, declared that the vocation of the age "seems to be to reform everything from the religion of Heaven down through a descending series almost infinite to a certiorari." Judge Lumpkin, in concurring with Judge Warner, who delivered the opinion of the court, shows that the seal goes back to Judah, one of the twelve Princes of Israel ("Moses' Reports, Book Genesis, c. 38, v. 18"), and develops that Ahasuerus was a postmaster general in his day because he sent his letters by post, and says: "I admit that many old things may be good things, as old wine, old wives, ay, and an old world too. But the world is older, and consequently wiser, now than it ever was before. Our English ancestors lived comparatively in the adolescence, if not the infancy, of the world. * * * And yet we, who are 'making lightning run messages, chemistry polish boots, and steam deliver parcels and packages,' are forever going back to the good old days of witchcraft and astrology to discover precedents for regulating proceedings of courts for upholding seals and all the tremendous doctrines consequent upon the distinction between sealed and unsealed papers when seals de facto no longer exist."

5. It is insisted that the court's charge to the jury entirely failed to present one of the main contentions of the plaintiff, and that, therefore, it was error to refuse the request to charge: "If you find from the evidence that Mrs. Scheussler had a mortgage on the stock of goods of C. S. Scheussler; that plaintiff attempted to collect his notes for $2,460; that he employed counsel and threatened to attack the mortgage; that thereupon defendant executed the note sued on—then I charge you that this note was a valid contract, and can be enforced against the wife, under the laws of Georgia." It is unnecessary for us to rule whether the court could properly have given this request without altering its verbiage, for the reason that the evidence was undisputed that Mrs. Scheussler had no actual knowledge of the existence of the mortgage prior to Sims' intended attack upon it and the employment of Judge Lumpkin to defend. Whatever conflict there may be as to other points in the case, no evidence contradicts Mrs. Scheussler's statement that she had no knowledge of the mortgage prior to its record. The request, therefore, could perhaps have been rejected as not adjusted to the evidence in the particular case because the mere fact that there may have been a mortgage recorded in favor of Mrs. Scheussler would not necessarily show that it had ever been accepted by her as security for her debt. If a mortgage is recorded, this is generally evidence of its delivery to the mortgagee and of his acceptance. But in a case where it might be contended that a mortgagee was prevented from asserting his rights against a debtor who had made a mortgage in his favor without his knowledge or consent it certainly could not be held that the mortgagor, by such a gratuitous act, could compel an unwilling creditor to forego his existing rights, and be involuntarily remitted to the security afforded by a second or even a third mortgage. The request upon this point was not sufficiently specific, unless the statement that the defendant had a mortgage had been followed by the further statement, and that, by the cancellation of that mortgage, the defendant had acquired property which it was her interest to retain.

But the real point raised by the request was fully presented to the jury by the court in that portion of the charge in which the jury were instructed that "a wife can buy notes of her husband, or she can make a valid obligation in settlement of such notes, if they appear to have been purchased to protect property to which she has title or interest." This statement of the principle upon which the defendant's case depended is full and clear, and is aptly adjusted to the evidence, because the legitimate purpose of the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff was to show that the settlement of the husband's notes by the wife was occasioned by no intention on her part to pay his debts or to assume his obligations, but was intended to protect property to which she had title or interest. The instructions given in lieu of those requested are in the language used by this court in the prior decision of the case. We held, when the case was here before, that the plaintiff would be entitled to recover if he had proved that the consideration for the note arose from Mrs. Scheussler's attempt to protect any of her property rights. The instruction of the trial judge upon this subject is in accord with our ruling. The request the refusal of which is the ground of complaint in the tenth ground of the motion for new trial is, for the reasons just stated, likewise covered by the charge of the court.

6. As already stated, we approved the charge of the court when the case was here before. By so ruling, of course, we did not intend to be understood as standing sponsor for the exact phraseology employed; nor did we intend to say that the language employed is not subject to verbal criticism, but we hold now, as we held then, that the instructions were remarkably apt, and the language employed so clearly intelligible to the jury that we are warranted in saying that the charge submitted the issues and the law fairly, fully, and correctly. The fact that the words "in good faith" were inaptly transposed or incautiously interjected into the wrong portion of the instructions of the judge did not mislead the jury. The court charged the jury that "if you find from the evidence that Mr. Scheussler was justly indebted to Mrs. Scheussler, and that there was a conflict between the claims of Mrs. Scheussler and a claim of Mr. Sims on the property of the husband, and if you find that, in order to settle these conflicting claims, it was necessary to protect her as a creditor of her husband, that she took all the claims of Mr. Sims, and thereby became the owner of the claims, and the transaction did in good faith benefit her, and that the note sued on was given solely to protect her interests and on her own account, then I charge you that she would be bound on the notes sued on, and you would find your verdict for the plaintiff." The same language was used when the case was here before, but it appeared to us then, as it does now, that, viewing this instruction in connection with other portions of the charge, it was plain to the jury that the mistake of the judge was merely a lapsus linguae, and the jury understood that what the court meant to say was that if the transaction was entered into in good faith, to benefit her (that is, she believing that it would benefit her), the defendant would be bound on the note.

7. The first four grounds of the motion for a new trial covered the usual general grounds, and a review of the evidence convinces us that a reversal of the judgment, based upon these grounds, would not be authorized. It appears that the plaintiff and the defendant's husband were partners in a hardware business in Atlanta. The plaintiff sold his interest to the defendant's husband, and received notes to the amount of $2,400. Failing to collect these notes, he accepted in lieu thereof the note of Mrs. Scheussler, the wife of his debtor, for $1,200, and a certain paper disclaiming a legal obligation, but acknowledging a moral obligation to pay Sims, whenever he was able, the amount of loss he had sustained. As to these points there is no conflict in the evidence. Upon the filing of the plaintiff's suit, the defendant, Mrs. Scheussler, admitted a prima facie case, and assumed the burden of proving that the note was void because it was without consideration, and was given merely as a colorable device for assuming the indebtedness of her husband. In several portions of the charge the court instructed the jury that the burden rested upon the defendant of sustaining her contention by the preponderance of the evidence. So it cannot be said that the jury rendered their verdict in favor of the defendant upon the idea that the plaintiff had failed to establish his case. On the contrary, the verdict must be construed as finding that the defendant successfully carried the burden and successfully rebutted the case made by the plaintiff, which un rebutted necessarily entitled him to a recovery. The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff showed that the defendant, by a written contract of purchase, coincident with and a part of the cancellation of the mortgage executed by her husband in her favor, had become the purchaser of a stock of goods for which the defendant was still indebted. This indebtedness was part of the purchase price, and was evidenced by certain notes held by the plaintiff. The defendant, being fully apprised of the condition of affairs, and acting under the advice of her counsel, and acting in her own interest (as it was apparently to her advantage to protect her property against a lien which might be set up by Sims), purchased the notes of her husband, as she had the right to do, and in payment gave a note which was the basis of the present suit. The evidence in behalf of the plaintiff would have authorized a verdict in his favor. On the part of the defendant, however, there was testimony that she never knowingly had been the holder of the mortgage which purported to create a lien upon the stock of goods in her favor, had never owned the stock of goods, had never been credited any share in the management of the store, had never derived any profits from it, and that the note was given merely as a colorable device by which she bound herself to pay the debts of her husband. According to the defendant's testimony, she consented to sign the note for no other reason than that she wanted to relieve the embarrassment of her husband. Two apparently disinterested witnesses who were employed in the business both before and after Sims sold his interest to Scheussler, one of whom had had charge of the books, and the other of whom was in general charge of the sales and the cash, testified that the defendant never received any moneys from the business after the execution of the mortgage or after the alleged sale, or at any other time, that the business was conducted in the name of the husband, and that, though they were in charge of the business and conversant with all its details, they never heard of the defendant having any interest in the stock of goods during the entire period in which the business was conducted.

From this testimony and from various other circumstances which it is unnecessary to recount, we think that the jury were fully authorized to find that the making of the note was nothing more than the assumption by the wife of her husband's debt; that the various steps leading up to the execution of the note were means adopted, in the first instance, by the husband in his own interest; and that later on the wife, without a view to any interest of her own, and certainly, so far as the record discloses, without ever having received any benefit therefrom (though that would not matter if her action was influenced by the hope of benefit), simply to relieve the pressure of her husband's creditor, assumed his debt, and gave her note which the husband indorsed. The jury may have considered the circumstance of the husband's indorsement as having some significance in view of the fact that the evidence fails to disclose that, after having sold his business and the stock of goods to his wife, he had no remaining assets which would cause his indorsement to be of value. Without disbelieving the testimony of the eminent counsel who testified in the case, the jury could well infer from the nature of the relationship between husband and wife that, though the circumstances and the statement made at the exact time that the note was given were precisely as stated in the testimony of the counsel who were employed in the case, still that it was not only possible, but even probable, that the attorneys may have seen only the surface indications of a bona fide intention to purchase, while the wife, under the tutelage of her husband and in wifely devotion to his interest, may have concealed what, according to her testimony, the plaintiff was obliged to have known, that she had no interest in the stock of goods, and therefore no interest of her own to protect.

No errors of law having been committed, the trial judge did not err in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury upon issuable facts, although a different finding would have been authorized.

Judgment affirmed.

(5 Ga. App. 865)

LACEY v. HUTCHINSON. (No. 1,557.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 28, 1909.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 90*) — DEFENSES — WANT OF CONSIDERATION—INSTRUMENT UNDER SEAL.

It is a good defense to an action on a negotiable promissory note under seal in the hands of the original payee that it was executed without any lawful consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 163; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 48*)—CONSIDERATION—CONTRACTS UNDER SEAL.

The common-law courts of England enforced specialties in the absence of consideration, not because the presence of a seal carried with it any presumption of consideration, but because consideration was not essential to an instrument executed with such formality. The doctrine of enforcing a contract because of the formality of its execution is older than the juridic concept of consideration as an element of a binding promise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 406; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 48*)—DEFENSES—INSTRUMENT UNDER SEAL—WANT OF CONSIDERATION.

The courts of equity recognize consideration as an essential element of all contracts, with but few exceptions, and do not recognize formality of execution as a substitute therefor. Hence lack of consideration is a good defense in equity to a contract under seal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 43*)—NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENT UNDER SEAL.

A negotiable promissory note under seal is a legal hybrid unknown to the common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 63; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

5. COURTS (§ 189*)—CITY COURTS—PROCEDURE.

In this state an equitable defense not involving affirmative relief or extraordinary remedy may be filed to any action at law in any of the courts. Hence to an action in a city court on a note under seal the defense of lack of consideration may be successfully pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Abbeville; D. H. Nicholson, Judge.

Action by J. H. Hutchinson against J. S. Lacey. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Land & Hall, for plaintiff in error. Hal Lawson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. The plaintiff sued upon a negotiable promissory note under seal. The defendant filed a plea showing, in substance, that the note was wholly lacking in consideration. The court refused to allow the defendant to introduce testimony tending to support his plea; and the sole question before this court is whether total lack of consideration is a good defense to a negotiable promissory note under seal.

It has frequently been held that failure of consideration, total or partial, is a good defense to such an instrument in this state. It has been held that fraud in the procurement may also be pleaded to such an instrument (House v. Martin, 125 Ga. 643, 54 S. E. 735), but it is said in the case of Slaton v. Fowler, 124 Ga. 955, 53 S. E. 567, that it is an open question in Georgia whether the common-law rule which forbade inquiry into consideration in a suit based on a specialty is applicable to promissory notes under seal to such an extent as to forbid recognition of a plea of total absence or want of consideration; and this precise point has not been decided subsequently. There is no question but that the presence of a seal raises a prima facie presumption that it is founded upon a consideration. Weaver v. Cosby, 109 Ga. 313, 34 S. E. 680; Rutherford v. Baptist Convention, 9 Ga. 54; Smith v. Smith, 36 Ga. 184, 91 Am. Dec. 761.

We have made a painstaking and careful search of the decisions of the Supreme Court, and in no case has the right to plead a total want of consideration to a negotiable promissory note under seal been denied except by way of obiter. There is a case (Beazley v. Gignilliat, 61 Ga. 187) in which the opinion expressly recites that the promissory note involved was under seal, and yet the judgment of the court below was reversed for refusing to allow the defendant to file a plea of lack of consideration. This is a full bench decision, but it does not seem to have been cited in any subsequent case. It would probably be subject to the criticism that it is a physical precedent only (as the section of the code on the subject of instruments under seal is not noticed) were it not for the fact that Chief Justice Warner, who wrote the opinion, cited the case of Albertson v. Holloway, 16 Ga. 377. In the case last cited (which was decided, however, prior to the adoption of our Code), it was said by the court: "We believe that the rule that a plea of failure of consideration cannot be used as a defense to a specialty applies to no other instruments, save such as were known to the common law as specialties, as deeds, bonds, and instruments executed with like solemnities of sealing and delivery. It has been common for courts to say that such defense cannot be set up to an instrument under seal. But we think that these words were used, or should have been used, with reference to such instruments as were executed with the ceremonies necessary to specialties at common law." In Sivell v. Hogan, 119 Ga. 169, 46 S. E. 67, there is a somewhat lengthy review of the authorities by Justice Cobb and the intimation of a personal opinion that a plea of original lack of consideration would not be a good defense to a suit based on a contract under seal, though the court very frankly states that what is said on this subject is obiter.

Section 3656 of the Civil Code of 1895 provides: "A consideration is essential to a contract which the law will enforce. An executory contract without such consideration is called a nudum pactum, or a naked promise. In some cases a consideration is presumed, and an averment to the contrary will not be received. Such are generally contracts under seal, and negotiable instruments alleging a consideration upon their face, in the hands of innocent holders without notice, who have received the same before dishonored." It is said in Sivell v. Hogan, supra, that this section of the Code is declaratory of the common law; and this is true in the sense that it is not the codification of a statute. However, in so far as the section contains an assumption or indirect statement that at common law contracts under seal were conclusively presumed to be founded on a consideration, it is not an accurate declaration of the common-law principle on that subject. The courts and text-writers who have made the deepest and most philosophical research into the history of the question are in accord upon the proposition that specialties—those formal common-law contracts under seal—were enforced in the absence of an allegation of consideration, not because it was conclusively presumed that they were founded on a consideration, but because consideration was not an essential element to such contracts. Contracts under seal were enforceable at common law because of the formality of their execution, and such contracts were fully recognized and enforced long before the doctrine of consideration appeared in the law. In those early days the courts looked to the form and solemnity attending the execution of the promise rather than to its nature, the subject-matter, and surrounding circumstances in determining whether the promise was enforceable and binding or not. Except in a few cases to which the common-law action of debt was applied, no contract was enforceable at early common law unless it was under seal. An ordinary executory contract not under seal was without a remedy for its enforcement. Later on, by looking at the breach of an executory contract not under seal as a wrong arising ex delicto, the courts afforded a remedy by extending to such transactions the action of trespass on the case, a remedy not originally designed for that purpose. For example, a plaintiff would allege that the defendant had done him a wrong and had damaged him, in that he had undertaken to build a house in a good and workmanlike manner, which undertaking the defendant had not kept, whereby the plaintiff was damaged. To afford a remedy in such a case the court looked upon the defendant's conduct as something in the nature of a deceit resulting in damage to the plaintiff, and applied to the transaction the tort action of trespass on the case. Finally this form of action was extended so as to afford a remedy for the breach of every promise which had resulted in detriment to the promisee. Cases arose, however, in which this remedy was invoked, and it appeared that the plaintiff had given the defendant nothing to induce his promise; that is to say, the plaintiff had suffered no detriment through the promise since he had done nothing or given up nothing therefor, and the court refused to afford such a plaintiff the remedy. This was the inchoation of the doctrine of the necessity for consideration in contracts. The plaintiff was required to show that he had given a consideration before he was allowed to have a remedy for the breach of the defendant's promise. A similar concept attached to the action of assumpsit when it came into use. On the general subject, see Anson's Law of Contracts; 2 Pollock & Maitland's History of English Law, c. 5; 3 Halsbury's Laws of England, p. 83, § 170; J. B. Ames on the History of Assumpsit, 2 Harv. Law Rev. 1, 53.

In this connection, it may be pertinent to call attention to the peculiar relation existing between right and remedy at common law. In those times, when the common law was being developed, the courts had a very indistinct concept of an actual wrong in the abstract; indeed, for the most part it seems that they had no concept at all of a legal wrong apart from the forms of action which had been framed and developed from time to time. We recall the familiar Grecian tradition that the robber, Procrustes, had a bed used in the torture of his victims. He placed his captives on this bed, and, if they were short, they were stretched, and if they were tall, they were lopped off so that the length of the body was made exactly the length of the bed. Common-law writs and forms were Procrustean beds, and the rights of parties were the hapless victims that were stretched or cut to adapt them to the measure of the particular forms of action or defense which the courts had invented or permitted. Our doctrine, announced as a fundamental in sections 3076 and 4929 of the Civil Code of 1895, that for every right there is a remedy, and every court having jurisdiction of the one may, if necessary, frame the other, is not declaratory of the common law as actually practiced, though many of the early English judges and law writers claimed that their procedure had reached that stage of proficiency. Members of the profession in this state will probably recall an interesting paper on this subject read before the Georgia Bar Association at its session in 1901 by Hon. Sylvanus Morris, dean of the law department of the University of Georgia.

Until the adoption of the Hilary rules, there was no provision under the administration of the common law in the English courts for pleading either an original lack of consideration or a failure of consideration otherwise than under the general issue; that is to say, the plea of general issue put in issue not only the alleged promise, but also the alleged consideration therefor. 4 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 944. If, therefore, the suit were on a specialty, either by action of debt or covenant, since the prescribed form for either of these actions contained no reference to consideration, there was no possibility of raising the question of the lack of consideration by the plea of the general issue, as in assumpsit and other similar cases where a recital of consideration was required. The English courts in the early times in which the principles of the common law were taking on their primitive embodiment seem never to have been called upon to frame or permit a plea raising the point that a specialty was without consideration. A reason which promptly suggests itself as to why this state of things should have existed is that in those early times when commercial transactions were few the execution of a deed or bond or other paper at common law known as a specialty was generally attended by such circumstances of solemnity and formality, and with such mature deliberation as to the consequences that but few, if any, cases actually arose in which the person sealing the bond or other specialty did so without receiving from the obligee something which the law in later times called a consideration, and consequently the cases were naturally rare in which a defendant could have been likely to seek to raise, by plea, the defense of want of consideration. The courts, therefore, may not have been called upon to frame a plea for the setting up of want of consideration to an action based on a specialty; the remedy not being created, because there was no need for it.

The foregoing statement relates, of course, to the earlier days of the common law; but those earlier days were nevertheless the formative period. While the courts were developing the doctrine of consideration as a necessary element of a simple contract, specialties continued to be enforced because of the formality of their execution and were considered as entirely without the rule thus more lately applied as to consensual obligations not under seal. McKelvey, in his Common Law Pleading (page 21), in discussing the earlier forms of actions, says: "The real fact of the matter was that there were two distinct grounds for holding a promisor liable on his promise, either one of which was sufficient—one, and the earlier, because he deliberately intended to make himself liable and so indicated by the solemnity of the seal; the other, because he had received a consideration which it would be unjust to the promisee to allow him to keep unless he was held liable upon the promise." So rigid was the common-law practice of enforcing contracts under seal on account of the formality and solemnity of their execution that the rule in courts of law was that "a sealed instrument could be discharged only by another instrument of as high a character, or else by the surrender of it so that the creditor could not make profit of it. A debtor who had complied with his bond, but who had failed to take a release under seal, could not defend an action on the bond. On the other hand, the law courts enforced, with like hardship, the rule that the obligee in a sealed instrument which had been lost or accidentally destroyed was prohibited from maintaining an action upon it, since he could not make the profert which the inflexible rules of legal procedure required." Pomeroy, Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) §§ 70, 71, 383. Thus the matter stood in the courts of law. The courts of equity, however, took a broader view more in accordance with common sense and the natural justice of the transaction. "The important part played by the seal in the early common law, and the intensely technical and arbitrary effects produced by it according to the legal rules, are too well known to require any statement. * * * Equity, disregarding such form and looking at the reality, always requires an actual consideration, and permits the want of it to be shown, notwithstanding the seal, and applies this doctrine to covenants, settlements, and executory agreements of every description." Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) § 383; Pollock's Principles of Contract, 168, 169; Ord v. Johnston, 1 Jur. (N. S.) 1063, 1065; Houghton v. Lees, 1 Jur. (N. S.) 862, 863; Jeffreys v. Jeffreys, Craig & P. 138, 141. In a few of the early chancery cases, as is remarked in the footnote to the foregoing section from Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, it was held that voluntary agreements under seal would be enforced, but these decisions and dicta have long since been overruled. It is a well-settled equitable doctrine, resting on innate justice, that in every binding contract there must be a quid pro quo.

Every student of the development of the common-law system has been struck by the fact that between the courts of law and the courts of equity there existed throughout the formative period a juridic jealousy. Whenever courts of equity began to give a remedy which modified the rigor and technicality of any common-law principle especially prolific of hardship and injustice, the law courts would at first protest against the invasion but would finally follow the lead by themselves finding some way to give the same relief against the hardship and injustice. This was frequently done by resort to fictions; at other times by providing new writs, new processes, or new pleas formerly unknown or unrecognized. Usually, in the end, the law courts reached the point that in ordinary transactions they dealt the same degree of substantial justice (as contradistinguished from formal justice) as did the courts of equity. For example, despite the rigid adherence of the early common-law courts to the rule that although the debtor on a bond or other specialty had paid the demand in full, but had failed to secure a release under seal or a surrender of the instrument, even if he had taken an ordinary receipt reciting the payment of the bond, the creditor might still sue and recover the full amount of the bond again, yet, when the courts of equity broke in on the rigor of the law and gave a remedy against this hardship, the common-law lawyers at first inveighed against the courts of chancery for this invasion of legal rules; nevertheless the equitable doctrine long ago became a part of the law enforceable in any and all courts. See Pomeroy, supra, § 383, note 2. As showing how reluctance in this respect finally became alacrity, if not eagerness, it is interesting to note the case of Sturdy v. Arnaud (1790) 8 T. R. 599, in which the defendant had given to his creditor a bond to secure an annuity, but before this demand became due loaned him a sum of money, and it was agreed that the latter should retain the payments of the annuity as they became due until the same was discharged; and, this creditor having become bankrupt and the defendant being sued by his assignees in bankruptcy, the agreement to retain was held to be well pleaded to an action on the bond for the payments on the annuity accruing after bankruptcy, the pleading of such agreement and the retainer being held to be equivalent to a plea of solvit ad diem. Counsel argued that the defendant had no right to retain the arrears of this annuity against the debt due by him to the bankrupt on the ground that the agreement would operate as a defeasance, and there could be no defeasance of a deed or specialty by a mere recital not under seal; and he cited the case of Blennerhasset v. Pierson, 8 Lev. 234. Lord Kenyon, C. J., replying to this argument of counsel, said: "Indeed, I should be sorry for the plaintiffs themselves if the law were with them, since their conduct is so unconscientious that, if the defendants were to apply to a court of equity for relief, that court would not only give such relief, but would also decree the plaintiffs to pay the costs both in law and equity, on the same principle on which Sir Thomas More, when Lord Chancellor, proceeded when he first gave relief against the penalty of the bond, the obligee in that case having paid the sum mentioned in the condition after, though not on the day."

So far as we have been able to find, no court of law situated in a jurisdiction administering the unmodified common law has so far departed from the early doctrine as to allow a plea of want of consideration as a defense to a purely legal action on a common-law specialty, and yet to this extent alone the ancient rule seems to have preserved its original rigor. See footnote to the case of Garden v. Derrickson, 2 Del. Ch. 386, as reported in 95 Am. Dec. 286. See, also, Joyce on Defenses to Commercial Paper, § 217. In this state, while the common law affords the basis of our system of jurisprudence, we have adopted the common law only so far as it is suited to our form of government and to our general juridic policy. We have emancipated substantive law from the form of action, so that the former is no longer dependent upon the latter for its right of recognition. The form and the remedy are now subservient to the right. The distinctions between law and equity have been to a large extent abolished, and courts of law administer equitable rights, and equitable defenses may be filed to actions at law. We no longer, except in a few very rare cases, resort to those fictions by which the common-law courts were wont to give elasticity to the system, but we do directly and without apology what the common-law courts did indirectly and, in a sense, equivocally.

The common-law rule that a seal attached to an instrument would, by its very presence, dispense with the necessity for consideration—that element which the experience and mature thought of mankind has come fully to recognize as essential to every contract which is to be given legal efficacy—is antiquated and obsolete. In early times the seal was a solemn thing. It was a symbol of the knight's honor pledged to his promise. It was the coat of arms taken from the device engraved on the shield of knight or nobleman and planted upon the bond as a gage of faith. The bond thus sealed was in some sense an imitation of that early form of promise which was secured "by oath and wed and borh." There was a time when the adding of the seal had a distinct religious aspect, and was used to create a binding obligation on the conscience of the promisor rather than to give a specific civil liability against him. In those days only the few had seals. At the date of the Conquest the Norman Duke had a seal, and the late King of England had had a seal, but only these and bishops and counts had them. In France during the times of Bracton the privilege of using the seal was confined to the "gentixhomes." In England in the thirteenth century, when the law for the great had become the law for all, every free and lawful man was permitted to have a seal. 2 Pollock & Maitland, History of English Law, 221. It is a far cry from the day when the nobleman placed the device from his coat of arms as a seal upon his bond or his humbler neighbor bit the wax with his foretooth for a like purpose to the "L. S." of everyday use, employed without any circumstance of solemnity, and printed, not by the party himself nor by his lord, but by some printer upon a standard commercial form. Compare Lowe v. Morris, 13 Ga. 153, and Sterling v. Park, 129 Ga. 311, 58 S. E. 828, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 298, 121 Am. St. Rep. 224. Judge Russell, who has written the opinion of the court this day filed in the case of Sims v. Scheussler, 64 S. E. 99, involving a like question, has quoted at length from the lucid language of the judges in the Lowe Case, supra, and it is not necessary that I should do so here.

So much of the common law as declared that the form alone in which the contract was embodied and the formality with which it was executed was equivalent to consideration or so important as to forbid inquiry into consideration or to dispense with the necessity for it is utterly unsuited to our times and to our commercial activities, and is out of harmony with our system of jurisprudence. It is wholly obsolete. In those days form was everything and substance nothing. In our times we disregard form and look to the substance of transactions. Mutual intention and lawful consideration, and not mere useless form, are with us the cardinals that give to contracts essence and that particular quality which commands and permits courts of law to enforce them. Wherever form has a substantial value it is preserved and regarded; otherwise it is not. The formality of writing required by the statute of frauds serves a useful purpose, and neither law nor equity would raise a hand to destroy it. A will is an instrument which stands or falls according to its formality, and depends not on consideration; and, since there is a useful purpose in preserving this formality, law and equity alike observe it. There may be cases—indeed, we think there are—in which a sealed instrument or specialty will be enforced, though it has no consideration. For instance, it is a principle well recognized that a person desiring to make a gift of money in future cannot accomplish this end effectively by the execution of a simple contract or promissory note and the delivery of it to the proposed beneficiary. Therefore the adoption of a sealed instrument as a means of making a gift of money in the future has sometimes been resorted to and recognized even in those jurisdictions which in other instances deny the validity and sacredness of the seal. See the note to the case of Richardson v. Richardson, 26 L. R. A. 308. Thus in New Jersey by statute a seal is not conclusive evidence of consideration. In the case of Aller v. Aller, 40 N. J. Law, 446, it was held that a promise under seal to pay money, though voluntary, was still enforceable, even after the death of the obligor, if the intention to make a gift was proved. Our minds give full assent to the correctness of this proposition. So, too, we can conceive of a case, and such cases have arisen, where an office is created without emoluments, and yet a bond for the faithful discharge of the duties of the office have been required. The giving of such a bond may be said in a very fair sense to be without consideration on the part of the obligor, and yet, without any violation of the rule we are seeking to support, a recovery on such a bond may be upheld. Indeed, there is much to support the theory intimated as obiter by Judge Starnes in the case of Albertson v. Holloway, 16 Ga. 379, that the common-law rule still applies to those specialties which were known as such at common law; e. g., deeds, single and double bonds, etc.

Commercial negotiable instruments under seal were not recognized at common law. To apply to them the rigor of the common-law rule dispensing with consideration is to apply this rule in a case in which the common law itself did not apply it. A negotiable promissory note under seal is a legal hybrid; but it is fully recognized in the law of this state. Such a note at common law would not have been a commercial paper, nor would it have been classed as a negotiable instrument. We treat it as a commercial paper, and apply to it all the incidents of a negotiable instrument. The custom of putting a seal upon a promissory note has come about, not through a desire on the part of those making and taking such papers to foreclose the question of consideration, but chiefly to make the period of the statute of limitations applicable thereto 20 years, instead of 6 years. It would seem just and reasonable and highly expedient, therefore, that the presence of the seal on such instruments should have no higher effect than the parties using it intend that it should have, and should not give to it the effect of foreclosing the question of consideration. As showing how any other rule would result in hardship, take the case of A., desiring to borrow money from B., with C. willing to give his accommodation paper to A., that he might transfer it to B., as security for the loan. B. prefers that the note he takes as collateral security shall be sealed, in order that it may not go out of date before the expiry of a period, more than six years, during which the loan is to run. C. therefore executes his note under seal to A., who indorses it as collateral security to B. Afterwards A. pays the debt due to B., and receives back the note signed by C. Shall he then be entitled to collect this accommodation paper out of C.? Our use in this state of promissory notes under seal is so frequent as to make it a matter of the greatest inexpediency and bad policy to allow an inapt and antiquated rule of the common law to stand in the way of inquiry into the consideration for such paper. Whether we look at the question from the view that a sealed contract will be enforced because of its formality, without reference to the question of consideration, or from the view that, when a seal is present, the law, as a rule of evidence, conclusively presumes that there was a consideration, and will hear no proof to the contrary, we should be led into such absurdity that even the stoniest defender of the common-law doctrine would hesitate before carrying it to its limits, if we should attempt to apply it to a case where a debtor had executed under seal a number of voluntary promises to pay and the holders of these promises attempted to enforce them against the debtor's property or estate, in prejudice to the rights of creditors, where the debtor had become bankrupt or had died, or for any other reason his property should be before the court for administration. There is hardly a lawyer or a layman whose innate sense of justice would not be shocked at such a thing, and yet the common law had no exceptions to the rule in favor of third persons, though courts of equity did. The whole temper of our times, the general scheme of our jurisprudence, is in accord with the policy that a person should not irrevocably bind his property or his estate by voluntary contracts or agreements by promises for which he gets nothing, and which cost the promisee nothing.

We have shown above that courts of equity have always refused to give the same sanctity to a seal as did the courts of law, and have always allowed inquiry into consideration, and have never dispensed with the necessity therefor. We have adverted to the fact that in this state equitable defenses may be asserted in courts of law. Civ. Code 1895, § 5049, provides: "The defendant may, by proper pleadings, raise issues of law, or of fact, legal or equitable, or both." Any equitable defense not necessitating the granting of affirmative extraordinary relief may be successfully filed in a city court. House v. Oliver, 123 Ga. 784, 51 S. E. 722; Gentle v. Atlas Savings & Loan Association, 105 Ga. 406, 31 S. E. 544; National Bank v. Carlton, 96 Ga. 469 (3), 23 S. E. 388. It follows, therefore, that, when a defendant is sued upon a sealed instrument lacking in consideration, he may plead the defense of want of consideration in a court of law as he formerly could have done in a court of equity. This express point was ruled in the case of Judy v. Louderman, 48 Ohio St. 562, 29 N. E. 181. In 1834 an act was passed in that state permitting the plea of lack of consideration to be filed to an action founded on a specialty, but this act was subsequently repealed. The Code of Civil Procedure afterwards adopted, provided, however, that "the defendant may set forth in his answer as many grounds of defense, counterclaim, and set-off as he may have, whether they be such as have been heretofore denominated legal or equitable, or both." The court in holding that, if a sealed obligation was executed without consideration, a defendant might under this section plead it as a defense in a court of law, said: "As against a strictly legal cause of action, a defendant, therefore, may now set up an equitable defense, and thereby not only bar the plaintiff's action, but obtain the proper affirmative equitable relief connected with the subject-matter. And, although the common law in requiring a valuable consideration in order to render an agreement valid and binding declared, in its strictness, that a seal was conclusive evidence of such a consideration, yet, in determining rights of parties upon equitable principles, a seal has been divested of the apparent sacredness with which it was clothed by the common law; and equity, looking rather to reality than form, does not permit a seal to supply the place of a consideration, and, notwithstanding the seal, will allow the want or failure of such consideration to be shown in the enforcement of executory contracts of every description. In Richardson v. Bates,

8 Ohio St. 264, it was said by Sutliff, J.: 'Under the statute of February 24, 1834, allowing the failure or part failure of consideration to be given in evidence in a suit upon a specialty, the facts stated in the answer would have constituted a perfect defense. And the provision of the Code allowing a defendant to set forth in his answer equitable as well as legal grounds of defense permitted the same defenses to be made in this case; and therefore the failure of consideration, stated in the answer, constituted a good defense.'

Now, summing up: The law courts of England prior to the adoption of the common law in this state enforced, without reference to or thought of consideration, certain contracts executed according to an ancient and solemn form and known as "specialties," deeming the mere formality of execution to be a sufficient reason for their enforcement. This state adopted the law of England (and hence the body of the common law) in force on May 14, 1776, only so far as it was suited to our conditions, form of government, and general policy. Even at common law, as it became more developed, the right and justice of requiring consideration as an element of contracts was recognized, and only a slavery to Procrustean form and ancient precedent upheld the doctrine that specialties might be enforced in the absence of consideration. Equity refused to bow the knee to form, was willing to observe it only when it subserved some useful purpose, and disregarded it when it stood in the way of the erection of just and substantial principles. Hence the equitable doctrine was that, except in certain rare cases, a contract would not be enforced because of the formality of its execution alone. At the date of our adoption of the common law, the tendency was strong in the courts of law to break away from slavery to form and technicality and to approach nearer to the standards of equity jurisprudence even in the administration of what they called legal rights. In this state the distinctions between legal and equitable rights have been largely abolished; for every right there is a remedy, and even in a court of law equitable defenses, not involving relief through some extraordinary remedy, may be pleaded to a strictly legal action. A sealed negotiable promissory note is a form of contract unknown to the common law. Hence it is doubtful that such a contract would even in a court adhering strictly to the common law be regarded as so formal a contract as to deserve enforcement without reference to consideration and for its formality alone. Certainly such a contract, though under seal, would not be enforced in a court of equity if wanting in consideration. Hence under our system which allows equitable defenses in legal actions a plea of total lack of consideration may be successfully pleaded to an action on such a contract, even in a court of law. The ruling of the trial court was therefore erroneous.

WARREN v. STATE (No. 1,713.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 23, 1909.)

1. WEAPONS (§ 10*)—CARRYING WEAPONS—MANNER OF CARRYING OR CONCEALMENT.

Ordinarily to conceal a pistol in a sack which is carried under the arm is a violation of section 341 of the Penal Code of 1895, which forbids carrying about the person a weapon concealed. Boles v. State, 86 Ga. 255, 12 S. E. 361.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Cent. Dig. § 9; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 394*)—EVIDENCE—EVIDENCE OBTAINED BY UNLAWFUL SEARCH—ADMISSIBILITY.

Evidence obtained by the illegal seizure and search of a defendant's person which compels him to incriminate himself is inadmissible against him. But incriminating facts discovered by another from an illegal search of the property or premises of the defendant are admissible against him. Hughes v. State, 2 Ga. App. 29, 58 S. E. 890; Glover v. State, 4 Ga. App. 455, 61 S. E. 862; Croy v. State, 4 Ga. App. 456, 61 S. E. 848; Rogers v. State, 4 Ga. App. 691, 62 S. E. 96; Williams v. State, 100 Ga. 511, 28 S. [Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 877; Dec. Dig. § 394.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 777*)—TRIAL—REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS ERRONEOUS IN PART.

It follows from the foregoing headnote that the court properly refused to charge the jury: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant was illegally arrested, and while under illegal restraint his person or property was searched and the evidence was obtained, then you would not be authorized to find him guilty." This is not the law as applicable to the facts discovered by search of defendant's property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 777.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 394*)—EVIDENCE—EVIDENCE OBTAINED BY UNLAWFUL SEARCH—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where the accused was illegally arrested and his person searched, and no weapon was found thereon, but in a sack which he had under his arm when arrested, and which prior to the search of his person he had voluntarily given to another to keep for him, there was subsequently found a pistol concealed, the evidence of this fact was admissible against him.

WILSON v. STATE. (No. 1,658.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 23, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 593*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF COUNSEL.

It is not error to overrule a motion for continuance based upon the absence of leading counsel, where no good and sufficient reason is shown why he is absent. Where there is no attempt to explain the cause of his absence, the motion should be overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1320; Dec. Dig. § 593.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 584*)—VENUE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Venue may be proved by circumstantial evidence; but circumstances which render it possible that an alleged crime was committed within the jurisdiction of the court are insufficient to establish the jurisdictional element of venue where, from the circumstances adduced, it is as reasonable and possible that the crime was committed beyond the jurisdiction of the court. In the absence of any direct evidence as to where an alleged offense was committed, the mere circumstance that the defendant resides in the county in which the crime is alleged to have been committed, or the statement that he was at his home in the county a portion of the day on which the offense was alleged to have been committed, is not sufficient, without more, to establish the jurisdiction of the court; and both circumstances combined are insufficient to prove venue, unless the evidence shows that the crime under investigation was committed at his home. Especially is this true where there is no testimony identifying the particular point, or house, or locality at which the alleged criminal act was committed.

1. CARRIERS (§§ 235, 240*)—MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 101*)—"CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS"—WHO ARE PASSENGERS—EMPLOYEES RIDING TO WORK—EXISTENCE OF RELATION OF MASTER AND SERVANT.

A corporation engaged in the manufacture of lumber operated an engine and flat cars in connection with its business for the purpose of hauling timber and transporting its employees to and from their places of work. Held: (a) The lumber company was not a carrier of passengers, and its employees while being transported were not passengers. (b) The relation of master and servant existed between the company and its employees while the latter were being transported to and from their places of work, and the company was charged with the duty of exercising ordinary care in furnishing cars and appliances in a reasonably safe condition. Where the safety of the servant is put in jeopardy by the negligence of the master, and in attempting to escape the apparently imminent danger the servant is injured, it is no defense to the master that the servant misjudged the danger, provided the facts were sufficient upon which to base a reasonable fear that the danger was impending. 1. COVENANTS (§ 102*)—COVENANT OF WARRANTY—EVICTION.

Eviction, or its equivalent, to constitute a breach of warranty of title, must be founded on a title paramount to that conveyed by the warrantor in the instrument containing the warranty in question. Davis v. Smith, 5 Ga. 274, 47 Am. Dec. 279 (14); Clements v. Collins, 59 Ga. 124 (1); Osborn v. Fritchard, 104 Ga. 145, 30 S. E. 656 (2); Stiger v. Munroe, 109 Ga. 457, 34 S. E. 595 (1).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. § 161; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

2. COVENANTS (§ 122*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Consequently when, upon the trial of an action for breach of warranty of title to standing timber, the plaintiff, for the purpose of showing such breach, relies upon a judgment of nonsuit rendered against him in an action of trespass, which he brought against parties alleged to have cut and removed such timber after he had purchased the same, if the judgment of nonsuit can have such effect, he should, in order to make out a prima facie case for recovery, show, from the evidence introduced by him upon the trial of such trespass case, that the court, in rendering the judgment of nonsuit, necessarily passed upon the validity of the title held by the warrantor in question at the date of the warranty sued upon. He fails to do this when he merely shows the institution by him of the action of trespass and a judgment of nonsuit therein, without showing that such judgment was rendered after the introduction of evidence which involved a consideration of the title conveyed by the warrantor in the deed containing the warranty sued upon. Clements v. Collins, supra.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. § 224; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

3. COVENANTS (§ 122*)—COVENANT OF WARRANTY—EVICTION.

Evidence tending to show the existence of an outstanding paramount title, at the date of the warranty sued upon, is wholly insufficient to show a breach of the warranty, unless accompanied by proof that the plaintiff, or some one claiming under him, has been compelled to yield to such title, or that he is in a situation requiring him to do so presently, as a matter of legal duty. Clements v. Collins, supra; Haines v. Fort, 93 Ga. 24, 18 S. E. 994 (3).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. § 224; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 1050, 1064*)—HARMLESS ERROR—DECISION CORRECT ON MERITS.

Applying these principles to the present case, the verdict in favor of the defendant was absolutely demanded, with or without the evidence introduced by the defendant; and hence it is unnecessary to consider the assignments of error, made in the motion for a new trial, upon the rulings as to the admissibility of evidence introduced by the defendant, and upon instructions given by the trial judge to the jury, and it follows that there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

COPELAND v. LUCAS. (No. 1,631.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 23, 1909.)

POSSESSORY WARRANT (§§ 1, 4*)—SCOPE OF REMEDY—EVIDENCE.

Possessory warrant is available as a remedy as against one who takes possession of the personal goods of another without the consent of the latter and without lawful authority. It having been shown in this case that the party who sued out the possessory warrant was in prior peaceable possession of the property found in the defendant's possession, she established a prima facie case. The court was fully authorized to hold that the evidence in behalf of the defendant failed to rebut the case thus made. There was no error in dismissing the certiorari.

Error from Superior Court, Brooks County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Action by Hattie Lucas against E. P. Copeland. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order overruling a certiorari, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Branch & Snow, for plaintiff in error. J. D. Wade, Jr., for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The decision in this case is controlled by the rulings of the Supreme Court in Marchman v. Todd, 15 Ga. 25, and Manning v. Mitcherson, 69 Ga. 447, 47 Am. Rep. 764.

The only point raised by the plaintiff in error is that possessory warrant is not the proper remedy under the facts of the instant case, and that for that reason the judge of the superior court erred in overruling the certiorari. The insistence of counsel for the plaintiff in error is that, inasmuch as there was no fraud, violence, seduction, or other like means used by the plaintiff in error to get possession of the goods, the defendant in error should have instituted bail trover. The decision of this court in Dennard v. Butler, 2 Ga. App. 198, 58 S. E. 297, is relied upon as authority. The ruling in that case, following several decisions of the Supreme Court, is that possessory warrant is not available as a remedy to recover personal property where the defendant has obtained possession by the consent of the plaintiff. That decision is not in point in a case where, according to the undisputed evidence, the possession of the property was acquired without the consent of the owner or former possessor. In that decision the rulings in Trotti v. Wyly, 77 Ga. 684, that "unless it clearly appears that the defendant acquired possession in one of the modes inhibited by the [statute] there is nothing for the proceeding to rest on," and that "under a possessory warrant there is no question as to the title or as to the right of possession, but the sole question is as to the manner in which the possession has been obtained by the defendant," are quoted, and the case of Brown v. Todd, 124 Ga. 939, 53 S. E. 678, is also cited, but there is nothing therein which is in conflict with the earlier rulings in the Marchman and Manning Cases, supra. Possessory warrants are available under section 4799 of the Civil Code of 1895, it is true, wherever "any personal chattel has been taken, enticed, or carried away either by fraud, violence, seduction, or other like means from the possession of the party complaining," and most of the reported cases have dealt with this portion of the act of 1821. But while, under possessory warrant, title nor right of possession are not at issue, the terms of the original act of 1821, now embodied in that section of the Code, are equally applicable to instances where a "personal chattel, having recently been in the quiet, peaceable, and legally acquired possession of such complaining party, has disappeared without his consent, and, as he believes, has been received or taken possession of by the party complained against under some pretended claim, and without lawful warrant or authority."

In the Manning Case, supra, it was held that possessory warrant was the proper remedy for the recovery of the woman's tame canary bird, which, having disappeared without the knowledge or consent of the owner, was received and taken possession of by a man who refused to surrender it because he thought he had been discourteously treated. There was no evidence on the line of the insistence of the plaintiff in error in this case that Mr. Manning obtained the canary bird either by fraud, violence, seduction, or other like manner; but the court held that "a possessory warrant will lie against any one who receives or takes possession of a personal chattel under a pretended claim and without lawful warrant or authority." In the Marchman Case, supra, Judge Lumpkin, discussing the preamble to the act of 1821, as well as the act itself, shows that the law is not confined to cases where possession has been obtained by fraud, violence, or seduction, and he so analyzes the statute as a whole as to show it has a scope broad enough to include all cases where the change of the possession of a personal chattel is effected without the consent of the plaintiff and without authority of law. He sums up the ruling of the court as follows: "It will be perceived, moreover, that the law applies to every possession which has been acquired without the consent of the opposite party or without authority of law." The only case cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error which by any construction would appear to be in conflict with the older and controlling authority from which we have just quoted is that of Owens v. Outlaw, 105 Ga. 477, 30 S. E. 427, and careful reading of the Owens Case shows it to be in accordance with the general principle that where the possession of the party complained against is obtained without the consent of the complaining party, and without warrant or authority of law, possessory warrant may be resorted to as a remedy. In the Owens Case the defendant was in possession by virtue of a contract with the plaintiff. His original possession rested upon the plaintiff's consent, and the only question at issue was whether the defendant had the right under the terms of the contract to retain possession for a longer time.

The evidence in the present case was sufficient to authorize the conclusion on the part of the lower court that the plaintiff had never voluntarily parted with possession of her goods, and that they were obtained by the defendant to secure an indebtedness of the plaintiff's husband or father, without her consent and without authority of law. There was no error in dismissing the certiorari.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 485*)—EFFECT OF APPEAL.

Where the maker and the indorser of a promissory note are jointly sued in a county court, and a judgment rendered against the indorser, and a nonsuit awarded as to the maker, and an appeal to the superior court entered by the plaintiff, the entire case is appealed, and the judgment against the indorser is suspended until the termination of the case on appeal.

2. SALES (§ 475*)—TRANSFER OF NOTE—EFFECT AS TO TRANSFERRING SECURITY—ACTIONS—DEFENSES.

The transfer of a promissory note given for the purchase money of personal property, the seller retaining title to the personalty until paid for, carried with it the right to the security and the remedy of the vendor against the vendee in reference thereto. After the transfer, the vendor had no title to the property, and its seizure and sale by the transferee of the note under a judgment against the vendor was a mere nullity, by which the transferee gained nothing and the maker of the notes lost nothing. The fact that the holder of the note became the purchaser of the property at this void sale did not release the maker from his obligation to pay the note, or estop the holder from enforcing payment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action in the county court by S. A. Turnell against J. J. Carter, administrator, and others. Plaintiff was nonsuited as to part of the defendants, and appealed to the superior court, where defendants again had judgment, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Turnell brought suit in the county court of Jasper on four promissory notes against the makers and the indorser. There was a nonsuit as to the makers, and a judgment against the indorser. The plaintiff entered an appeal as to the makers to the superior court. On the trial of the appeal in the superior court, the defendants made the following written defense: "That at the trial term in the county court of said case the plaintiff, being nonsuited as to these defendants, took judgment against J. E. Durden as guarantor or indorser, and appealed the case as to these defendants to the superior court; that the plaintiff caused execution to be issued against J. E. Durden, and levy to be made upon the property for which the notes here sued on were given, and said property was sold as the property of J. E. Durden and bought by plaintiff." This plea was allowed by the court over the objection of the plaintiff that it set up no defense. The plaintiff admitted the allegations of the plea, and the court directed a verdict for the defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. No evidence was introduced, and the judgment was rendered on the pleadings and the admission of the plaintiff. The plaintiff assigns error on the allowance of the plea and on the direction of the verdict.

M. C. Few, for plaintiff in error. A. S. Thurman, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). No brief is submitted for defendants in error, and we do not know upon what theory of the law the trial judge based his judgment. In our opinion, the allowance of the plea and the direction of a verdict for the defendants were manifestly erroneous. The notes sued on recite that they are given for the purchase money of certain personal property named therein, to which title is reserved until the property shall be fully paid for. The notes were payable to the order of J. E. Durden, and were transferred by him, by written indorsement to the plaintiff before maturity. If the allegations of the plea above set out are true, they constitute no defense. The conduct of the plaintiff relied upon as a defense is wholly insufficient for that purpose for two reasons:

First. The appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment of nonsuit as to the makers carried up the entire case, and the judgment against the indorser was suspended until the termination of the appeal. Hanle v. Taylor, 4 Ga. App. 545, 61 S. E. 1054. The issuance of the fi. fa., based on the judgment rendered by the county court against the indorser, and the seizure of the personal property and bringing it to sale thereunder, were mere nullities, by which the plaintiff gained nothing and the defendants lost nothing. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4462, 4469, 4470, 5340; Carter v. Buchanan, 2 Ga. 337; Lewis v. Armstrong, 69 Ga. 752 (1). In other words, the appeal suspended the judgment against the indorser, and no execution could be legally issued thereon until the final ending of the appeal case.

Second. The seizure of the property under the fi. fa. issued on the judgment rendered by the county court against the indorser was a mere nullity for another reason. When the purchase-money notes containing the reservation of title to the personality therein named were transferred by the payee as indorser, the transfer carried with it the security for their payment. The legal title to the property was transferred from the payee to the purchaser of the notes; but the equitable title to the property remained in the makers of the notes. The holder of the notes became the legal transferee of the title of the payee to both the notes and the security mentioned therein. Acts 1887, p. 62; Cade v. Jenkins, 88 Ga. 791, 15 S. E. 292. When the property was seized and sold under a fi. fa. against the payee of the notes, nothing was sold except his title, and this title he had already transferred to the plaintiff in fi. fa.; and when the plaintiff in fi. fa. bought in the property at this sale he got nothing, and the rights of the makers of the notes to the property, when they paid for it, were in nowise affected by these illegal proceedings. The sale of the property was not only premature and illegal, because the appeal suspended the judgment against the indorser, but it was invalid, because the indorser had no title to sell. All the proceedings set out in the plea which the court allowed as a defense were mere nullities. The plaintiff, by such null and void proceedings, by which he gained nothing, and the makers lost nothing, did not estop himself from proceeding with his suit against the makers of the notes.

What was a mere nullity as to the holder of the notes could not operate to release the makers of the notes from their obligation to pay them. Cooper v. Smith, 125 Ga. 167, 53 S. E. 1013. We are satisfied that the court erred in holding that the allegations of the plea constituted a defense which upon their being admitted, authorized the direction of a verdict for the defendants.

Judgment reversed.

McSWAIN v. EDGE. (No. 1,635.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 23, 1909.)

1. MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§§ 36, 47*)—PETITION.

A petition which shows that a landlord maliciously, and for the purpose of injuring and damaging his tenant, whose term had not expired and whose rent was not in default, sued out a dispossessionary warrant and caused the tenant to be evicted, sets forth a valid cause of action for the malicious use of civil process. When the eviction was completed, the action, begun by the suing out of the dispossessionary warrant, was ipso facto ended. Hence a right of action immediately accrued in favor of the injured tenant.

2. PLEADING (§ 218*)—DEMURRER—SPECIAL DEMURRER—JUDGMENT OF DISMISSAL.

Where demurrers, both general and special, are filed to a petition, and the trial judge at one and the same time sustains all of the demurrers and dismisses the action, and it appears that the petition is not subject to the general demurrer, the judgment will be reversed. A peremptory judgment of dismissal is not the proper disposition of the case upon the sustaining of a special demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Columbus; G. Y. Tigner, Judge.

Action by T. D. McSwain against G. J. Edge. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This case comes up on an exception to the sustaining of a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition. Omitting formal and immaterial allegations, the petition set up that the plaintiff had rented from the defendant a dwelling house in the city of Columbus; that her term had not expired, and she was not in default with rent, when on November 3, 1907, she was forcibly evicted from the house by a lawful constable of the county upon a dispossessionary warrant sued out by the defendant before a justice of the peace, the defendant claiming that she owed him a small amount of rent. It is further alleged that the defendant's claim that the rent was due was untrue, and that the warrant was sworn out and served maliciously and for the purpose of injuring and damaging the plaintiff; that at the time she was evicted suitable houses were scarce, and she was put to great trouble and expense in securing one; that she was left houseless until 11 o'clock at night on the day of the eviction, and, on account of the exposure thus incurred, she suffered bodily pain, and contracted cold, from which an illness ensued with which she was still suffering at the time of bringing suit.

D. L. Parmer, for plaintiff in error. S. B. Hatcher, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The general demurrer specifies as the particular reasons why no cause of action is set forth that there is no averment that the defendant acted maliciously and without probable cause; also, that it is not alleged that the suit instituted by the defendant against the plaintiff had terminated. The action is based on the malicious use of civil process. In such cases it must appear that the former action was prosecuted maliciously and without probable cause, and that it is no longer pending. We think that all three of these elements appear from the present petition. The allegation that the dispossessionary warrant was maliciously sworn out is directly and unequivocally made. From the alleged facts that the plaintiff was a tenant, that her term had not expired, and that her rents were paid, it prima facie appears that the warrant was prosecuted without probable cause. Since it further appears that the warrant was executed and the eviction completed, it follows that the action begun under it is no longer pending; for, after eviction, there is no way provided by law for arresting the process or for converting it into mesne process, or for the forming of an issue thereon otherwise. Sturgis v. Frost, 56 Ga. 188; Cruselle v. Pugh, 71 Ga. 744 (2). The case of Sturgis v. Frost is on all fours with the present one. The case of Clement v. Orr, 4 Ga. App. 117, 60 S. E. 1017, is distinguishable from the one sub judice by reason of the fact that the distress warrant, for the suing out of which that suit was instituted, had been converted into mesne process by the filing of the statutory counter affidavit, and it did not appear that the issue thus formed had ever terminated. In the present instance no such issue had been formed, and all the reasoning of Judge Bleckley in the case in 56 Georgia is applicable. It therefore follows that the judge erred in sustaining the general demurrer.

2. Where a court at one and the same time passes upon a demurrer containing both general and special grounds, and sustains the demurrer and dismisses the action, without giving the plaintiff opportunity to amend, the judgment will be reversed if it appears that the general demurrer was improperly sustained. The proper judgment on a special demurrer, going only to the meagerness of the allegations, is not a peremptory judgment of dismissal of the action, but a judgment requiring the plaintiff to amend and to make his petition more certain in the particulars wherein he has been delinquent; and then, if he refuses to amend, the petition may be dismissed if the delinquency relates to the entire cause of action. However, if the special demurrer goes only to some particular part of the petition without which a valid cause of action would still be set forth, the result of finally sustaining the special demurrer would be not to dismiss the action, but to strike the defective portion. This is also the proper course where the special demurrer attacks some particular portion of the pleading for irrelevancy or impertinence. For example, in the present case, there was a special demurrer to the third and fourth paragraphs of the plaintiff's petition, in which it was alleged that the defendant had previously sworn out another dispossessory warrant and had failed to have it executed; and the special demurrer was to the irrelevancy and impertinence of this allegation. Let it be admitted for the sake of argument that this special demurrer was well taken, yet a judgment dismissing the entire petition should not follow. Only these paragraphs should be ordered stricken. As a matter of fact, however, in the present case, the contents of the paragraphs of the petition thus attacked, when considered in connection with the other allegations of the petition, were not irrelevant, being properly alleged by way of inducement and aggravation of the specific cause of action declared upon. Indeed, we find only one of the special demurrers well taken—the one in which the insistence is made that the nature of the rent contract and its terms and expiration are not distinctly set forth. Direction is given that the court require the plaintiff to make the allegation specific and definite in this respect.

Judgment reversed, with direction.

DRAPER v. STATE. (No. 1,641.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. March 23, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 15*)—OFFENSES—REPEAL OF STATUTES—EFFECT.

Although, as held in Glover v. State, 4 Ga. App. 455, 61 S. E. 862, all laws allowing the sale of intoxicating liquors in this state, of force prior to January 1, 1908, were repealed by the passage of the prohibition law (Acts 1907, p. 81), it is nevertheless legally possible to indict and convict for violations of any of the statutes repealed by the enactment of the general prohibition law, provided the offense is shown to have been committed prior to January 1, 1908.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 147*) — DEMURRER—GROUNDS—OFFENSES — REPEAL OF STATUTE—EFFECT.

Where an offense is charged under a statute regulating the sale of liquors, which has been repealed, the accusation is demurrable if the offense is alleged as having been committed on a day subsequent to December 31, 1907. Likewise the conviction of a defendant upon such an accusation would be unwarranted and contrary to law if the only criminal acts shown by the evidence were done after the repeal of the law which he was alleged to have violated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Dec. Dig. § 147.*]

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 196*) — DEFECTS—WAIVER.

If, however, the allegation that the offense was committed after the law had in fact been repealed is introduced warranting a finding that the defendant committed the offense at a time prior to the repeal, the allegation as to the date becomes immaterial, and the conviction of the defendant is authorized. The allegation that the offense was committed on a day subsequent to the repeal of the law upon which the criminal accusation is based is in effect the allegation of an impossible date, and is demurrable; but the defect cannot be reached by motion for new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Statesboro; J. F. Brannen, Judge.

Henry Draper was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor at retail without a license, and he brings error. Affirmed.

H. B. Strange and R. Lee Moore, for plaintiff in error. Fred T. Lanier, Sol., for the State.

RUSSELL, J. The plaintiff in error was tried upon an accusation in which it is alleged that on the 5th day of July, in the year 1908, he "unlawfully, * * * without license, and without taking the oath prescribed by law, and without license from the proper authorities," either of the county or of any city, "did sell * * * brandy, rum, gin, whisky, and spirituous and intoxicating liquor, and did sell by retail, for a valuable consideration, a certain quantity of wine, contrary to the laws of said state, the good order, peace, and dignity thereof." This accusation was filed at the August term, 1908, of the city court of Statesboro, and was tried at the October term of that court. The accusation is plainly one for retailing without license. All existing laws upon that subject were repealed in the passage of the prohibition bill of 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 81), which became effective January 1, 1908. Glover v. State, 4 Ga. App. 455, 61 S. E. 862 (1). Inasmuch as the accusation, upon its face, charged no offense against the laws of the state, it was subject to demurrer, and if a demurrer had been interposed the accusation should have been quashed. The defendant, however, did not demur. He went to trial, and after his conviction moved for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict finding him guilty is contrary to the evidence and contrary to the law. The trial judge overruled the motion for new trial, and exception is taken to his judgment.

Upon the trial, although there was evidence that the defendant sold some wine in 1908, several witnesses testified that they had bought wine from the defendant during the year 1907, and at various times during that year. The case is controlled by our ruling in Newsome v. State, 2 Ga. App. 392, 58 S. E. 672, and the trial judge did not err in overruling the defendant's motion for new trial. The defendant could not have been convicted for either of the sales alleged to have been made in 1908, because, as held in Glover v. State, 4 Ga. App. 455, 61 S. E. 862, the passage of the general prohibition law, which, by its terms, became effective January 1, 1908, repealed all existing statutes regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in this state. If the defendant had objected to the testimony regarding sales said to have been made by him in 1908, it would have been the duty of the trial court to repel this testimony; but there is no reason why one who may have violated any of the criminal statutes superseded and repealed by the general prohibition law may not still be legally indicted and convicted for the offense, provided the evidence demonstrates his guilt. Although, as held in Glover v. State, supra, all laws allowing the sale of intoxicating liquors in this state prior to January 1, 1908, were repealed by the passage of the general prohibition law, it is nevertheless legally possible to indict and convict for violations of any of the statutes repealed by the enactment of the general prohibition law, provided the offense is shown to have been committed prior to January 1, 1908. The present case is distinguished upon its facts from the Glover Case, supra. In the Glover Case the undisputed evidence was that the sales were made January 7, 1908, after the penal statutes upon the subject of retailing without license had been superseded by the general prohibition law. If the only sales shown by the testimony in this case had occurred subsequent to January 1, 1908, the defendant could not legally have been convicted.

2. Where an offense is charged under a repealed statute regulating the sale of liquors, the accusation is demurrable if the offense is alleged as having been committed on a day subsequent to December 31, 1907. Likewise the conviction of a defendant upon such an accusation would be unwarranted, and contrary to law, if the only criminal acts shown by the evidence were done after the repeal of the law which he was alleged to have violated. Glover v. State, 4 Ga. App. 455, 61 S. E. 862.

3. The case at bar is similar in principle, as well as in fact, to that of Newsome v. State, 2 Ga. App. 392, 58 S. E. 672, in which the accused was convicted in May, 1907, upon an accusation charging him with selling intoxicating liquors on October 29, 1907, but in which the evidence showed that he had unlawfully sold intoxicating liquors on October 29, 1906. We held that the indictment was properly demurrable, but that the exception which might have been urged to it came too late after the verdict. In that case it was insisted that the accusation upon which the defendant was tried charged the crime as having been committed on a day subsequent to the filing of the accusation and the trial thereon, and that for that reason the verdict and judgment were void; and after reviewing a large number of the decisions of the Supreme Court we held that the day on which the offense is laid is immaterial, unless the defendant, before pleading to the merits, demurs thereto. "The defendant must demur before pleading, or else he will be held to waive his right to have the essential elements of time and place stated with the certainty required by the Code." There can be no doubt that the accusation in the present case would have been good if the date of the alleged sale had been stated to be July 8, 1907, and in the absence of a demurrer raising the point the accusation would have been good if no date had been stated at all. Phillips v. State, 86 Ga. 427, 12 S. E. 650; Braddy v. State, 102 Ga. 568, 27 S. E. 670.

It was impossible for the offense of retailing without license to have been committed by this defendant on July 8, 1908; but the case is not any stronger when an impossible date is alleged than when no date is alleged. So that in the absence of demurrer the accusation presented a valid charge for the offense of retailing without license, and upon the trial several witnesses testified to having purchased wine from the defendant during the year 1907, which was within the statute of limitations and antedated the repeal of the law upon that subject by the general prohibition law. If, as in the Glover Case, supra, the only sales shown to have been made by the defendant had taken place in 1908, the defendant should have been granted a new trial, because his conviction would have been contrary to law. As, however, the allegation that the offense was committed after the law had in fact been repealed was not demurred to, and evidence was introduced warranting a finding that the defendant committed the offense charged at a time prior to the repeal, the allegation as to the date became immaterial, and the conviction of the defendant was authorized. The allegation that an alleged offense was committed on a date subsequent to the repeal of the law upon which the criminal accusation was based was, in effect, the allegation of an impossible date, and was demurrable; but the defect could not be reached by motion for new trial. Newsome v. State, 2 Ga. App. 392, 58 S. E. 672.

An error in the charge of the court (for the judge charged broadly that if the jury believed that the defendant sold, as alleged in the indictment, at any time within two years, the jury would be authorized to convict) would perhaps have required the grant of a new trial; but no exception is taken thereto; and, of course, an error in excluding from the jury, as a basis of conviction, sales which it was testified that the defendant had made since January 1, 1908, is not reached by the general assignment that the verdict is contrary to law.

Judgment affirmed.

BEARD v. INDEMNITY INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 9, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 665*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on a policy of accident insurance, evidence that insured was found lying at the bottom of a wall, badly injured, near the unrailled top of which he was reclining on a bench only shortly before, alone, and in the darkness of night, makes a prima facie case of injury by violent, external, and accidental means.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 805.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 648*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—ACTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

In such case, unless the injury is shown to have been intentionally self-inflicted, or intentionally inflicted by some other person, the legal presumption is that it was accidental.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1664; Dec. Dig. § 646.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 460*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—ACTIONS—DEFENSES—INTOXICATION.

Where an accident policy is conditioned against liability for injury happening while insured is intoxicated, and where plea in that behalf is to be successfully relied upon, the evidence must show that insured was actually intoxicated at the time the accident befell him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1179; Dec. Dig. § 460.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 132*)—INTOXICATION—APPEARANCE BEFORE AND AFTER TIME.

Evidence as to appearances of intoxication, or their absence, by witnesses who saw insured immediately before or after the injury, is proper and admissible in that behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 129*)—SIMILAR ACTS OR CONDITION.

It is a general rule that, where the issue is whether a person did a particular thing, or was in a particular state, the fact that he did a similar thing, or was in a similar state, at some other time is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

6. INSURANCE (§ 451*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—RISKS AND EXCEPTIONS—BEING ON RAILWAY OR BRIDGE.

In an accident policy, excepting liability for injury to insured while on the roadbed or bridge of a railway, the manifest intention is to exempt the insurer from responsibility for injury caused by collision with moving trains thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1171, 1172; Dec. Dig. § 451.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 461*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—"VOLUNTARY EXPOSURE TO UNNECESSARY DANGER."

In an accident policy which exempts liability as to an injury caused by the insured's "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," those words are properly interpreted to refer only to danger of a real, substantial character, which the insured recognized, but to which he nevertheless purposely and consciously exposed himself, intending at the time to assume all the risks of the situation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1180; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 8, pp. 7346-7350; vol. 8, p. 7830.]

8. INSURANCE (§ 146*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—EXEMPTIONS FROM LIABILITY—STRICT CONSTRUCTION.

Words of exception from liability, in an accident insurance policy, are construed liberally in favor of the insured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 295; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

9. INSURANCE (§ 461*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—EXEMPTIONS—CONSTRUCTION—"VOLUNTARY OR NEGLIGENT EXPOSURE TO UNNECESSARY DANGER."

The phrase "voluntary or negligent exposure to unnecessary danger," in a policy of accident insurance exempting the insurer from liability for injury from cause so expressed, is a cumulative or redundant expression, and is properly interpretable as "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1180; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

10. INSURANCE (§ 461*)—ACCIDENT POLICY—"VOLUNTARY EXPOSURE TO UNNECESSARY DANGER."

Sitting or lying on a bench at the side of a building, near the top of an unguarded wall, on a dark night, it not appearing that insured in so doing was conscious of the pitfall, or had knowledge of his surroundings, is not "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," within the meaning of those terms in a policy of accident insurance, exempting the insurer from liability for injury caused by such exposure as is defined by said terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

11. NEW TRIAL (§ 68*)—VERDICT—SETTING ASIDE.

A verdict fairly rendered, in a case fairly submitted to a jury, should not be set aside by the court, unless manifest injustice has been done, or the verdict is plainly not warranted by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 135-140; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Action by Thomas Beard against the Indemnity Insurance Company. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and from an order setting the same aside and granting a new trial, plaintiff brings error. Reversed, and judgment rendered.

Wyatt & Graham, for plaintiff in error.
McComas & Northcott, for defendant in error.

ROBINSON, J. On the trial of an action upon a policy of insurance against death resulting from bodily injuries caused by external, violent, and accidental means, a verdict was rendered by the jury in favor of the beneficiary for the amount to be paid by the insurer upon the happening of such contingency. That amount was $1,000. The verdict was set aside as contrary to law and the evidence, and a new trial was awarded.

To that action of the court below this writ of error is prosecuted.

To justify the aforesaid action of the court it must be found that errors were committed at the trial to the prejudice of the defendant, or that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. Robinson v. Kistler, 62 W. Va. 489, 59 S. E. 505. The defendant does not complain that errors to its prejudice were made at the trial of the case. It relies upon the assertion that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. Then it is as to this assertion only that we are called upon to inquire.

The real substance of the evidence is as follows: The insured was found, some time between 9:30 and 10:30 o'clock at night, badly injured, at the foot of a high wall where Sixteenth street, in the city of Huntington, passes under the tracks of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway. He was unconscious at the time, and died a few hours later in a hospital, never having regained consciousness. Just before he was found injured, insured was seen lying on a bench by the side of the telegraph office, which is situated at the top of this wall, very near its edge, and just above the point at which he was found. The telegraph office is near the railway tracks, and on a level therewith, it seems. The wall is one necessary to the lowering of the street so as to make the street cross the railroad under grade. At the telegraph office it was not guarded by a railing. The night on which the injury occurred was dark, and the electric light at the intersection of Sixteenth street and the railroad was not burning. The insured was an extra locomotive fireman of the railway company. His run was from Russell, Ky., to Handley, W. Va. He frequently stayed with his brother, the beneficiary of the policy, who resided in Huntington; but he had not been there for several days. The road foreman of engines testifies that men making such run out of Russell, but living in Huntington, frequently board trains at the telegraph office above designated to deadhead to Russell. There is no direct evidence, however, that the insured was ever at this telegraph office before. The yard clerk, whose duties were at that place, and whose office was located there, when asked if he had ever seen the insured come there to take a train, replied: "I don't know whether I ever saw him; no, sir." No one knows just how the injured man came to fall from the wall. A hostler who was attending some engines there saw the insured lying on the bench as he passed into the office. The insured was still lying there when this hostler came out of the office, and walked to the upper end of the railway bridge over the street. When he reached that part of the bridge, he heard an unusual noise. He at once returned toward the office, and noticed that the insured was not on the bench. An investigation was immediately made, and insured was found below the wall as mentioned above.

The yard clerk testifies that he saw the insured sitting on this same bench near the same hour above named, that he addressed him in a friendly way, and that the insured answered. He did not know the insured personally. It was this yard clerk and the hostler who found him at the bottom of the wall. Both testify that they observed no evidence of intoxication, either before or after they found him. By the police judge it was proved that two or three days before the accident the insured had been brought into his court on a charge of drunkenness. Insured was comparatively sober at the time he was tried. He was not again seen by said official. The secretary of the insurance company testifies that he saw the insured the day before he was injured, and that he was then intoxicated. A policeman testifies that he saw him near a saloon some time after supper the evening on which the accident occurred, and adds that it was "between 8 and half past 10 o'clock. I can't tell just exactly what time." The policeman says the insured "looked like he was intoxicated right smartly when he came through." It seems that the insured passed through the saloon. The policeman, however, says that he was not drunk enough to be arrested; that he was not disturbing the peace; that he did not smell insured's breath; and that he did not see him drink anything. He testifies that the saloon was crowded, but can name no other of the many people there; nor can he tell how the insured was dressed, what kind of hat he wore, or whether or not he had on his working clothes. The physician who attended the injured man as a witness for plaintiff described the extent of the injuries, and the result thereof. This witness, though, was not examined by either party as to whether or not any evidences or appearances of intoxication were manifest.

The policy provided that it did not cover any injury occasioned wholly or partly, directly or indirectly, by many things, among them being intoxication, and voluntary or negligent exposure to unnecessary danger. And it also provided no insurance against injury received while the insured was on a railroad bridge or roadbed, except as to railway employes while on duty incident to their occupation.

The insurance company defended under the general issue and by three special pleas, relying upon the averments that the insured was intoxicated at the time of the injury to him, that such injury was due to voluntary or negligent exposure to unnecessary danger by insured, and that the injury was received while the insured was on a railroad bridge or roadbed at a time when he was not on duty incident to his occupation as a railway employe. These defenses, except the last named, were further availed of by three instructions asked and given on behalf of defendant. The first instruction was to the effect that the jury should find for the defendant if they believed from the evidence that the insured was in a state of intoxication at the time he received the injury which caused his death. The second instruction was that the jury should find for the defendant if they believed from the evidence that the insured voluntarily or negligently exposed himself to the unnecessary danger which resulted in the injury that caused his death. The third was to the effect that the jury should find for the defendant if they believed from the evidence that at the time of the accident complained of the insured was intoxicated, and that by reason of such intoxication he stepped or fell from the top of the east wall of the Sixteenth street undergrade crossing, receiving the injury which resulted in his death.

Thus we see the issues submitted to the jury were plain. The plaintiff sought to establish injury, from which death resulted to the insured, by violent and accidental means. The defense sought to establish intoxication, voluntary or negligent exposure to unnecessary danger, or that the insured was on a railroad bridge or roadbed, at the time of the injury. The sufficiency of plaintiff's evidence was not challenged by defendant at the trial. The defendant rested the case with the jury, relying upon instructions given in its behalf, as we have noted. Plaintiff asked no instructions, relying solely on his evidence. But after the verdict had been found against defendant on motion for a new trial, and now upon this writ of error to the order setting aside that verdict, much is argued as to the insufficiency of the case made to sustain plaintiff's issues. It is now insisted that it is not proved that the insured met his death by accidental means, that he may have committed suicide, or that another may have pushed him over the wall. The testimony on this point was sufficient to go to the jury. As we have seen, the insured, alone, was lying on the bench when the hostler, who later evidently heard him fall, passed into the office and out again going to the bridge. The distance this witness went before he was attracted by the noise was very short. It seems conclusive that the noise was caused by the insured's fall over the wall. There is no evidence of the presence of another at this time, or of the retreat of any murderer. Neither does the evidence reasonably indicate suicide. The jury could well believe from this evidence, and it seems satisfactorily so, that the insured rose from the bench in the darkness and walked over the wall. There is no evidence that he was acquainted with his surroundings. The jury were justified in finding, from the facts and circumstances, that his death was due to violent and accidental means. A prima facie case of accidental death was made. Defendant did not even undertake to rebut such prima facie case. Directly pertinent to this case is Niblack on Insurance, § 877. Therein it is stated: "In an action on an accident policy testimony of physicians that the assured bore on his back marks of extreme violence, apparently recently inflicted, and that his injuries produced his death, is prima facie evidence of death resulting from bodily injuries, 'through external, violent, and accidental means.' Unless such injuries were intentionally self-inflicted, or intentionally inflicted by some other person, the legal presumption is that they were accidental. No presumption can be indulged that the law has been violated, as it would have been were the injuries inflicted by another. There may be a prima facie case of accidental death, but the burden of proving accidental death is on the plaintiff. Where it appears that a violent death was either the result of accidental injuries, or of a suicidal act of the deceased, the presumption of law is against the latter."

Is there in the record evidence of intoxication of the insured at the time of the injury? The mere fact that he had been drunk before does not prove that he was drunk at the time of the injury. Drunkenness at that time must be established if it is to avail as a defense. The only testimony that he was intoxicated near the time of the accident is that of the policeman, and that witness cannot definitely fix the time so as to bring it near enough the time of the accident to justify the jury in believing that he was drunk when the accident happened. The jury saw this witness, heard his cross-examination, and had a right to accept or reject his credibility. He confesses, as shown by that cross-examination, that he took little notice of the insured when he saw him. He says that he was intoxicated, yet he could not tell how insured was dressed. Nor can he tell what else he saw at the saloon. It seems that he noticed only that this man was drunk. The jury could well say that his statement that the man was drunk was improbable. The fact that the insured was about the saloon and had been drunk on two former occasions is not evidence that he was intoxicated when the injury befell him. It is a general rule that, where the issue is whether a person did a particular thing, evidence as to the fact that he did a similar thing at some other time is inadmissible. 1 Wharton on Evidence, § 29. The two witnesses who saw insured just before and after the injury say that they saw no evidence of intoxication. And such evidence, as compared with that relied upon herein to establish intoxication, was for the consideration of the jury. Evidence of appearances as to intoxication is proper in this class of cases. Niblack on Insurance, § 390.

The claim of the defendant that the insured was on the bridge or roadbed of the railway company is in no wise sustained. And at the time of asking instructions to the jury this claim seems to have been abandoned by the defendant. There is not the slightest evidence to sanction defense on this ground. Insured was not on the roadbed or bridge of the railway. Besides, as to a clause exempting from liability for injury to insured while on such roadbed or bridge, it is wisely said that "the manifest intention is to exempt from responsibility for damages caused by collision with moving trains thereon." Burkhard v. Insurance Co., 102 Pa. 262, 48 Am. Rep. 205.

Was there a voluntary or negligent exposure to unnecessary danger on the part of insured? It is insisted that the injury was caused by his negligence, and that the insurer is therefore not liable. In this case the clause of the policy conditioning recovery by the words "voluntary or negligent exposure to unnecessary danger" is at least different in phraseology from that usually found in accident policies and met with in judicial interpretation. The most usual expression passed upon in the reported cases is "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." A clause similar to the one last mentioned was under consideration by this court in Diddle v. Continental Casualty Company (decided at this term) 63 S. E. 962. It was therein held that "either reckless or deliberate encountering of known danger, or danger so obvious that a reasonably prudent man would have observed and avoided it, if the circumstances were not such as necessitated the encountering thereof," constituted such voluntary exposure. That holding is clearly sustained by authority and principle. Vance on Insurance, § 240, says: "It is a familiar principle that the insurer assumes the risk of the insured's negligence, provided there be no bad faith on the part of the latter. Accident insurers, however, have essayed to change this rule, and to import into the insurance contract the doctrine of contributory negligence by inserting a provision excepting themselves from liability for 'injury or death caused by the voluntary exposure of the insured to unnecessary danger,' or other words of similar effect. This exception merely imposes upon the insured the duty of exercising ordinary care in order to avoid sustaining any sort of injury. He is not required to exercise any unusual degree of care." The eminent Mr. Justice Harlan, in Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Randolph, 78 Fed. 761, 24 C. O. A. 812, said: "What do the words 'voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger' in the contracts in suit import? * * * The words 'voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger,' literally interpreted, would embrace every exposure of the assured not actually required by the circumstances of his situation, or enforced by the superior will of others, as well as every danger attending such exposure that might have been avoided by the exercise of care and diligence upon his part. But the same words may be fairly interpreted as referring only to dangers of a real, substantial character, which the insured recognized, but to which he nevertheless purposely and consciously exposed himself, intending at the time to assume all the risks of the situation. The latter interpretation is most favorable to the assured, does no violence to the words used, is consistent with the object of accident insurance contracts, and is therefore the interpretation which the court should adopt." In De Loy v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 171 Pa. 1, 32 Atl. 1108, 50 Am. St. Rep. 787, it is held, most sensibly we think, "that if a man acts so recklessly and carelessly that he shows an utter disregard of a known danger, he may be said to have exposed himself voluntarily to danger." The same case further affirms that, "If the risk of danger is so obvious that a prudent man, exercising reasonable foresight, would not have done the act, then he may be said to have voluntarily exposed his person to danger."

Now, does the use of the word "negligent" in the clause demand from the insured a greater degree of prudence and care than that enunciated in these authorities? The rule is now firmly established that limitations on the liability of the company are construed most strongly against the insurer, or liberally in favor of the insured. Niblack on Insurance, § 367; Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Chambers, 93 Va. 138, 24 S. E. 896, 40 L. R. A. 432. Chancellor Kent says that the true principle of sound ethics is to give a contract the sense in which the person making the promise believes the other party to have accepted it, and a just sense should be exercised in so interpreting it as to give due and fair effect to its provisions. 2 Kent, Com. 555. This just principle of interpretation applies fittingly to contracts of accident insurance. Are we to say that the use of the word "negligent," as aforesaid, is to exempt the insurer from all liability because perchance some slight negligence of the insured has contributed to accidental injury? To do so would result in the destruction of the real purpose of indemnity of this character. It has been pertinently said: "A very large proportion of those events which are universally called accidents happen through some carelessness of the party injured, which contributes to produce them. Thus men are injured by the careless use of firearms, of explosive substances, of machinery, the careless management of horses, and in a thousand ways, where it can readily be seen afterwards that a little greater care on their part would have prevented it. * * * It is true that accidents often happen from such kinds of negligence. But, still, it is equally true that they are not the usual result. If they were, people would cease to be guilty of such negligence. But cases in which accidents occur are very rare in comparison with the number in which there is the same negligence without any accident. A man draws his loaded gun toward him by the muzzle—the servant fills the lighted lamp with kerosene—a hundred times without injury. The next time the gun is discharged, and the lamp explodes. The result was unusual, and therefore as unexpected as it had been in all the previous instances. So there are undoubtedly thousands of persons who get on and off from cars in motion without accident, where one is injured. And therefore, when an injury occurs, it is an unusual result, and unexpected, and strictly an accident." Schneider v. Insurance Co., 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157. And here we approvingly quote from Rustin v. Insurance Co., 58 Neb. 792, 79 N. W. 712, 46 L. R. A. 253, 76 Am. St. Rep. 136: "Accident insurance is not designed to furnish indemnity only in cases where the policy holder orders his conduct with grave circumspection and provident foresight of consequences. Mere contributory negligence is no answer to an action on a contract of insurance." Therefore an insurer against accident must not be relieved from liability because of mere contributory negligence, unless the contract is plain and unequivocal that it should be. Surely we shall not say that the word "negligent" is to be given a meaning indicating a degree of exposure less than that indicated by the word "voluntary," which is used before it in the clause in the policy under consideration. To give it such construction would grant almost limitless scope to the ingenuity of insurance companies in framing contracts of this character so as to make the exceptions in fact destroy the real purpose for which the insurance was obtained. Used, as it is, in connection with the word "voluntary," it is fairer to say that it is simply cumulative to that word, meaning no more than that word. Or its use in the clause may fairly be said to be redundant, since in a practical sense every exposure of one's body to an unnecessary danger is a negligent exposure to such danger. In view of the well-established rule of construction in such cases, the true purposes of such contracts, and the connection in which the word "negligent" is used we hold that its use is simply cumulative or redundant, and that the clause means no more than "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger." Using the language of Mr. Justice Harlan, as quoted above, "the latter interpretation is most favorable to the assured, does no violence to the words used, is consistent with the objects of accident insurance contracts, and is therefore the interpretation which the court should adopt."

The evidence does not justify the conclusion, as a matter of law, that the insured voluntarily exposed himself to unnecessary danger, within the meaning of those terms as applied to cases of this character. Whether he did so expose himself, therefore, was a proper question for the determination of the jury from all the facts and reasonable inferences in that regard. Nor can it be justly said that the jury's evident finding that he did not so expose himself to such danger is plainly wrong, amounting to a miscarriage of justice. Really it was not proved that insured was even guilty of contributory negligence, to say nothing of the degree of negligence required to be shown under such clause as the one under which exemption from liability is claimed. It does not appear that the insured had knowledge of his surroundings, or of any danger near him, when the accident befell him. Where the danger is unknown, the injury is accidental, not the result of voluntary exposure. The mere custom of railroad employes who make runs out of Russell to catch trains for that place at the telegraph office near which the injury occurred does not prove that the insured ever followed that custom. That circumstance of itself is insufficient. Yet it is all there is in the evidence from which it can be said that insured was ever at the bench on a previous occasion. Nobody says that he was there before, or that he was acquainted with the surroundings. It is true that his run as fireman was by this place, but he cannot be reasonably charged with knowledge of situations at places in view of which he passed as such employe, engaged in duty requiring his attention to the train. For all that is known, he may have prudently gone to this place for the first time, found the bench, and occupied it reasonably believing himself perfectly safe on that which was evidently provided for others. The electric light was not burning. Its accidental failure to burn may have prevented his observing the pitfall. That he was about a city at night is not negligence, unless it were shown that he went to a place which he knew to be dark and dangerous, or that he should reasonably have known it. Sitting or lying on a bench near the top of an unguarded wall is not voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of those terms in a policy of accident insurance, even if it were shown that the insured knew of the wall and the lack of railing on it. Prudent men do such things. There is no danger while one's faculties are present. Sudden loss of those faculties would be merely accidental, unexpected. It is not shown that insured was asleep on the bench, or that he intended to sleep there. He may have never intended to sleep on it, yet he may have accidentally gone to sleep. And it may have been that while in that state he rose from the bench and fell over the wall. In Schneider v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 58 Wis. 13, 16 N. W. 47, 46 Am. Rep. 618, injury under similar circumstances is held not to be the result of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. And elsewhere it is held: "One who lies down to sleep on the top of the boilers of a steamboat, and is there injured by steam escaping from a safety valve, is not guilty of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, though warned not to sleep there, unless he was conscious of the danger from escaping steam from the safety valve." Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Clark, 109 Ky. 350, 59 S. W. 7, 95 Am. St. Rep. 374. In all the cases there runs the demand that the danger shall be of a substantial kind, shall be unnecessary, known, or obvious, and that the exposure to it shall be of a reckless or deliberate character.

These observations upon the evidence are sufficient, we think, to show the insufficiency of the evidence relied upon to sustain exemption because of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger. By the sound inferences to be drawn from all the facts and circumstances it is not established that there was exposure to danger of the substantial kind that will excuse from liability, or to any danger that was obvious to insured. In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Clark, supra, it is held: "The words 'voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger,' when employed in a contract of life and accident insurance, relate to dangers of a substantial character which the insured recognizes, and to which he, nevertheless, consciously and purposely exposes himself, intending at the time to assume the risk of the danger."

Upon the evidence adduced in the case the issues were properly to be disposed of by the jury. The verdict is not against the decided weight and preponderance of the evidence. The case was fairly submitted to a jury. A verdict was fairly rendered by that jury. No manifest wrong or injustice appears. The verdict is not unwarranted by the evidence. Under such circumstances what justification can there be for disturbing the verdict and denying to plaintiff the result thus fairly gained? There is none. The action of the circuit court in setting aside the verdict and awarding a new trial is contrary to well-established law. Coalmer v. Barrett, 61 W. Va. 237, 56 S. E. 385; Smith v. Railway Co., 48 W. Va. 69, 35 S. E. 834; Young v. Railroad Co., 44 W. Va. 218, 28 S. E. 932; Miller v. Insurance Co., 12 W. Va. 116, 29 Am. Rep. 452, and many other cases.

The action of the trial court in setting aside the verdict and awarding a new trial is erroneous. It is therefore reversed. This court now proceeding to render such judgment as the circuit court should have rendered, it is considered that the plaintiff recover from the defendant the sum of $1,000, with interest thereon from the 17th day of April, 1906, and his costs about the prosecution of his case in the circuit court expended.

STATE v. HINSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 1, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*) — INSTRUCTIONS — SUPPORT BY EVIDENCE—ESSENTIALITY.

An instruction unsupported by evidence is error, especially where accused has or may have been prejudiced thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1979, 1982; Dec. Dig. § 814.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 808*) — MURDER — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence showed that accused was making a determined assault on decedent, who was backing away from him, that he knocked the decedent down and struck him with a knife three or four times after he got up, it supported an instruction submitting an issue of murder in the second degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 808.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 806*) — EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—DECLARATIONS.

In a murder trial, the state could show, as part of the res gestæ, that near the end of the combat decedent exclaimed, "I am cut," and that the father of the parties, who tried to separate them, said, "I told you to quit; you are going to get cut."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 806.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Anson County; Long, Judge.

Tom Hinson was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Before the jury was impaneled, the solicitor stated to the court, in the presence of the prisoner and his counsel, that he would not ask for a verdict of murder in the first degree, but for a verdict of murder in the second degree or of manslaughter, as the facts might warrant. In apt time the court was requested, for the prisoner, to charge the jury: "(1) That if the state has failed to satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that Tom Hinson made the wound that caused the death of Earnest Hinson, you will find the defendant not guilty. (2) The court charges you that you shall render a verdict of not guilty. (3) Proof to convict in this case must be such as to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of the defendant's guilt; and if the state has failed, by its evidence, to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that the defendant killed the deceased, you will find the defendant not guilty." The court gave the first and third, and declined to give the second, prayer for instructions, and defendant excepted. In a portion of the charge the court instructed the jury as follows: "That if the state had furnished evidence from which the jury found and were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner and his brother, the deceased, engaged in a mutual affray and entered into a mutual combat by consent, on equal terms, and without use of deadly weapons, and without serious injury to each other, and that, during the progress of the fight, their father interfered, came between them, endeavored to separate them, and pushed the deceased off; that, if the jury further found beyond a reasonable doubt that the prisoner followed up and pressed the fight, and used a knife and stabbed and cut his brother, and inflicted the wound described by the witnesses, from which he soon thereafter died; and that the deceased was at the time unarmed and going back, or in retreat, or in the act of quitting the combat at the entreaty of his father—that the offense of the prisoner in taking life, and with a knife, and inflicting the wound described, under these circumstances, if so found by the jury, would be murder in the second degree.” To this instruction the defendant excepted. There was verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree, and from judgment on the verdict the defendant appealed.

J. A. Lockhart, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

HOKE, J. It was chiefly urged for error that the portion of the charge set forth was predicated on evidence suggested therein, and entirely without support in the testimony. The position contended for is sound as a general rule, certainly where it appears that the prisoner's cause has, or may have been, prejudiced by the course indicated; but we are of opinion that the facts presented do not bring the case within the principle. On the trial, Landy Edwards, a witness for the state, testified as follows: “I looked and saw the defendant and Earnest and Wyatt Hinson. Earnest was backing out, and Tom was advancing on him. Both knocking. Earnest didn't get more than five or six steps. I next saw his father, Wyatt, come between the boys. He pressed Earnest off. Defendant hit at Earnest. I thought this lick hit Wyatt. Then Tom, the defendant, ran around his father, and struck Earnest with his fist, and knocked him down. Earnest got up. Then the defendant hit him (Earnest) two or three times. Did not see what the defendant had in his hand. If he had a knife, I could not tell. Was not close enough. Then Earnest went to the doctor's shop, and saw cut in his breast, right on left breast. It was bad-looking place. The defendant's father was holding the wound while the doctor was working on the place. Blood was oozing out of the place. Earnest is dead now. Cutting took place between 9 and 12 o'clock.” Duncan Patterson, for the state, testified: “Boys were fighting when I saw them. Earnest come out of the shed backwards six or eight feet, and defendant advancing and fighting with fist. Defendant advancing. Couldn't say whether either had knife. The father came between them and pressed Earnest south. Was pushing Earnest more than Tom. Then Tom reached back and got a piece of plank about one inch thick, and four inches wide, and four or five feet long, and hit Earnest or his father. Then the father pressed them apart. Then Tom, the defendant, run around and hit Earnest with his fist, and knocked Earnest down. When Earnest got up, the defendant hit Earnest three or four times on the shoulder. Don't know whether he had a knife or not. About this time I said, ‘Quit boys,’ and Earnest said, ‘I am cut.’ The father then put his hand on Earnest and pressed the gash, and said, ‘I told you to quit, you are going to get cut.’ Then they quit. Earnest stooped for his hat. Told me to get his hat. I did so. He clutched his breast and went to the doctor. He was cut in the right side of the breast. He was gashed to the hollow near the middle of the side of the breast. Didn't notice clothing. I saw the wound at the doctor's. Fight took place about 10 or 11 o'clock a. m. He lived near a day. He died that night. Saw the corpse between 11 and 12 that night. Died at the doctor's office.” The doctor testified: “That the deceased died from a wound in the right side of the breast, entering below the second rib, ranging downward, cutting the third and fourth ribs completely in two, and partially into the fifth rib. The wound was two or three inches deep, and into the lung from one-half to one inch. That he died from wound in the breast.”

The mere statement of this evidence affords a complete answer to the objections urged for the prisoner. Here was testimony showing that the prisoner was making a violent and determined assault on the deceased, who was backing away from him; that he knocked the deceased down, and struck him three or four times after he got up. Near the end of the fight, if it can be properly termed a fight, the deceased exclaimed, “I'm cut,” and just at the close the father, who had interfered in an effort to separate his sons, was heard to say, “I told you to quit, you are going to get cut,” and he died soon thereafter from a fatal cut into the lung. These exclamations of the deceased and the father come clearly within the principle and simplest instances of declarations competent as part of the res gestæ (State v. Jarrell, 141 N. C. 722, 53 S. E. 127; State v. McCourry, 128 N. C. 594, 88 S. E. 883; McKelvey, Ev. [2d Ed.] 343), and, taken in connection with the other facts, fully justify the action of the court below in refusing the prisoner's second prayer for instructions, and in the charge as given.

There is no error, and the judgment below is affirmed.

No error.

HICKS v. KING et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 1, 1909.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 92*)—OPTION TO PURCHASE.

Plaintiff by written lease rented his farm to defendant for a term of 10 years for a yearly rental of 5 bales of cotton, with provisions that if the rent and taxes were promptly paid defendant could purchase the land upon payment of 50 bales more, and that, if any installment of rent were not promptly paid, defendant's rights should be forfeited, and plaintiff should have the right of re-entrance thereon. Held, that the lease was a contract for sale on installments, and, upon plaintiff having attempted to enforce a forfeiture for default in payments, defendant could assert his equity under the contract, and cause the land to be sold to pay the balance due on the purchase price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 92*)—OPTION TO PURCHASE.

Contracts for sale of land on installments are similar to mortgages, in that in neither is the purchaser's equity destroyed by noncompliance with a stipulation for prompt payment, but upon default he is entitled to have the balance ascertained, and a sale ordered, and to receive surplus, if any.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by F. D. Hicks against Marshall King and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

On January 1, 1907, the plaintiff leased his farm in writing to the defendant (a colored man) for the term of 10 years at a yearly rental of 5 bales of good middling cotton of 500 pounds each, with a further provision that if said rent was promptly paid, together with the taxes on the land, then the defendant could become purchaser of the land upon payment of 50 bales more, with provision for forfeiture if any installment of rent is not promptly paid by lessee, and right of re-entrance thereon. During the first 5 years the defendant one year paid his rent, one year he overpaid 1,500 pounds of cotton, and the other years he fell behind; but the plaintiff did not assert the right to re-enter till the end of the fifth year, at which time the defendant was in arrears for the five years $63.51. On December 30, 1901, the plaintiff began this action for recovery of the land and balance due on rent. A receiver was appointed, who rented the land to the defendant pending litigation. The cause was referred to A. McL. Graham, upon whose report the judge rendered judgment for the balance of rent due to date, and for the value of the additional 50 bales of cotton, and ordered that upon nonpayment of above sum the property be sold for payment thereof and costs, including allowances to receiver and referee. The plaintiff appealed.

E. K. Bryan and H. E. Faison, for appellant. Stevens, Beasley & Weeks, Rountree & Carr, Walter Clark, Jr., Aycock & Winston, and Bunn & Sprull, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The appeal presents practically but one point. The plaintiff contends that the court should have held that punctual payment of rent was of the essence of the contract, and that upon default the plaintiff was entitled to re-enter and take possession. But this would ignore the other features of the contract. This case is almost identical with Crinkley v. Egerton, 113

N. C. 444, 18 S. E. 669 which held that, as long as the lessor treated the lease as continuing, he was entitled as lessor to the landlord's lien for rent; but that, whenever he put an end to it by seeking to resume possession, the defendant could assert his equity under the contract to convey, and could cause the land to be sold. Similar contracts have been construed to be contracts to convey. Puffer v. Lucas, 112 N. C. 377, 17 S. E. 174, 19 L. R. A. 682; Clark v. Hill, 117 N. C. 11, 23 S. E. 91, 53 Am. St. Rep. 574; Barrington v. Skinner, 117 N. C. 47, 23 S. E. 90; Jones v. Jones, 117 N. C. 254, 23 S. E. 214; Mfg. Co. v. Gray, 121 N. C. 168, 28 S. E. 257; Wilcox v. Cherry, 123 N. C. 79, 31 S. E. 369; Thomas v. Cooksey, 130 N. C. 148, 41 S. E. 2; Hamilton v. Highlands, 144 N. C. 283, 56 S. E. 929.

When, as here, the full period for installments has passed at the date of the judgment, it is necessary only to deduct the payments made and direct a sale of the property to pay the balance due. When there are installments which have not fallen due, the present value only of such should be charged against the purchaser. Contracts for sale on installments are similar to mortgages. In neither is the equity destroyed by the stipulation for prompt payment; but the debtor is entitled to have the balance ascertained, and a sale ordered, and to receive surplus, if any.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 1, 1909.)

WILLS (§ 302*)—PROBATE—IDENTITY OF TESTATRIX—EVIDENCE.

Proof that a woman making her will announced herself as a certain person to the attorney who drafted the will and to a witness thereto, neither of whom had met her before, not only by accepting an introduction to them as that person, but by signing herself as such in the will, constituted prima facie evidence of her identity as that person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 302.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Neal, Judge.

Application by C. H. Martin, administrator, and others, for probate of the will of Sarah C. Harris. J. T. Harris and others interposed a caveat. From a judgment for proponents, caveators appeal. Affirmed.

Aycock & Winston, R. N. Simms, and J. N. Holding, for appellants. Armstead Jones & Son and Pou & Brooks, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. This is a caveat of the will of Sarah C. Harris. The complaint alleges that said paper writing "was not and is not the last will and testament of the said Sarah

C. Harris, deceased, for the reason that the signature of the said Sarah C. Harris thereto was obtained by undue and improper influence and duress upon the said Sarah C. Harris," and, as a further ground, alleges that, "at the time of the execution thereof and continuously thereafter until her death, the said Sarah C. Harris did not have the capacity to make and execute a will, for the reason that she was not of a sound and disposing mind and memory at and during said time."

W. H. Ruffin, Esq., attorney at law of Louisville, testified that he received a message from Mrs. Jennie Martin, who resided in the same town, that her sister, Miss Harris, wished him to come to her (Mrs. Martin's) house to draw Miss Harris' will; that he went, and was introduced by Mrs. Martin to Miss Harris as her sister; that Mrs. Martin then stated to witness that this was her sister, who wanted her will drawn, and Mrs. Martin stated what the terms of the will were, the witness took notes, then turned to Miss Harris, read the notes to her, and asked her was that the way she wished the will drawn, and she replied "Yes"; that the witness went off and drew the will, and returned, bringing, as requested, Dr. O. L. Ellis, as a witness. Miss Harris and Mrs. Martin came into the room. Witness read the will to Miss Harris, and asked her if that was the way she wished her will drawn, and she said, "Yes," and requested him and Dr. Ellis to witness it. She then signed the will in their presence, and they signed it in her presence. On cross-examination witness said he met Miss Harris only on those two occasions, and knew her only by the introduction above stated, and that she seemed physically and mentally capable of making a will.

Dr. Ellis, a practicing physician, testified that he accompanied Mr. Ruffin on this last occasion, was introduced to Miss Harris, whom he had never met before, and knew only by this introduction; that Mr. Ruffin read the will over to her. She said that was her will. She signed it in the presence of Mr. Ruffin and himself, and they signed it as witnesses in her presence. He was asked to sign by Mr. Ruffin in her presence. The caveators introduced no testimony. The jury found that the paper writing was the last will and testament of Sarah C. Harris.

The caveators contend that the court should have instructed the jury, as requested, that there was not sufficient evidence to answer the issue "Yes," and that they should answer it "No." There was no evidence whatever tending to show as the caveators contend that another person had fraudulently and falsely impersonated Miss Harris. There was no allegation of that nature in the complaint. On the contrary, it was averred that "the signature of Sarah C. Harris thereto was procured by undue influence and duress," and that "at the time of execution" of said will "the said Sarah C. Harris did not have the capacity to make and execute a will." Upon the averments in the complaint there was nothing that required the respondents to put in evidence of an identity that was not questioned, and which, indeed, was admitted by the pleadings. Indeed, when the propounders rested, after putting in evidence of the formal execution of the will, it must have been a distinct surprise to raise the question of identity of the testator without any allegation in the complaint. The testatrix announced herself as Miss Sarah C. Harris, not only by accepting the introduction, but by signing herself by that name. Where a cartman took goods to the house of L., not knowing the owner, asked a person he found there for Mr. L., and the person said "I am Mr. L.," it was held by Lord Lyndhurst that this was prima facie evidence of the identity of Mr. L. Wilton v. Edwards, 6 Car. & P. 677; Harris, Identification, §§ 75, 99, 115. When one is asked who he is, his reply that he is S. is some evidence of that fact. Reynolds v. Staines, 2 C. & K. 745. Where at an auction a person was addressed by several as "R.," and his name was so written upon the board, Wilde, C. J., held that this was prima facie evidence that such was his name. Collier v. Nokes, 2 C. & K. 1012.

The facts in evidence were sufficient to submit the case to the jury upon the identity of the testator, and, there being no evidence to the contrary, it satisfied the jury. It would have been easy for the caveators, the nearest relatives of the deceased, to have shown from the description of her person, from her handwriting, by their knowledge of her whereabouts at that time, and other circumstances, whatever reason, if any there was, to throw doubts upon the identity of the testator. The transaction took place in the usual manner. The witnesses were two gentlemen of standing in their respective professions, and there is nothing whatever in the attendant circumstances to cast a doubt upon the bona fides of the transaction.

Strangers must frequently execute wills when no better known to the witnesses than the testator was in this case. Had the question of the identity of testator been raised by the pleadings, doubtless the proof would have been complete, but, as it was, there was a prima facie case and no evidence to the contrary. The other exceptions require no discussion.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Moore County; Long, Judge.

Action by G. C. Graves against W. K. Jackson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. L. Spence, for appellant. R. L. Burns, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover two mules which the plaintiff alleged the defendant unlawfully withholds from him, or for the value thereof. The mules were taken into possession by the sheriff under a requisition issued in an ancillary proceeding of claim and delivery, and the defendant gave bond for the return of the property, and the same was delivered to him by the sheriff. The judgment below was in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

It appears that the controversy in the trial below was confirmed principally to the "dark horse mule." The defendant had agreed with one W. B. Tyson in 1903 that, if Tyson should pay him $125 on or before November 1, 1903, the mule should then be his property. Tyson failed to pay the money, being unable to do so, and the agreement was canceled by the parties, and afterwards he "hired" the mule to Tyson. The evidence tended to show that the title to the mule was to continue in Jackson until the $125 was paid. In 1904, after the agreement between Jackson and Tyson had been canceled, Tyson mortgaged the mule to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff relied upon the mortgage to establish his title to the mule. It also appeared that, in an action between the plaintiff and Tyson to recover this mule and other property, the court adjudged that Tyson was indebted to the plaintiff on the mortgage debt in the sum of $238.21, and that the property seized in the action under the requisition in the claim and delivery proceeding was worth $35. The mule was not seized, and the court merely adjudged that the plaintiff recover of Tyson the said sum of $238.21 and interest, and, further, that plaintiff is the owner of the mule and other property described in the complaint, as between him and Tyson. The defendant was not a party to that suit.

The respective parties submitted prayers for instructions which we think were substantially given by the court. The judge is not required to give an instruction in the very words used by counsel in the request for it, even if the instruction be a proper one. If he gives it substantially, and does not, by any change of language, weaken its force, it is a sufficient compliance with the law. Rencher v. Wynne, 86 N. C. 268. The court, by its instructions, left the facts to be found by the jury, and correctly explained to them the law arising upon the evidence. We do not see why Jackson and Tyson could not cancel their agreement if Tyson found that he was unable to pay the price of the mule, and thereby restore the absolute or unconditional title to Jackson. All the evidence tended to show that at the time Tyson executed the mortgages to the plaintiff the title to the mule was in Jackson. The jury evidently found this to be the fact.

As to the suit between the plaintiff and Tyson, the defendant was not bound or concluded by any adjudication therein, not having been made a party to the action.

There was no error in the instructions as to the amount due on the plaintiff's mortgages. This was an issue of fact which was properly left to the jury. Indeed, the plaintiff by his fifth prayer appears to have so regarded it.

We find no reversible error in any of the rulings of the court to which the plaintiff excepted. The case was fairly submitted to the jury by the court. It practically involved an issue of fact, which the jury upon the evidence found against the plaintiff.

No error.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. FREEMAN.
(No. 1,424.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 227, 265*) — INJURY TO SERVANT — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Under the law of this state an employe of a railroad company cannot recover damages for personal injuries against the company, when his own negligence, however slight, contributes in an appreciable degree to the cause of his injury. Therefore, in a suit for such a purpose, no presumption against the company arises until the employe shows affirmatively that he was himself without fault; and it is error to give in charge to the jury section 2321 of the Civil Code of 1895 in such a manner as to make it appear applicable, irrespective of this limitation. Georgia Railroad & Banking Co. v. Hicks, 95 Ga. 301 (2), 22 S. E. 613.

2. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY.

Whether the commission of acts other than those which the law makes negligence per se constitutes negligence is a question of fact, to be determined by the jury, and not by the judge. Therefore in this case it was error to charge as follows: "If you find that the engine ran back and bumped the car in which he was working, or at which he was working, and caused this plank to fall out, and this was the reason he was injured, I say the plaintiff would be entitled to recover." Hopkins' Law of Personal Injuries, §§ 25, 26, and the many decisions of the Supreme Court there collated.

TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 16*) — WHEN MAINTAINABLE.

Error from City Court of Dalton; J. A. Longley, Judge.

Action by G. R. McGaha against Sam

Painter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. E. Mann, for plaintiff in error. M. C. Tarver, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. McGaha brought trover against Painter in the city court of Dalton to recover possession of a horse. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The facts in the case, which are not controverted, briefly stated, are as follows: McGaha and Painter swapped horses; McGaha relying upon Painter's statement that the title to his horse was free from any lien or incumbrance. Soon after the exchange was made, the horse which Painter had swapped to McGaha was levied upon under a mortgage fi. fa. against Painter, and seized and sold thereunder, whereupon McGaha instituted his trover suit. It developed on the trial of the suit that the horse which McGaha traded to Painter was bought by him from his mother-in-law, who retained title to the horse until he paid her for it. This reservation of title was not in writing, and it was not shown that McGaha had paid anything for the horse; but it was admitted that he had possession of the horse under this sale. Under these facts, it is contended by the plaintiff in error that trover did not lie, as the evidence showed that the plaintiff did not have title to the horse when he filed suit.

We do not concur in this view. The plaintiff did have a special property in the horse at the time the action was commenced, and did have a title subject to be defeated by the vendor only upon failure to pay the purchase price. This was sufficient to justify him in bringing an action of trover on this ground. Mitchell v. Georgia & Alabama Railway, 111 Ga. 790, 36 S. E. 971, 51 L. R. A. 622, and cases there cited. Besides this, the plaintiff was in possession of the horse at the time the exchange was made, and this possession was good against all the world, even the vendor, and entitled him to maintain an action of trover for the possession of the horse, which had been wrongfully and fraudulently taken from him by the defendant. To maintain an action of trover the plaintiff must show title in himself, or the right of possession wrongfully withheld from him by the defendant. Groover v. Iler, 1 Ga. App. 77, 57 S. E. 906.

It is the general rule that peaceable and lawful possession of personal property, even where the holder has no title to the same, gives him a right to sue in trover a wrongdoer who has deprived him of that possession. Mitchell Case, supra. And Civ. Code 1895, § 3886, declares that mere possession of a chattel, if without title or wrongful, will give a right of action for interference therewith. The plaintiff, therefore, had a right to institute a suit of trover to recover this horse, both because he had a special property in the horse and because he had a right to the possession of the horse, as against one who had obtained the possession of the horse from him by the false and fraudulent representations that the horse which he exchanged for the horse of the plaintiff belonged to him and was unincumbered. Fudge v. Kelley, 4 Ga. App. 630, 62 S. E. 96. Both good law and sound morality on the facts were on the side of the plaintiff, and the jury did right to give him the horse, and the judge did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

WEST v. STATE. (No. 1,726.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. ARSON (§ 2*)—ELEMENTS.

In a case of arson, the corpus delicti consists of two fundamental facts: First, the burning of the house described in the indictment; and, second, the fact that a criminal agency was the cause of the burning.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. § 2; Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 507-509; vol. 8, p. 7582.]

2. ARSON (§ 27*)—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

On a trial for arson, if nothing appears but the mere fact that the house was consumed by fire, the presumption is that the fire was the result of accidental, or natural, or providential cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arson, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 535*)—CONFESSION—CORROBORATION—NECESSITY.

It is well settled in this state that while a confession freely and voluntarily made may be sufficient to convict, when corroborated by proof of the corpus delicti, yet, before it can be sufficient for this purpose, there must be proof aliunde of the essential facts constituting the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1225; Dec. Dig. § 535.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 534*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—EXTRAJUDICIAL CONFESSION.

In this case there is no proof whatever tending to show that the crime of arson was committed by any one, and the conviction of the defendant is based alone upon his mere extrajudicial confession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1222; Dec. Dig. § 534.*]

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County; U. V. Whipple, Judge.

Will West was convicted of arson, and brings error. Reversed.

Busbee & Busbee, for plaintiff in error. W. F. George, Sol. Gen., for the State.

HILL, C. J. Will West was convicted of arson, and his motion for a new trial was overruled. There is no controversy over any question of law; the only issue in the case being as to the sufficiency of the evidence.

It is insisted by the plaintiff in error that there is no proof of the corpus delicti. In cases of arson, as in every other crime, it is absolutely necessary that the evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, should show, to a moral and reasonable certainty and to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis, that the crime was committed by some one. No universal and invariable rule can be laid down as to what would amount to proof of the corpus delicti. Each case depends upon its own peculiar circumstances. But in every case of arson two fundamental facts must appear: First, a burning; and, second, some criminal agency which caused the burning. In other words, the corpus delicti in a case of arson is not merely the burning of the house in question but that it was burned by the willful act of some person, and not as a result of natural or accidental cause; for, if nothing appears but the mere fact that the house was consumed by fire, the presumption is that the fire was the result of accident, or some providential cause. Phillips v. State, 29 Ga. 105; Williams v. State, 125 Ga. 741, 54 S. E. 661; Bines v. State, 118 Ga. 320, 45 S. E. 376, 68 L. R. A. 33; Ragland v. State, 2 Ga. App. 492, 58 S. E. 689.

The burden is, therefore, on the state to prove, first, a burning; and, secondly, that it was a criminal burning. The facts in this case show beyond doubt that the house described in the indictment was consumed by fire. The facts and circumstances set out in the brief of the evidence do not in any manner indicate any criminal agency in the burning, and wholly fail to overcome the presumption that the burning was the result of accident or some natural or providential cause. The circumstances relied upon by the state, aliunde the confession, as being sufficient to show some criminal agency in connection with the burning, are wholly inconclusive for that purpose. These circumstances, briefly stated, are as follows: The house burned was an unoccupied dwelling house, within sight of the dwelling house of the prosecutor. It was burned about 12 o'clock on Sunday night. The door of the house was open and in plain view of the residence of the prosecutor. There was no fire used in or about the house, and, so far as was known to any one, there was no fire about the house late in the afternoon or in the early part of the night of the burning. The house had in it at the time of the burning some seed cotton and about 100 bushels of cotton seed. There were some tracks, apparently made during the night, in the public road, going by the house that was burned and by the residence of the prosecutor. Outside of the confession claimed to have been made by the defendant, these are the only circumstances which the state relied upon to prove the corpus delicti. It must be apparent that, taken all together, they fall far short of proof of any criminal agency in the burning of the house. Certainly it cannot be claimed that they in any degree tend to overcome the presumption of an accidental burning, and to establish beyond a reasonable doubt the hypothesis of unlawful burning.

It is insisted that generally it is impossible to prove by direct evidence the corpus delicti in arson cases. This may be true; but it furnishes no reason for any relaxation of the imperative rule, founded not only in the humanity of the law, but supported by principles of abstract justice, that in every case of alleged crime the proof must show the fact of the crime beyond a moral and reasonable certainty, to the exclusion of every other reasonable hypothesis. The crime of arson is not within any exception to the rule; indeed, there is no exception to this salutary rule of evidence. In this case it is claimed that the defendant confessed the crime; but this confession is of no probative value whatever until and unless, by some evidence outside of the confession, the crime is shown to have been committed by some one. The statute law of this state declares that a confession alone, uncorroborated by other evidence, will not justify a conviction. Pen. Code 1895, § 1005. And while it has been declared that proof alunde that a crime was committed would in law be sufficient corroboration of a confession, yet it is equally well settled that a mere confession is not sufficient to establish the corpus delicti (Murray v. State, 43 Ga. 256); in other words, that, before a confession will authorize a conviction, it must be corroborated by evidence which, independently of the confession, tends to establish the corpus delicti (Bines v. State, supra; Wimberly v. State, 105 Ga. 188, 31 S. E. 162; Davis v. State, 105 Ga. 808, 32 S. E. 158; Schaefer v. State, 93 Ga. 177, 18 S. E. 552).

Cases can be imagined in which a confession might disclose independent facts or circumstances which would furnish sufficient proof of the corpus delicti. But in this case no such independent facts or circumstances are disclosed by the confession. The confession consists of the simple statement that the defendant, in company with another negro, set fire to the house in question. There is no evidence of the existence or whereabouts of this alleged accomplice. No threat is shown to have been made by the defendant in reference to the prosecutor or his property, and no motive appears for the commission of such a crime by the defendant. It is significant that the prosecutor himself, according to the evidence, was "stunned" by the confession of the defendant. In some jurisdictions it has been held that a confession is sufficient to warrant a conviction, where there is additional proof that the crime charged has been committed; in other words, that the confession may be taken and considered in connection with other evidence, if there be any, either positive or circumstantial, tending to prove the commission of the crime charged. Even if this rule of evidence is applicable under the law of this state, it would not fit the facts and circumstances of the present case; for here the confession, as before stated, furnishes no independent fact or circumstance tending to show the commission of the crime, or which, when taken in connection with any other fact or circumstance in the case, tends to show that any crime was committed, and the rule as declared in this state is that the corpus delicti must be fully proved, independently of the confession.

We are reluctant at all times to interfere with the verdict of a jury; but, after giving the facts and circumstances in this case a most careful consideration, we are perfectly clear that nothing appears in the evidence, outside of the confession, that even remotely tends to show the essential predicate upon which all criminal prosecutions must be based, to wit, the existence of the crime charged, and for this reason we are compelled to reverse the judgment refusing to grant another trial.

Judgment reversed.

TOWN OF MAYSVILLE et al. v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 46*)—BOUNDARIES—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The act approved September 30, 1879 (Acts 1878-79, p. 809), incorporating the town of Maysville, and the various amendatory acts, considered. The territorial limits of the town of Maysville are fixed by the act approved August 18, 1905 (Acts 1905, p. 993), and extend three-fourths of one mile in every direction from the "center of the old Northeastern Depot site."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. STATUTES (§§ 76, 120*)—RELATING TO MORE THAN ONE SUBJECT—EXPRESSION OF SUBJECT IN TITLE—SPECIAL LAW.

The act approved August 7, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 121), providing for a change in county lines lying within the limits of incorporated towns or cities of more than 500 population, is not unconstitutional as referring to more than one subject-matter in its title, or as containing matter different from that contained in its title, or as being a special law operating upon a subject-matter provided for by an existing general law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 77½, 168; Dec. Dig. §§ 76, 120.*]

3. COUNTIES (§ 10*)—CHANGE IN BOUNDARIES—POPULATION.

The act of August 7, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 121), authorizing an election to determine a change of county lines in towns or cities having a population of more than 500, applies only to towns or cities whose population has been ascertained to exceed 500 by an authorized official census. In the absence of a census taken under proper authority from the state, resort will be had to the last census of the United States to ascertain whether the provisions of the act are applicable to a given town or city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

4. COUNTIES (§ 10*)—CHANGE IN BOUNDARIES—INJUNCTION.

As no census under authority of the state has been taken in the town of Maysville, and the last census of the United States gives that town a population less than 500, the act of August 7, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 121), is inapplicable. The attempt of the officials of that municipality under color of the act to change the county lines within the municipal limit is an ultra vires act, and will be restrained by a court of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Banks County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Action for an injunction by J. N. Smith and others against the Town of Maysville and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

A. J. Griffin, O. Brown, and J. J. Strickland, for plaintiffs in error. J. A. B. Mahaffey, J. S. Ayers, and Cobb & Erwin, for defendants in error.

EVANS, P. J. The town of Maysville is located partly in Banks county and partly in Jackson county. On April 13, 1908, an election was held in this town under the act approved August 7, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 122), which provides that whenever the boundary lines of one or more of the counties of this state shall lie within the corporate limits of any town or city having more than 500 inhabitants, and it is desired to change the county lines and bring the town and city wholly within the limits of one county only, the change of such count lines may be effected by an election called and held pursuant to the terms of the act. The greater number of votes cast at this election having been in favor of the future location of the town in Banks county, the town authorities so declared the result, and were proceeding to certify this result to the authorities of the two counties for the purpose of having the county lines readjusted in accordance with the terms of the act, when certain citizens of Jackson county, residing in the town of Maysville, applied for an injunction to restrain the authorities of the town from proceeding further to carry the election into effect. Prior to the hearing Jackson county was made a party plaintiff and Banks county was made a party defendant. At the hearing the judge granted the injunction prayed for, and defendants excepted.

1. One of the attacks made by the plaintiffs in the court below upon the validity of the election was that the various acts incorporating the town of Maysville were so confusing in their definition of the corporate limits of the town that the territory intended to be embraced within the municipality could not be ascertained with certainty. The town of Maysville was incorporated by an act approved September 30, 1879, "with the corporate limits of said town extending three-fourths of one mile in every direction from the Northeastern Railroad depot in said town." Acts 1878-79, p. 309. By an act approved October 13, 1885, this act was amended "in the fourth line thereof by striking out the words 'three-fourths of one mile,' and inserting in lieu thereof the words 'one-half mile of one mile,' so that said section as amended shall prescribe the corporate limits of said town one-half mile in every direction from the Northeastern Railroad Depot." Acts 1884-85, p. 418. On December 6, 1902, an act was approved wherein it was enacted that "an act approved September 30, 1885, entitled an act to amend the charter of the town of Maysville, in Jackson and Banks counties, be and the same is hereby amended by striking all of section 1 of said act." Acts 1902, p. 277. Again, by an act approved August 18, 1905, it was enacted that "section 1 of the act entitled 'An act incorporating the town of Maysville, in the counties of Jackson and Banks,' approved September 30, 1879, be amended in the fifth line thereof by striking out the words 'one-half' and by inserting in lieu thereof the words 'three-fourths'; also, by striking out the word 'Northeastern' in the seventh line of said section, and by inserting in lieu thereof the words 'center of the old Northeastern depot site,' so that said section, when so amended, shall prescribe the present incorporate limits of said town of Maysville, Ga., as extending 'three-fourths' of one mile in every direction from the center of the old Northeastern depot site." Acts 1905, p. 993. It is contended that the amending act of 1902 is invalid because it purports "to amend an act approved September 30, 1885, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of the town of Maysville,'" in certain particulars, whereas there is in fact no act of that date amending the charter of this town, and the act of 1902 therefore fails sufficiently to identify the act to be amended. In Adam v. Wright, 84 Ga. 720, 11 S. E. 893, followed by Fullington v. Williams, 98 Ga. 807, 27 S. E. 183, it was held that the recital of the title of an act, coupled with the date of its approval satisfies the provision of the Constitution which forbids an act to be amended or repealed by mere reference to its title. In those cases the date of the approval of the act, as well as its title, were given, and the fact of the date appearing was stressed as furnishing matter other than the title of the act, and as descriptive of the act to be amended. The act of 1902 merely refers to the title to the act of 1885 for its description, adding thereto the date of its alleged approval. Were this date of approval correctly stated, it would, under the authorities just cited, be sufficient to satisfy the constitutional inhibition against amending an act by mere reference to its title. But here, this date being incorrectly given, it is rather matter of misdescription, and there is merely left a reference to the title of the act to be repealed, which by the terms of the Constitution is insufficient. Civ. Code 1895, § 5779. The title of the act of 1905 is "An act to amend an act to incorporate the town of Maysville, in the counties of Jackson and Banks, so as to extend the incorporate limits of said town one-fourth of one mile in every direction beyond the present corporate limits of said town of Maysville, Ga., and for other purposes." The first section purports to amend "an act incorporating the town of Maysville, in the counties of Jackson and Banks, approved September 30, 1879," by striking certain words in certain lines and inserting other words, and ends as follows: "So that said section, when so amended, shall prescribe the present incorporate limits of said town of Maysville, Ga., as extending three-fourths of one mile in every direction from the center of the old Northwestern depot site." The words referred to as to be stricken from certain lines are not in those lines of the act of 1879, but will be found in the act of 1885, which is amendatory of the act of 1879. The amendatory act of 1885 reduced the municipal territory from a circle having a radius of three-fourths of a mile to one with a radius of one-half of a mile; and, as the act of 1902 was invalid, this was the territorial limit of the town in 1905. The purpose of the act of 1905 was to amend the act of 1879 as amended by the act of 1885, so as to extend the municipal limits from a circle with a half mile radius to one with a radius of three-fourths of a mile. After referring to certain verbal changes to be made in the act of 1879, the body of the act summarizing the effect of such changes states that the section when so amended "shall prescribe the present incorporate limits of said town of Maysville, Ga., as extending three-fourths of one mile in every direction from" its designated center. The misdescription of the act of 1879 did not affect the real purpose of the amending act, as expressed in its title and body, and did not render it inoperative, since the means of identifying the thing intended to be accomplished and described are clear, certain, and convincing. The act of 1905 was therefore effective to change the limits of the town from those expressed in the act of 1885 to those of the original act of 1879. Lee v. Tucker, 130 Ga. 51, 60 S. E. 164.

2. The act approved August 7, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 121), providing for a change of county lines lying within the limits of incorporated towns or cities of more than 500 population, was attacked as unconstitutional as referring to more than one subject-matter in its title, as containing matter different from that contained in its title, and as being a special law operating upon a subject-matter provided for by an existing general law. This act is not unconstitutional for any of these reasons. Manson v. College Park, 131 Ga. 429, 62 S. E. 278.

3. The plaintiffs in the court below contend that the defendants should be enjoined from further proceeding under the act of 1906, for the reason that the act by its terms applies only to towns and cities having a population of more than 500, and by the last official census of the United States—which is the only official enumeration to which recourse could be had to determine its population—Maysville had a population of only 453, and there has been no other authorized official census since 1900. The act of 1906 does not provide how the number of inhabitants shall be determined. On the hearing the plaintiffs introduced the United States census of 1900 showing the population of Maysville to be 453. The defendants introduced an affidavit of the town marshal, to the effect that, under authority and direction of the mayor and council of the town of Maysville, in the year 1907 he took a census of the population of the town, and found 642 white and 109 colored persons within a radius of three-fourths of a mile from the center of the old Northeastern Railroad Depot site. This was the only evidence submitted as to the population at the time of the election. The plaintiffs in the court below contend that population under the act of 1906 is to be determined by an official census, while the defendants contend that it may be established by evidence as any other fact is established. An attempted enumeration, without power to require and compel answers, would be a mere farce. If a municipality may designate any individual it sees proper to enumerate its inhabitants, by simply taking a poll and reporting the result of his count, the accuracy of such an enumeration from the nature of things would be problematical. When the General Assembly authorizes municipal action based upon population, surely reference could not be made to such a primitive, faulty, and informal method. This is particularly true where it is declared that a law shall be applicable only to localities of a particular population. When the domicile of a citizen residing in a town or city lying in two counties is proposed to be changed and the political rights of such citizen effected by machinery applicable only to towns or cities containing a given population, it is to be presumed that the Legislature intended that such machinery should be put in motion only in cases where the population had been ascertained in some manner authorized by the state law or by the official census of the United States. In re Assessment, etc., City of Passaic, 54 N. J. Law, 156, 23 Atl. 517. The Legislature of this state has frequently recognized the United States census as an official method of determining population. Civ. Code 1895, § 4102, provides for jurisdiction of justices' courts within the corporate limits of any of the cities of this state having "by the United States census a population of over five thousand inhabitants." The act providing for compensation of commissioners of roads and revenues in all counties having a population of 75,000 provides that the number shall be ascertained "according to the census of the United States." Acts 1904, p. 96. During the session of 1906 the Legislature amended the act providing for the salaries of judges of the superior courts in counties having a population of not less than 54,000 nor more than 75,000 (Acts 1904, p. 73) by providing that this shall be determined by the last United States census. Acts 1906, p. 56. This same Legislature also, in passing the act to regulate the compensation of judges of the superior court for services rendered outside of their own circuits in those judicial circuits of this state having therein a city with a population of not less than 75,000 inhabitants, provided that the number should be determined "according to the census of 1900." Acts 1906, p. 57. So, also, with reference to salaries of judges of city courts in cities of prescribed population (Acts 1906, p. 59), and stenographers in certain city courts (Acts 1906, p. 59), it is provided that the population shall be determined with reference to the United States census. In providing for the apportionment of the school fund on the basis of school population, the General Assembly has made provision for an official school census. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 1389-1391. The Legislature has also made provision for taking the census in cities having a population of more than 5,000 intermediate of the decennial census of the United States, and it is expressly provided that such census shall be recognized as the state census of the population of the city "until a new census shall thereafter be taken by authority of the United States government, or of the state government." Acts 1896, p. 72. Both the official state and United States' census appear to be recognized in the Legislature of this state as standards of enumeration. It is true that alongside of these enactments, and sometimes in the same volumes, may be found acts of the Legislature which depend for their operation upon a city or county having a specified population wherein the method of enumeration is not stated. Still it seems from the statutes above enumerated, and many others not here referred to, that it has been the legislative policy of this state to reckon population from an official census; and, as the only official census for towns in this state of less than 5,000 inhabitants is the United States census, that was the proper basis for ascertaining the population of the town of Maysville in determining the applicability of the act of 1906.

4. Having reached the conclusion that as no census under the authority of the state has been taken in the town of Maysville, and the last census of the United States gives that town a population less than 500, the act of 1906 is not applicable. Any attempt by the officials of the town to effect a change in the county lines within the municipal limits by virtue of the act is ultra vires, and may be enjoined by a citizen and taxpayer of the municipality. Town of Roswell v. Ezzard, 128 Ga. 43, 57 S. E. 114.

The foregoing disposes of the case irrespective of the merits of the other assignments of error.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

LORD & McCRACKEN v. HENDERSON
et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 16, 1909.)

1. ASSUMPSIT, ACTION OF (§ 5*)—RECOVERY IN ASSUMPSIT—PLEADING.

Where a contract, though in writing, has been fully executed, and nothing remains to be done by defendants under it except payment to plaintiffs of the price stipulated for the work and labor done by them under the contract, in an action of assumpsit to recover the same, a special count on the contract is unnecessary. Recovery may be had on the common counts in assumpsit, and bill of particulars filed therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assumpsit, Action of, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 692*)—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

This court will not reverse a judgment of the circuit court for sustaining objections to questions propounded to a witness on the trial, unless it affirmatively appears from the record what the answers of the witness thereto would have been, or it is shown what was proposed to be proven by the witness in response to the questions, and that the party complaining has been prejudiced by the rulings of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2905-2909; Dec. Dig. § 692.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 414*)—MOTION TO EXCLUDE EVIDENCE—WAIVER OF OBJECTION.

If, at the close of plaintiffs' evidence in a trial before a jury, defendants move to exclude all of plaintiffs' evidence relating to certain specific matters in controversy or items in the bill of particulars filed, and if after their motion has been overruled defendants proceed with the trial and offer evidence on the same matters in issue, they will be deemed to have waived their motion to exclude, and the rights of the parties must then be tested by reference to all the evidence in the case.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Randolph County. Action by Lord & McCracken against S. S. Henderson and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Talbott & Hoover, for plaintiffs in error. W. B. Maxwell, for defendants in error.

MILLER, P. In an action of assumpsit, on the common counts and a special count, with bill of particulars, the plaintiffs obtained a verdict and judgment against defendants for $875. In the special count a contract in writing between plaintiffs and defendants, dated November 7, 1903, was alleged, whereby, in consideration of the prices stipulated to be paid them therefor, the plaintiffs contracted with defendants to pile, peel, properly cure, and load on cars, according to railroad regulations, all the merchantable bark from green hemlock timber standing on lands of the defendants and to be designated by them, and to cut into suitable log lengths all the merchantable saw timber on said land from which bark could be peeled, and to deliver said logs either at convenient places for loading at the railroad of the defendants, or in a dam accessible to defendants' sawmill, and also to cut, trim, and deliver at defendants' railroad, at a point suitable for loading same, all spruce pulp wood. The bark was to be paid for at the rate of $3.50 for every cord of 2,000 pounds, the weight to be determined by the tannery weight. The logs were to be scaled by the defendants or a competent agent by the Doyle or Scribner rule before being sawed at defendants' mill, and were to be paid for at the rate of $3.50 per 1,000 feet for spruce and hemlock, and $4 per 1,000 feet for hardwood logs. The pulp wood was to be paid for at the rate of $2 per cord of 128 cubic feet, and according to the measurements which the defendants should receive from the pulp company. In the bill of particulars filed defendants are charged by plaintiffs as follows: To cash, charged plaintiffs not received, $1,000; to 350,000 feet spruce and hemlock timber cut and delivered, not accounted for, at $3.50 per 1,000, $1,225; to damage done roads, $500; to damage done plaintiffs by taking timber nearest dam and railroad, $200; to tan bark in woods and at railroad burnt by negligence of defendants, $100.

Early in the trial below plaintiffs, in proof of the first item of their account, endeavored to show by the witness McCracken that in their statement rendered for the month of October, 1903, defendants had shown as the balance due them at that time $6,103.60 and that in the statement for the month of November, 1903, they had brought down this balance as $6,500.98, a difference of $397.38. When plaintiffs' counsel asked the witness whether he could explain why defendants had made this difference against his firm, he answered: "I cannot." The motion by defendants to exclude this question and answer was overruled. Immediately afterwards, however, when plaintiffs' counsel asked the witness to state when he, in fact, began work for the defendants under the contract, and why the written contract bore date of November 7, 1903, the objection by defendants' counsel thereto was sustained. And thereafter, for a time at least, the court limited plaintiffs in their evidence to transactions subsequent to that date. Later, when it began to appear that the evidence thus restricted might show an erroneous condition of the account between the parties, counsel for defendants, on cross-examination of plaintiff McCracken, endeavored to extend the investigation back of that date, and to show that although the contract bore date of November 7, 1903, it, in fact, was a mere reduction to writing of a prior verbal contract under which the plaintiffs had been operating since about April, 1903. But objections thereto by plaintiffs' counsel were sustained. The above ruling of the court on defendants' motion to exclude the question and the answer thereto of the witness McCracken, relating to the difference in the balance shown in the statement of October, and that brought down in the statement of November, 1903, and the subsequent rulings of the court on the several questions propounded said McCracken on cross-examination, are made the subject of defendants' bills of exceptions Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5, relied on, which will be considered together. These rulings of the court we think were based on the erroneous theory that plaintiffs were necessarily limited in their proof to the matters alleged in the special count. The allegations of the special count and the evidence on the trial show a contract fully executed on the part of the plaintiffs, and that nothing remained to be done on the part of the defendants except to pay plaintiffs the balance, if anything, due them, and that the contract no longer remained executory. A special count therefore was unnecessary. The plaintiffs, if entitled to recover anything, were entitled to recover upon the common counts. Railroad Co. v. Lafferty, 2 W. Va. 104; Railroad Co. v. Polly, Woods & Co., 14 Grat. (Va.) 445; Tuttle v. Mayo, 7 Johns. (N. Y.) 132—all cited with approval in Bannister v. Coal & Coke Co., 63 W. Va. 502, 507, 61 S. E. 338. In the latter case we quote from Tuttle v. Mayo, supra, that "where the party declares on a special agreement, seeking to recover thereon, but fails altogether, he may recover on a general contract, if the case be such that, supposing there had been no special contract, he might still have recovered." We think, therefore, that the rulings of the court in so limiting the evidence of the parties were erroneous, and that the action of the court below overruling defendants' motion to strike out, set forth in defendants' bill of exceptions No. 2, was right. But whether defendants were prejudiced by the ruling of the court shown in their bills of exceptions numbered 3, 4, and 5, and whether they are in a position to take advantage thereof, presents quite a different proposition. We do not think they were prejudiced for several reasons: First, they were the first to obtain the adverse ruling of the court, and, as a general rule, ought not afterwards to be heard to complain when the same ruling was applied to them; second, it does not affirmatively appear what the answers to the several questions propounded to the witness McCracken, objections to which were sustained, would have been. There was no proffer of counsel in either instance to show what was proposed to be proven by the witness. Wherefore we cannot say that the court committed error. Delmar Oil Co. v. Bartlett, 62 W. Va. 700, 59 S. E. 634. If the witness had answered, as he likely would have done, that the transactions began prior to November 7, 1903, the result would have been to benefit or prejudice the defendants, depending on whether a larger or a smaller balance or no balance in favor of the plaintiffs would be shown thereby. But as, in the subsequent progress of the trial, all the transactions between plaintiffs and defendants seem to have gotten fairly before the jury by the evidence of the witnesses and documentary evidence introduced, including a statement of all the accounts rendered by defendants to plaintiffs, and the tally sheets showing the scaling of the logs, we are unable to see that the rulings of the court were in any way prejudicial to the interests of the defendants.

The sixth bill of exceptions relied on relates to the testimony of plaintiff Lord that at one time when at defendants' mill he had observed the scaler employed in scaling logs make a mistake of some nine feet or more in scaling a particular log, and that not long before that this scaler had told witness that he had never known anything about scaling logs, and that witness had asked him if he was scaling the logs that were on the ways there. The court below overruled defendants' motion to exclude this evidence. Defendants claim the log in question was not shown to be one that plaintiffs had cut; but plaintiffs had already offered evidence tending to show mistakes due to incompetency of scalers, and the omission on the part of defendants to scale at all some of the logs delivered by them, and the purpose of plaintiffs by this evidence was to show that defendants had incompetent men in charge of the scaling of logs, and, by referring to the logs on the ways, witness was evidently pointing to logs delivered by plaintiffs. Taken in connection with the evidence that had been and was subsequently introduced by both parties, we see no prejudicial error in refusing to exclude this testimony.

The seventh bill of exceptions relates to the motion of the defendants, made at the close of the plaintiffs' testimony, denied by the court below, to exclude certain evidence of the plaintiffs. The motion was first applied to the exclusion of the evidence relating to the number of feet claimed in the logs delivered by them, defendants claiming that the tally sheets were the best evidence thereof, and that plaintiffs had not offered these in evidence; second, to the evidence of the plaintiffs as to loss of bark burned, because of want of negligence of the defendants shown in allowing the fire to escape; and, third, to the evidence of plaintiffs relating to logs cut by defendants from the lands which defendants had marked out for them under their contract. This was not a motion in terms to strike out all of plaintiffs' evidence, but it applied to all the evidence relating to all the items in plaintiffs' account, except the item of cash, charged as not having been received; but we see no reason why the general rule of waiver announced in Trump v. Coal & Coke Co., 46 W. Va. 238, 32 S. E. 1035, and other cases, should not apply; for defendants afterwards introduced all their evidence relating to the same subject, thereby supplementing the evidence of plaintiffs.

And this brings us to the consideration of the eighth or last bill of exceptions containing the certificate of evidence, and the motion of the defendants, overruled by the court below, to set aside the verdict and grant them a new trial, the only other error relied on. On this question it is practically conceded that the verdict and the judgment thereon to the extent of $425.40 are sustained by the evidence. This concession is based upon the evidence of plaintiffs that the reports and statements made by defendants to them from time to time of the logs, bark, and pulp wood delivered showed them entitled to $22,472.65, and that the bill of sets-off of defendants shows and defendants admitted they had paid plaintiffs on account only the sum of $22,047.25, leaving a balance of $425.40. But, as to the residue of the verdict and judgment, namely, $449.60, it is insisted there is absolutely no evidence to support them. In determining this question, we must confine ourselves to the evidence relating to the several items in the plaintiffs' account filed. The only evidence offered to support the first item is that defendants' statement of October, 1903, showed debits $6,103.60, while the statement for November following brought this balance forward as $6,500.98, an error against plaintiffs of $397.38, and that the debits shown in the November statement were $5,678.55, while this balance was brought forward in the December statement as $5,770.60, an error of $92.03, and it was claimed that another error against plaintiffs of $80 was shown in the defendants' statement for October. The plaintiffs kept no books of account. The defendants claim to have kept accurate books of account, and to have rendered monthly statements and generally daily reports of the logs scaled and delivered, and of the bark and pulp wood delivered, which statements, with tally sheets, from the beginning of the transactions in April or May, 1903, to the conclusion by plaintiffs of their contract, were offered in evidence, and that there was little, if any, evidence showing or tending to show any objection by plaintiffs at any time to these reports and tally sheets. The bookkeepers of defendants showed that these errors relied on to support this cash item were subsequently corrected and reported to plaintiffs. Their testimony was not contradicted, and no effort is made in support of the argument here by plaintiffs' counsel to show anything to the contrary, nor are we referred to any other evidence in support of this cash item. We think, therefore, it must be rejected for want of proof. On the second item, 350,000 feet of spruce and hemlock timber not accounted for, we find no appreciable evidence to support it, except only in so far as it may be covered by the sum of $425.40 covered by the verdict. The only other evidence relied upon to swell the quantity of logs delivered and not accounted for is certain indefinite testimony of plaintiffs and other witnesses that incompetent scalers had been at work at the mill, and that possibly, in the absence of the regular scaler, some of the logs delivered at the railroad may not have been scaled at all, and that there were probably certain logs in the millpond, separated from the main body of the logs delivered, that had not been scaled. But there was no evidence showing or tending to show as a matter of fact that any of the logs delivered by plaintiffs had not been scaled or incorrectly scaled. On the contrary, the testimony of the scalers and bookkeepers of the defendants is positive and unequivocal that all the logs delivered by plaintiffs had been properly scaled and reported, as shown by the monthly statements and daily tally sheets furnished plaintiffs, reference being made by them in their testimony to the statements and tally sheets where particular logs supposed by plaintiffs not to have been measured were reported and accounted for, and there was no evidence offered by plaintiffs to show the contrary, or to contradict these witnesses. It is true that the testimony of Reed, defendants' bookkeeper, and that of McCracken, conflict as to the quantity of logs reported and shown by these reports and tally sheets. McCracken claimed one amount, Reed another, the difference amounting to $425.40, and without this conflicting evidence there is absolutely no appreciable evidence of any character to support this second item of the account.

The third item of the account, $500 for damages to roads of plaintiffs, is unsupported by any appreciable evidence. The plaintiffs have failed to give in evidence a single fact showing actual damages and justifying the jury in including anything therefor in their verdict. That some trees were cut by defendants for use in building their sawmill and making other necessary preparations for their lumbering operations is admitted, and there is some little evidence tending to show some little delay and inconvenience to plaintiffs resulting therefrom; but there was nothing in the contract providing against use of the timber by defendants or inconveniences to plaintiffs therefrom. Defendants were obliged to have timber to build their mill and make other necessary preparations. This fact we think must have been contemplated by the parties at the time of the contract. The jury therefore was not justified by the evidence in including anything in their verdict on account of this item.

The fourth item, damages to plaintiffs by taking timber nearest the dam and railroad, is an item of the same character. Plaintiffs assume that there was some covenant or agreement implied, that defendants were not to invade for the purposes shown the territory marked out on their land for plaintiffs' operations; but in this we think they are in error. The proof is that some 15 trees, near the location of the mill, were cut down and used in the construction thereof; but there is not the slightest evidence to show that any actual damages resulted to the plaintiffs therefrom. They did not cut and deliver this timber to the plaintiffs, and were not entitled to the price stipulated in the contract therefor, and even upon their theory there was no attempt to establish by competent evidence or any evidence whatever what profits they would have realized on this timber if they had cut it. Wherefore the jury were not justified in including in their verdict anything on account of this item.

The fifth or last item, tan bark burned in the woods and at the railroad by defendants' negligence, has little, if any, competent evidence to support it. Plaintiffs estimate the amount of this bark at about two car loads. The bark did not belong to them. By the terms of the contract, they were entitled upon delivery to the price stipulated for peeling, piling, and curing the same. That which was in the woods, though peeled and piled, had not yet been delivered, and by the terms of the contract the measurement at the tannery was to control the amount to be paid plaintiffs. The actual amount of damages, if any, sustained by plaintiffs, was left uncertain. But whether defendants are liable for such damages depends on whether the fire causing the loss of the bark was due to their negligence. The testimony of the plaintiff McCracken is that the fire originated, to the best of his knowledge, from a house occupied by one Smith, located some 400 yards from defendants' mill, and he says he does not know what Smith was doing when the fire got started; he does not know whether it was Smith or some other person who was cleaning away the brush. He did not know what the brush was being cleared away for, but thought it might have been because the brush was piled up against the house. The plaintiff Lord says that bark was burned in the woods, and at the railroad, but he does not attempt to say by whose negligence it was burned. He does say that, when cleaning up the lumber yard, they would have fire during the day, that would burn all night, and that along in the night there was an unusually large fire down by the camp along the railroad where there was quite a large pile of bark that nearly burned up. He judges that there was a car load of bark at the railroad, and, as he and McCracken estimated two car loads in all, one car load must have been in the woods. The defendants' evidence shows that the fire originating at the Smith house was due to the cleaning up of the yard by Smith for a little garden. Whether the burning of the bark resulted from this cause was not known. But the uncontradicted evidence of defendants is that no claim was ever made by plaintiffs for any loss or damage for the burning of bark until the institution of this suit. We are of opinion, therefore, that the jury were not justified by the evidence in concluding that the burning of this bark was the result of any negligence of defendants. The evidence does not show that the fire on the millyard caused the bark to burn along the railroad, nor that the fire at the camp was the cause thereof. Without more definite evidence as to the responsible cause of the damages, the jury were not justified in including in their verdict against defendants anything for this item.

An effort is made by counsel in argument here to support the general verdict on the ground that by limiting the items in the mutual accounts between the parties to those covering their transactions subsequent to the date of the written contract a balance is shown in favor of the plaintiffs of some $5,000; but we do not think the verdict should be sustained on any such basis.

Practically all the facts relating to all the transactions prior and subsequent to November 7, 1903, got before the jury, and inasmuch as the verdict was without evidence to support it beyond $425.40, the defendants, we think, should have a new trial, and it will be so ordered.

REDD et al. v. CARNAHAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 16, 1909.)

EVIDENCE (§ 513*)—EXPERT EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Expert evidence is admissible on the character and sufficiency of work done in drilling an oil well.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Marion County.

Action by Charles Redd and others against John E. Carnahan and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Wm. S. Haymond, Leroy Taylor, B. L. Butcher, and Edmond Engler, for plaintiffs in error. Powell & Brant, W. S. Meredith, and U. N. Arnett, Jr., for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. Charles Redd, Charles A. Kelly, Joseph D. Kelly, and John C. Dillon, partners doing business in the name of Charles Redd, made a verbal contract with John E. Carnahan, Uriah H. Debendarfer, and Oren C. Bradley, partners doing business in the name of the Carnahan-Debendarfer Company, by which the Redd Company agreed to drill for the Carnahan Company making a form of contract known as the "Carnegie Natural Gas Company form" govern as to terms the well to be drilled, the well to be 2,500 feet below the Pittsburgh vein of coal. The well is called the "Alpheus Sine well No. 1" on the Alpheus Sine farm. For work done on this well the Redd Company sued the Carnahan Company in assumpsit, and recovered a verdict for $10,700, for which judgment was rendered. The defendants, in addition to the plea of non assumpsit, filed specification of offset and recoupment; but the court refused to allow evidence of the same. The defendants bring the case to this court.

The Redd Company claims that the bill of exceptions does not bring up the evidence; but we think it does. They also say there was no exception to the action of the court in refusing a new trial at the time of that action, and not until after the judgment. This objection is sought to be supported by the mere fact that the statement that such exception was made comes in the judgment order after the words of judgment, but that order testifies that such exception was made, but does not say just when. It may have been at the very time when the new trial was refused. What if it was not? If made, no matter at what point of time in the proceeding in the case, we think it would be sufficient. It would negative all idea that exception was waived. We must not defeat hearing on appeal by technicality.

Coming now to the merits so far as presented on this writ of error. The well was drilled to a depth of 2,150 feet when oil was struck. The defendants by telephone directed the plaintiffs not to drill any deeper until the defendants could come to the well, but to close in the well, and connect it with the tank, and procure proper connections and a casing head to shut the oil in and cause it to flow into the tank. When the owners of the well came, they requested the Redd Company to move the engine, boiler.

and machinery from the well to a location on another tract of land in the vicinity for which they held a lease from Myers, and begin boring a well within a few days, so as to save the lease from forfeiture. The Redd Company objected, saying they were unwilling to leave the Sine well in its then condition without casing, as it might cave in, and then the defendants agreed that they would assume all responsibility for any damage that might result from so leaving the well, and the plaintiffs then did remove the engine, boiler, and tools to the Myers location, and began that well. After five days the plaintiffs returned to the Sine well, and resumed work there, putting in casing. By the contract the plaintiffs were to put in the casing. Some of the casing separated and dropped into the well, and later some tools. The plaintiffs sought to get them out by fishing for them. After a time, the plaintiffs, learning that the defendants would not pay for this work of casing and fishing after the discovery of oil, and, claiming that the defendants had told them to drill no further, but to close in the well, had taken the well off their hands as completed, and that work thereafter was not done under the original contract, but was done as if under a new contract express or implied, refused to go further. Then the parties met, with the result that the parties executed a writing stating that, in consideration that the Carnahan Company agreed to employ the Redd Company to drill two wells for the Carnahan Company and other consideration, the Redd Company "agreed to go on and continue the work upon and complete well No. 1 located on the Alpheus Sine farm of King's run, Manongalia county, now being drilled, without any expense whatever to said parties of the first part, * * * and fully finish and complete the same according to the contract heretofore entered into." After making this contract, the Redd Company went on for some time with the fishing for tools lost in the well and endeavoring to clear out and case the well, but later quit and wholly abandoned the work. On the trial the court refused to admit this contract in evidence. We think it was admissible as tending to repel the claim that the owners of the well had, on finding oil, accepted the well as completed and absolved the drilling company from casing and going down to other sands to the stipulated depth, and, if there had been such acceptance, as tending to show the renewal of the obligation of the original contract, a recognition by the drilling company of its duty to go further with the work under that contract. It was a question of fact whether the owners of the well had accepted the well and discharged the drilling company from further work; but by excluding this contract the court seems to have assumed as a finality that such acceptance had been made; whereas, the jury should have been left to say on all the evidence, including this contract, whether there had been such acceptance, whether there was a still continuing duty to go on with the well. This contract tends to show, if it does not conclusively show, that, even if there had been an acceptance, there was a duty to go on imposed by it on valuable consideration. The contract was admissible to show that, if the drilling company failed to go on to finish the well as demanded by the original contract, the owners could recoup for money expended by them in necessary work of fishing out tools and completing the well. We think the contract ought to have been admitted in evidence, and that evidence of money so expended by the owners of the well in such work should have been admitted under the specifications of recoupment. Natural Gas Co. v. Healy, 33 W. Va. 102, 10 S. E. 56.

The rejection of the second contract and of evidence under the specification of recoupment is sought to be justified by two clauses in the first contract. One is that, if the owners of the well should desire at any time before completion to abandon the same, they should give notice in writing to the drilling company of intention to do so, and then the drilling company should cease further drilling, and receive certain compensation. This relates to abandonment of the work by the well owners, a cancellation of the contract by them. There is no claim that they abandoned the enterprise. It is said that, because they did not give notice in writing, they could not claim any offset or recoupment; that they could not go on after abandonment of the work by the drilling company. The well owners never gave up the work, never abandoned it. And was not this a question of fact? The other clause is that if there should be unnecessary delay in the work, or breach of covenant, the owners should have the option to terminate the contract by written notice of election to do so, whereupon they should have the right to take possession of the well and drill the well to completion. For want of this notice it is said the owners had no right to complete the well and charge the outlay consequent. But what if the drilling company abandoned the work? Is it possible that if the owners did not choose to exercise this option, but, on the contrary, as the evidence shows, refused to exercise it, and demanded that the drilling company finish the well, the owners were required to let their well go to loss, lie uncompleted? This clause was intended for remedy for delay of work; but the owners did not complain of delay. They did not elect to exercise this option. They could exercise it or not if there should be delay; but they did not complain of this, but insisted upon the drilling company going on. These clauses have no reference to the case of a total abandonment of the work. It is not denied that the drilling company quit the work. It is admitted by Redd on the stand. Abandonment waived right to written notice.

The defense offered evidence by experts to prove bad work by the plaintiffs, but the court rejected it. The witnesses offered were clearly proven to have had experience and knowledge fitting them to give evidence as experts. The art or mechanical skill of properly drilling oil wells hundreds and hundreds of feet through the different strata into the hidden bowels of the earth, the character of the strata, the proper treatment of them, the appropriate tools best suited for them, the proper casings, the cleaning the well, the fishing for and extrication of broken casings and lost tools, and other incidents in the work, are not within the knowledge of people generally. Indeed, there is no more intricate work; none requiring more special capacity, skill, and experience. Clearly expert evidence as to the character of the work is admissible upon the character of the work done. The evidence of mechanics is receivable in matters of technical skill pertaining to their trade. Rogers on Expert Testimony, §§ 110, 111; 12 Amer. & Eng. Ency. L. 428, 429; McKelvy v. C. & O. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 500, 14 S. E. 261; Sebrell v. Barrows, 36 W. Va. 212, 14 S. E. 996. Delmar Oil Co. v. Bartlett, 62 W. Va. 700, 50 S. E. 634, clearly sustains this position. We do not decide finally any questions of fact. We deal with the evidence only so far as to give our opinion as to admissibility. We hold that the writing dated January 24, 1905, and evidence to prove recoupment or set-off, and the expert evidence as to the character of the work, should have been admitted.

Judgment reversed, verdict set aside, and remanded for new trial.

STATE v. ALLEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 16, 1909.)

1. TAXATION (§ 47*)—DOUBLE TAXATION.

The state is not entitled to double taxes on the same land under the same title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 47*) — DOUBLE TAXATION — SUFFICIENCY OF PAYMENT.

In case of two assessments of the same land under the same claim of title for any year, one payment of taxes under either assessment is all the state can require.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 47*)—PAYMENT OF TAXES—DOUBLE TAXATION.

Payment of taxes upon an assessment of a tract of land as a whole nullifies a tax sale of a parcel which has been conveyed therefrom and separately assessed for the same year.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cabell County.

Bill by the State against Samuel V. Allen and others. Decree for R. E. Vickers, and defendant Pauline H. Buffington appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Simms & Enslow, for appellant. Geo. J. McComas, for appellee.

ROBINSON, J. A tract of land, embracing 9½ acres, in the city of Huntington, was owned by Garland Buffington in 1891. From it, in that year, the owner conveyed to Elizabeth Higgins a small parcel, describing it by metes and bounds, and, further, as "being part of what would be lot 1 of block 290." Contiguous to the 9½-acre tract lay land belonging to the Central Land Company, which had been platted as an addition to said city. Lot 1 of block 290 of that addition, adjoining the Buffington tract, was incomplete, according to the plan of the addition, unless that plan should be extended into the tract of 9½ acres. The applicability of the latter description of the parcel sold to Elizabeth Higgins out of the Buffington tract was, therefore, contingent upon the extension of the plan of the aforesaid survey and the completion of lot 1 of block 290. But the extension was not in fact made. Lot 1 of block 290 was, as we have stated, a lot on the official and recorded plan of the Central Land Company's addition to said city. As such lot, adjoining the 9½-acre tract and immediately contiguous to the parcel conveyed to Higgins, it had an official designation, as will be seen by reference to the recorded plat. Yet no such official designation ever made the Higgins parcel to become a part of lot 1 of block 290. That name was given it only by the aforesaid deed to Higgins. On the land book no deduction for the portion of the 9½ acres conveyed to Higgins as aforesaid was made from the assessment of the Buffington tract. The 9½-acre tract continued to be assessed as a whole. The parcel conveyed to Higgins was entered for taxation on the land book in her name as "part of lot 1 of block 290." Garland Buffington conveyed the residue of the 9½ acres, in 1892, to other parties. Still the assessment of the original tract of 9½ acres as a whole continued on the land book in his name. In 1893 the Higgins parcel was reconveyed to Garland Buffington, and, described as "part of lot 1 of block 290," was charged with taxes in his name. He again conveyed it, but assessment of the Higgins parcel continued on the land book in his name, notwithstanding subsequent conveyances thereof. So assessment of the whole tract of 9½ acres continued on the land book in his name, as former owner thereof; and assessment of the Higgins portion of the 9½ acres continued on the land book in his name, as former owner of it, also. The taxes on said assessment of the whole tract of 9½ acres were at all times paid by the owners of the residue of the 9½ acres; and during the year 1896 at least one of the two parties owning the said residue also had ownership of the Higgins parcel, subject to the deed of trust hereinafter mentioned. However, for the year 1896 the taxes on the assessment of the Higgins parcel became delinquent, and upon such delinquency the said lot was sold to the state, as "part of lot 1 of block 290," and was not redeemed. It was thereafter, by such description only, brought into this suit for the sale of forfeited lands for the benefit of the school fund. A decree directed the sale of "part of lot 1 of block 290." R. E. Vickers became the purchaser. A deed was made to him by the commissioner of school lands. That deed conveyed "lot 1 of block 290."

During the time that Elizabeth Higgins owned the parcel conveyed to her as aforesaid, she executed a deed of trust thereon, and, notwithstanding the subsequent conveyances of that parcel, the same was sold under the deed of trust. Title thereto by such sale became vested in Pauline H. Buffington, who entered into possession of the same. She was in possession of the same, and her deed therefor was of record, at the time of the institution of this suit for the sale of that parcel as forfeited land. Yet she was not made a party to the suit or proceeding. Vickers, the aforesaid purchaser, failing to oust her from possession by an action of ejectment, because his deed called for "lot 1 of block 290," which we have seen was entirely different property, filed his petition herein, praying that he be given a deed for the land purchased by him as aforesaid, containing a description, by the metes and bounds which he set out as the correct ones of the lot of which he alleged he became such purchaser. This description was a particular one of the Higgins parcel, and one that had not appeared in the suit or proceedings upon which he claimed title. To this petition Pauline H. Buffington was made a party. She thereupon answered, denying his right to relief in the premises. She asserted that her property had not been sold as aforesaid, and purchased by Vickers; that it was a part of the 9½ acres, and that it had been duly charged with taxes as such, and that the taxes had been actually paid thereon for the year of the alleged delinquency upon which the Vickers purchase rested; that the said property of which she was in possession, and to which Vickers claimed title and prayed for a deed, never was a part of lot 1 of block 290; that such numbered lot was one belonging to the Central Land Company's addition, adjoining her property, but that her parcel was never part thereof; that her property, as designated in her deed for the same, was not described or set out in this suit for the sale of forfeited land prior to the filing of the petition of Vickers, and that all taxes thereon had been paid under its assessment as a part of the 9½ acres. She denied that by the alleged delinquency the state ever acquired any title to the Higgins parcel owned by her, and that, therefore, Vickers acquired no title thereto. She prayed for relief consistent with her situation in the premises—that the deed to Vickers be held to interfere in no wise with or affect her said property, and that her possession of the same be quieted. The relief prayed for by Vickers was granted. That prayed for by Pauline H. Buffington was denied. The latter has, therefore, appealed.

It clearly appears that the Higgins lot was never a part of what was actually lot 1 of block 290. By no survey or merger of title had the two become one. The latter was a certain and definite lot on the said recorded plat. It belonged to Josie G. Smith, who had possession of the same. There was no extension of this plat so as to include the Buffington tract of 9½ acres. If there had been, it was supposed that the Higgins parcel would complete said lot 1 of block 290, or become a part of it. The deed to Higgins did not call the parcel conveyed thereby merely a part of lot 1 of block 290, but called it, after using definite bounds, "part of what would be lot 1 of block 290." So it is, indeed, doubtful whether it can be said that an entry on the land book as "part of lot 1 of block 290" related to the Higgins parcel. Did it not in fact relate to that which was really such numbered lot, having an official and recorded existence? One may surmise that it was intended to relate to the Higgins parcel, since Garland Buffington's name was connected with such assessment. Is such uncertain, if not to say mistaken, description sufficient? We need not say. For certain it is that it appears that there was an assessment of the Higgins parcel, and an actual payment of taxes thereon, by its inclusion in the assessment of the original tract of 9½ acres. In the agreed statement of facts in the case, it is conceded that there was such assessment of the whole, and payment of taxes thereon, for the year of the delinquency under which Vickers claims; and it is shown that this payment of taxes was by the owners of the larger tract, one of whom owned the Higgins parcel. Then did the delinquent return of "part of lot 1 of block 290," and the sale to the state thereunder, vest any title which could be acquired by Vickers? Granting that the separate assessment of a "part of lot 1 of block 290" was clearly an assessment of the Higgins parcel, we answer the question in the negative. The state received its taxes on the Higgins parcel by a payment on the whole tract by a party interested in both, for the very year as to which it proceeded to sell that parcel. The receipt of these taxes by the state saved the Higgins parcel from delinquency.

There was no hostility between the title to the whole and that of the parcel. The title to the latter was the same as that to the former, having been derived from the same source; and "where there is privity of title one payment is sufficient and full satisfaction, whether the land is charged in the name of one as a whole, or the various interests separated and charged to the respective owners, dividing the valuation equitably between or among them." State v. Low, 46 W. Va. 451, 33 S. E. 271. "The state is not entitled to double taxes on the same land under the same title. A man cannot be held to lose his estate under the rigid principles applicable to tax titles from such an unjust cause." Bogges v. Scott, 48 W. Va. 321, 37 S. E. 661. There was a double assessment of the property. In such case one payment of taxes, under either assessment, is all that the state could require. Gerke Brewing Co. v. St. Clair, 46 W. Va. 93, 33 S. E. 122.

Actual delinquency is a condition precedent to the right to sell land under a tax assessment. There is no such delinquency when the taxes have in fact been paid, by the owner himself or by any other person entitled to make such payment. It is plain that an owner of the residue of the 9% acres was entitled to pay the taxes charged against the whole tract, since he clearly had an interest in the whole to the extent of all of it but the Higgins parcel, included in the assessment thereof. And then one of the owners of that residue, for the year of the payment, owned the Higgins parcel. Such person was entitled to make payment of the taxes assessed upon the whole acreage, with the effect to render the subsequent sale of the Higgins parcel invalid. Black on Tax Titles, §§ 156, 161.

By proceeding to sell land for nonpayment of taxes, the state is simply proceeding to enforce its lien on the land for those taxes. If the taxes have in fact been received by the state, even upon some other assessment of the same land, which it has made or at least recognized by receipt of the taxes thereunder, the lien has been relinquished. And where there is no lien there can be no valid sale. By its receipt of the taxes under the assessment of the whole tract, which included the Higgins parcel, the state was estopped to deny the validity of that assessment in its relation to the Higgins parcel, and was estopped from proceeding further toward collection of taxes on that parcel, even under color of the separate assessment for the same year. Its lien was released. It had none that it could enforce. Its subsequent sale of the Higgins parcel to itself, for nonpayment of taxes thereon, was a falsehood and a nullity. Equity, in whose forum the parties now are, countenances neither untruth nor enforces invalidity.

The tax sale upon which Vickers claims title was invalid, because there was no delinquency, and he took nothing by his alleged purchase. This fact being established, the prayer of his petition should have been denied, and relief granted to Pauline H. Bufington, the owner of the parcel. The decree is, therefore, reversed, and the cause remanded to be proceeded in according to the principles herein announced.

FULLERTON v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

CARRIERS (§ 20*)—REGULATIONS—PENALTIES— DELAY IN TRANSPORTATION.

Under Act March 25, 1904 (24 St. at Large, pp. 671, 672), imposing a penalty on railroads for delay in transporting freight, to be recovered "by any consignee who may be injured in any way by such delay or by the owner or holder of the bill of lading," a consignee, not shown to be either the owner or the holder of the bill of lading, cannot recover the penalty without proving that he was injured by the delay.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Bamberg County.

Action by Mike Fullerton against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. C. Hardwick and B. W. Miley, for appellant. S. G. Mayfield and J. T. Barron, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was commenced by Mike Fullerton, Prince Kennedy, Henry Clifton, and Josephine Odom against defendant company on two causes of action: First, for statutory penalty of $5 per day for every day of delay in excess of the time prescribed under the statute of March 25, 1904 (24 St. at Large, pp. 671, 672), amounting to $150 for 30 days' delay; second, for damages for unreasonable delay in transporting said merchandise, consisting of 18½ tons of fertilizers. Plaintiff accepted a nonsuit as to the second cause of action and secured an order of amendment leaving Mike Fullerton sole plaintiff. At the close of the testimony, Judge Prince directed a verdict for defendant upon the first cause of action, and plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the undisputed facts that J. B. Gillam, a merchant, agreed to sell Fullerton, Kennedy, Clifton, and Odom 18½ tons of fertilizers, to be delivered at Lancaster Siding, on the Seaboard Air Line near Denmark, S. C. This siding was a private sawmill siding near the farms of Fullerton and the others, but was not listed on the schedule of the Seaboard Air Line. Gillam ordered the fertilizers of the Etiwan Phosphate Company, Charleston, S. C., with instructions to ship to Mike Fullerton, Lancaster Siding, S. A. L., near Denmark. Bill of lading with the words, "Prompt shipment required," was issued March 15, 1907, by the Atlantic Coast Line to Mike Fullerton, Lancaster, S. C., S. A. L., near Denmark," and sent to Gillam, who turned it over to Fullerton. The Etiwan Phosphate Company charged the fertilizers to Gillam on their books. The shipment was not a joint shipment, as each one of the four persons named had a definite portion of the fertilizers, Fullerton's portion being about four tons, and the shipment was ordered to Lancaster Siding in the name of Fullerton for the convenience of the parties, and Fullerton was furnished by Gillam with a list so as to distribute the fertilizers among them. The fertilizers not having arrived by April 12, 1907, and having been purchased for farm use, and the planting season being on, plaintiff and the other parties arranged with Gillam to order other fertilizers, which was done, and the parties received the goods about the 15th or 16th of April. About this time it was discovered by the railroad agents that the car of fertilizers in question had been shipped to Lancaster, S. C., and soon thereafter the car was sent to Denmark for delivery to the Seaboard Air Line for transportation to Lancaster Siding, where Gillam, with plaintiff's approval, notified the railroad company that other fertilizers had been ordered and furnished to the parties, and that the shipment would not be received. The railroad company then returned the goods to the Etiwan Phosphate Company and made a settlement in reference thereto with that company. Gillam and the Etiwan Phosphate Company made a settlement, whereby Gillam was released from liability from the first shipment and was charged with the second or substituted shipment. The bill of lading for the first shipment was delivered back to Gillam by the plaintiff. With reference to the damages he had sustained, plaintiff testified that the delay in shipment delayed him two or three weeks in his farm work, but there was no evidence that such delay was injurious to plaintiff.

Upon the facts it was proper to direct a verdict for defendant. Under the statute the penalty can only be recovered "by any consignee who may be injured in any way by such delay or by the owner or holder of the bill of lading." The plaintiff was not shown to be either the owner or the holder of the bill of lading or injured consignee at the time of the commencement of the action. It was incumbent upon the consignee to prove that he was injured by the delay. Muckenfuss Mfg. Co. v. Charleston & W. C. Ry. Co. (S. C.) 63 S. E. 747. While not absolutely conclusive, the cases of Best v. Railway, 72 S. C. 479, 52 S. E. 223, Macon v. Railway, 81 S. C. 167, 62 S. E. 6, and Matheson v. Railway, 79 S. C. 158, 60 S. E. 437, tend to show that plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendant for the penalty.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

ROGERS v. MORRELL et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. WILLS (§ 531*) — CONSTRUCTION — "BETWEEN"—"AMONG."

Where testator bequeathed to H. (his son) and to "W., L., and G." (children of a predeceased daughter) all his notes, mortgages, and moneys, "to be equally divided between them," and also his other personal property "to be sold to the highest bidder, and the money equally divided between the legatees above named," the word "between" was intended to mean "among," and the parties took per capita, and not per stirpes (citing Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 768).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 531.*]

2. WORDS AND PHRASES—"BETWEEN."

While, in a strictly technical sense, the word "between" implies a division between two persons or classes, yet frequently by the uneducated and colloquially it is used in the sense of "among," especially where it follows the word "divide."

3. WILLS (§ 531*) — CONSTRUCTION — PER STIRPES OR PER CAPITA.

If a devise be made to an individual designated by name and to other individuals designated as a class, all the individuals take equally, and per capita, and not per stirpes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Dec. Dig. § 531.*]

4. WILLS (§ 488*)—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE.

Where a will is not ambiguous in terms, testimony as to the surrounding circumstances will not be resorted to to ascertain its meaning.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Spartanburg County; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Petition by W. L. Rogers, as executor, against H. W. Morrell and others. From the judgment, defendant Morrell appeals. Affirmed.

Simpson & Bomar, for appellant. Stanleyne Wilson, for the Gilberts.

JONES, J. The appeal in this case involves the construction of a clause of the will of W. F. Morrell, deceased, which is as follows: " * * * I further bequeath unto Hy W. Morrell and W. F., L. M. and Hazel S. Gilbert all my notes, mortgages and monies to be equally divided between them, also my cot or personal property, horse, cows or utensils of any kind to be sold to the highest bidder and the money equally divided between the legatees above named." It appears that Henry W. Morrell is a son of the testator, and that W. F. Gilbert, L. M. Gilbert, and Hazel S. Gilbert are children of a predeceased daughter.

The question at issue between the parties was whether the division of the property under the terms of the will should be per stirpes or per capita. The probate court held that the division should be per stirpes because this construction would give full effect to the word "between," because the name of Henry W. Morrell is followed by the word "and," and because the Gilbert children are grouped together thus: "W. F., L. M. and Hazel S. Gilbert." The circuit court reversed the probate court, holding that the word "between" was clearly intended to mean "among," and that the division should be per capita.

We agree with the circuit court. While it is true that in a strictly technical sense the word "between" implies a division between two persons or classes, yet frequently by the uneducated and colloquially it is used in the sense of "among." Especially is this true when it follows the word "divide" as in this instance. 1 Words & Phrases, 768. The notes, mortgages, and moneys were "to be equally divided between them," and the other personality sold and "equally divided between the legatees above named." "Them" and "legatees above named" clearly refer to all the individuals designated as the persons among whom the equal division was to be made. The word "and" after the name "Henry W. Morrell" cannot have the effect of defeating this plain meaning of the will. This case does not fall within the principle stated in Cole v. Creyon, 1 Hill, Eq. 311, 26 Am. Dec. 208, as in that case the bequest was to an ascertained individual and to a class of unascertained individuals, whereas in this case the individuals are ascertained and named. The rule is well settled in this state that, if a devise be made to an individual designated by name and to other individuals designated as a class, all the individuals take equally and per capita, and not per stirpes. Conner v. Johnson, 2 Hill, Eq. 44; Dupont v. Hutchinson, 10 Rich. Eq. 1; Feemster v. Good, 12 S. C. 576. The will not being ambiguous in terms, it is unnecessary to resort to testimony as to the surrounding circumstances in order to ascertain its meaning. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 65 S. C. 390, 43 S. E. 878.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE v. LOPEZ.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1036*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—PRESENTATION OF ERROR AT TRIAL.

The sufficiency of the evidence to support a conviction cannot, in general, be reviewed on appeal unless first appropriately presented to the trial court for its action and an appeal taken from the court's ruling.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Richland County.

J. F. Lopez was convicted of obtaining property under false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Earle, for appellant. Christie Benet, Sol., for the State.

JONES, J. The defendant was convicted at the February term, 1908, general sessions for Richland county, under an indictment for obtaining property under false pretenses and was sentenced to pay a fine of $300 and to serve six months on the county chain gang.

The exceptions all allege that there was no evidence to support the conviction. There was no request to charge, no motion to direct a verdict, and no motion for a new trial on this ground. The circuit court was in no way called upon to make a ruling and made no ruling upon the subject. There was nothing to prevent counsel raising the question in the circuit court. Hence there is nothing to review. Usually such a question should be presented first to the trial court in some appropriate way, and appeal should be taken from the ruling thereon. In Gunter v. Fallo, 78 S. C. 458, 59 S. E. 70, it was impracticable to raise the question on circuit before judgment, as the testimony had been taken by consent and reported to the court, and judgment was rendered after the adjournment of court. Under these exceptional circumstances the court considered whether there was any testimony to support the judgment. We may say, however, ex gratia, that, considering the record, we cannot say that there was absolutely no testimony to support the verdict.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

DESCHAMPS v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 26*)—ABSENCE OF WITNESS—DILIGENCE.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. A. Willcox and Mark Reynolds, for appellant. L. D. Jennings, for respondent.

WOODS, J. A few days before February 24, 1907, the plaintiff checked from Charleston, S. C., to Sumter, S. C., on defendant's railroad a case containing one Gold Medal Computing Scale, used by him as a sample in his business as a traveling salesman. It does not appear when the scale reached Sumter, but it was in the defendant's baggage-room at Sumter, on February 24, 1907, when a fire occurred destroying defendant's depot, including the baggage-room. Plaintiff, in his complaint against the defendant, alleged the scale and case to have been destroyed, and sought to recover their full value, $122.50. The evidence tended to show injury only, and the jury found a verdict for $50. The defendant appeals.

The first four exceptions charge abuse of discretion in the refusal of the circuit judge to grant a motion for continuance, made on the ground that William J. Walker, an officer of the Toledo Computing Scales Company, would testify, if present, that the scale belonged to that company, and not to the plaintiff, and that, after due diligence, the defendant had not had time to secure the presence of Walker as a witness, or to have his testimony taken. The action was commenced on June 1, 1907, and was not called for trial until November, 1907. The ownership of the scale was one of the issues made by the pleadings. It was certainly not an abuse of discretion for the circuit court to hold that six months was sufficient time to ascertain what would be the testimony of the officers of the scales company, and have it taken in Toledo, Ohio, their place of residence.

The instructions complained of in the fifth and sixth exceptions were nothing more than a statement of the rule, well established in this state, that when goods transported by a common carrier arrive at their destination, the liability continues to be that of a common carrier until the consignee has a reasonable time to remove them. Brunson v. R. R. Co., 76 S. C. 9, 56 S. E. 538, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 577.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Lancaster County; Geo. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Howell H. Shute against William H. Shute and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This was an action to cancel a deed of land on the ground that it had never been delivered. The primary issue was whether plaintiff, who signed a deed purporting to convey land to defendants, his sons, intended to deliver the deed so as to have the same take effect. The following is the opinion of the court below:

"The primary issue involved here is this: Did the plaintiff intend the deed in controversy to be delivered upon its signing, so as to convey the fee out of him and into the defendants?

"At the outset the defendants object to, as incompetent, any parol testimony to prove the negative of that issue. The rule of evidence which rejects parol testimony which tends to vary a written instrument is as old as the law. The matter of difficulty lies always in the application of the rule. The testimony here does not tend to vary the words of the instrument. The act and fact of delivery is independent of the language of the instrument. Delivery consists of an act of the hand joined with a purpose of the mind. It comes after the scrivener has done his work, and after the signing of the paper. Whether or not a deed was delivered is an issue frequently made in the courts, and has been since deeds were written. If parol evidence, to establish or to refute delivery, is incompetent, then the issue of delivery would never arise, for delivery rests, not in words written, but in things done and said. I think the testimony is competent. If the testimony of the witnesses be then received, it then clearly proves that the plaintiff never intended the deed to take effect and be delivered, so as to transfer the fee from himself to his sons, the defendants. The old man so swears, and so does one of the defendants, and so did the defendant Joseph at another trial, and so does one of the law's witnesses, John P. Hunter. The only testimony to the contrary is that of the defendant Joseph and the circumstances of the case, and the defendant Joseph does not recite the circumstances of the making of the deed. He does not deny that they were as detailed by Hunter and by the old man. His testimony is directed chiefly to proving acts of dominion and ownership exercised by him and by his brothers, the other two defendants. In the suit by Howell H. Shute v. Manchester Insurance Company, tried in 1898, Joseph has even testified that his father, Howell, always kept the deed; never delivered it to him; he never had it in his hands, and that he lived on the land by permission of his father. That testimony, competent and relevant in this action, is inconsistent with the claim Joseph makes. It is consistent with the contention of the plaintiff, Howell H. Shute, and that of his other son, William. The son and defendant John has not testified. He sold his interest to Joseph in November, 1906. I am therefore of the opinion that when the deed was signed it was not delivered to the sons, and that it was not the intention of the old man to put the fee and dominion out of himself and into his sons.

"I have not overlooked the circumstances relied upon by Joseph, which tend to show the contrary. They are the recording of the deed, the improvements by Joseph, the return of the property in the names of the sons, the payment of taxes by the sons, the execution of a mortgage by the sons. Most of these acts are technical, and their import and the consequences of them are not apprehended by plain men. The fundamental issue is: Did the old man mean to deprive himself of his property and give it to his boys? I think the circumstances do not overcome the force of his own oath and that of the witness to the deed that he did not. Nor can I sustain the defenses set up by Joseph. They are the statute of limitations, a claim for improvements, estoppel by conduct, and laches of the plaintiff. There is no room to apply the statute of limitations. There was no adverse holding by Joseph. There is a wide difference between the witnesses about the value of the improvements. No disinterested witness testified. Joseph put the improvements at $1,200. The plaintiff put them at $102. It is safe to assume the truth lies between these two estimates. If they be fixed at $600, no harm can come to Joseph. He occupied the premises for 15 years, cultivated a two-horse farm thereon, and paid no rent. He has lost nothing. The testimony does not warrant the application of the doctrine of estoppel to the plaintiff. Joseph was not misled by the plaintiff, for Joseph knew that the old man had not intended to convey away the land, and if the old man has waited too long to seek his remedy in a court, he, and not the defendant Joseph, has suffered thereby. The doctrine of laches is applied to prevent the commission of wrong. I am therefore of the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief he asks.

"It is therefore ordered and directed that the deed in issue be mutilated, and that the clerk of this court write upon the book where it was recorded the declaration that the deed was mutilated, and that its record shall be of no force whatever."

J. Harry Foster, for appellants. R. B. Allison, for respondent.

WOODS, J. After careful consideration of the record, this court is of the opinion that the reasoning of the circuit court well supports the conclusions stated in the decree.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

PLATTEAU v. VIRGINIA CAROLINA CHEMICAL CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEGLECT.

Evidence, in an action by a servant for injuries, held to show that defendant failed to provide a safe place for plaintiff to work in, and to sustain a verdict for plaintiff.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County.

Action by William Platteau against the Virginia Carolina Chemical Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mordecai & Gadsden and Rutledge & Haggood, for appellant. Logan & Grace, for respondent.

WOODS, J. On 27th February, 1907, the plaintiff, as a servant of the defendant, was employed, along with other laborers, in carrying on trucks, from the warehouse of the defendant to a car which the defendant was loading, a lot of cotton seed meal in bags. While engaged in this work, a part of the pile of sacked meal fell on plaintiff, inflicting physical injuries for which he recovered a judgment in this action. The issue on the trial was whether the injury resulted from negligence of the defendant in failing to provide a reasonably safe place for plaintiff to work, or from the negligence of plaintiff's fellow servants. The defendant, contending that no other inference could be drawn from the evidence than that the injury resulted from the negligence of plaintiff's fellow servants, moved for a nonsuit at the end of the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, and, after the verdict, moved on the same ground for a new trial. The appeal depends on the alleged error of the circuit judge in refusing these motions.

We think the record shows beyond doubt that there was evidence of the failure of defendant to provide a safe place to work, resulting in the injury to the plaintiff. The plaintiff and several other witnesses on his behalf testified that, in order to make a pile of sacks of cotton seed meal safe, it is necessary to "tie" the sacks—that is, lay them crosswise on each other—and that the pile in this instance was not properly tied. It is true that the same witnesses testified that they supposed the meal had been piled by some of their fellow laborers; but, on the other hand, W. H. Barnwell, superintendent of defendant's business, testified as follows: "A. This tying of bags is usually done at the end of the pile to form a buttress to pile against, but, if the bags are tied all through the pile, it certainly has never been done at the Standard, and I don't think at any of the other works. They are tied at the end and simply piled against that. Q. You heard this witness describe how they were tied all through, is that ever done? A. No, sir; not as far as I know. Q. How many piles of these bags do you suppose you have seen? A. They are never tied through the pile. Q. Did you see this pile before it fell? A. Of course, I have seen it." And A. S. Prince, defendant's foreman, testified this meal was piled in the way indicated by Mr. Barnwell. This evidence on behalf of defendant tends to prove that this method of piling and tying—the plan of making the pile safe—described by Mr. Barnwell, was that adopted by the defendant itself, and that the laborers who did the work of piling merely carried out the defendant's plan. If this method was used here, as Prince testified it was, and was negligent, evidently the negligence would be that of the master who planned, not of the fellow servants of the plaintiff, who mechanically carried out the plan of piling; and there would be a basis for the inference that the plaintiff was injured because of the negligence of the defendant in failing to provide a safe place to work. There was evidence on behalf of the defendant that this method was used here, and was safe; and evidence on behalf of plaintiffs that the bags were not tied or not properly tied so as to make the pile secure. The issue thus made, as to whether plaintiff's injury resulted from a breach of defendant's duty to provide a reasonably safe place to work, was necessarily submitted to the jury.

It follows from the same reasoning that there was evidence to sustain the verdict, and it was therefore not error of law for the circuit court to refuse to set it aside and order a new trial.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Pickens County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge.

Action by Plumer Hallum against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. P. Carey, for appellant. Morgan & Mauldin, for respondent.

JONES, J. On the 17th day of April, 1906, near Norris, in Pickens county, plaintiff was in the employment of defendant as a member of a squad of section hands, under control of J. H. Pittman as section boss, and was engaged in moving heavy iron rails from one side of the track to the other, and when throwing down one of the rails, one end bounced back and struck plaintiff on the leg, breaking it. This action was to recover damages for such injury, and resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for $450.

The complaint alleged that George Brown and Tom Austin had been appointed "callers," and were acting as such, and that plaintiff and other persons working with him were governed and directed in the handling of the rails by said callers, especially as to when to throw or let go said rails, and their authority to so direct was recognized or acquiesced in by the said Pittman, the plaintiff, and defendant, and those working with him, and the plaintiff at this particular time was required to obey Tom Austin. The complaint further alleged that plaintiff and several others had hold of one end of the iron rail, with Tom Austin as caller at that end, and that several others had hold at the other end, with George Brown as caller there, that George Brown gave the order to throw down the rail while Tom Austin gave order to hold steady, and that, when the end controlled by Brown was thrown, that caused the plaintiff and those at the end controlled by Austin to drop the rail, and the other end being thrown caused the Austin end to fly back and strike plaintiff, and in short that it was negligence of the defendant to subject plaintiff to the hazard and danger usually resulting from the confusion of orders by those authorized to direct the services of plaintiff. The defendant, besides a general denial, pleaded that the injury was the result of plaintiff's negligence, and was the result of the ordinary risks of his employment. Both on the motion for nonsuit and for a new trial defendant contended (1) that there was no evidence tending to show negligence of defendant; (2) that the injury received by plaintiff was the result of the acts of fellow servants in the same employment or labor; (3) that the acts of those removing the rails were not done under the immediate orders of a superior officer or agent having the right to direct the services of plaintiff and those working with him. These questions are renewed here by the exceptions.

The court instructed the jury that article 9, § 15, of the Constitution nullified the doctrine of assumption of risks in certain particulars named in the section, and that, if plaintiff was injured by the negligence of a person having the right to control and direct his services, he could not be held to have assumed such risk, and that, if they were satisfied that Pittman had general charge of the work and appointed these callers, or if the employes of the company themselves agreed that these men should be callers, and it was their duty to obey the order of the callers, and plaintiff was injured by reason of the negligence of the callers, plaintiff was entitled to recover. Under exceptions to this charge it is contended that it is error in holding that article 9, § 15, of the Constitution applied to a gang of hands removing railway irons, and in no way connected with the operation of trains.

We will first notice this last question. We are of the opinion that a section hand in the employment of a railroad corporation is within the meaning of the words "every employé of any railroad corporation," provided for in article 9, § 15, of the Constitution. The section reads as follows: "Every employé of any railroad corporation shall have the same rights and remedies for any injury suffered by him from the acts or omissions of said corporation or its employes as are allowed by law to other persons not employes, when the injury results from the negligence of a superior agent or officer, or of a person having a right to control or direct the services of a party injured, and also when the injury results from the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in another department of labor from that of the party injured, or of a fellow servant on another train of cars, or one engaged about a different piece of work. Knowledge by any employé injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways or appliances shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby, except as to conductors or engineers in charge of dangerous or unsafe cars or engines voluntarily operated by them. When death ensues from any injury to employes, the legal or personal representatives of the person injured shall have the same right and remedies as are allowed by law to such representatives of other persons. Any contract or agreement expressed or implied, made by any employé to waive the benefit of this section shall be null and void, and this section shall not be construed to deprive any employé of a corporation, or his legal or personal representative, of any remedy or right that he now has by the law of the land. The General Assembly may extend the remedies herein provided for to any other class of employes." It is not within the question submitted to us to consider whether the section in any particular violates the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution; nor whether the term "railroad corporation" is limited to commercial railroads, or those engaged in the transportation of freight and passengers; nor whether a street railway is included; nor whether railways operated by an industrial association, joint-stock company or corporation for its own private use are not included. These topics are interestingly noticed in 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1086, and 10 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1118, note to 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 479. In this case the plaintiff was an employé of a strictly commercial railroad, and the question is whether the Constitution modifies the common-law doctrine of fellow servants in respect to a sectionman of such a railroad. The Supreme Court of Mississippi, in the case of Bradford Construction Co. v. Heflin, 88 Miss. 314, 42 South. 174, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1040, 8 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 1036, construing a similar provision in the Mississippi Constitution, held that it meant only such employes as were imperilled by the hazardous nature of the business of operating railroad trains. Like rulings were made in Iowa and Minnesota, under employer's liability statutes in terms as general. Deppe v. Chicago, 36 Iowa, 52; Johnson v. St. Paul, etc., R. R. Co., 43 Minn. 222, 45 N. W. 156, 8 L. R. A. 419. These decisions are manifestly in conflict with the natural meaning of the language of the Constitution and statute, and the construction was confessedly adopted to avoid a supposed conflict with the equality clause of the federal Constitution. Without further reference to decisions from other jurisdictions we content ourselves with citing the case of Callaghan v. St. Louis, etc., R. R. Co., 170 Mo. 473, 71 S. W. 208, 60 L. R. A. 249, 94 Am. St. Rep. 746, affirmed by the United States Supreme Court St. Louis Merchants' Bridge Terminal R. Co. v. Callahan, 194 U. S. 628, 24 Sup. Ct. 857, 48 L. Ed. 1157, under the authority of Tullis v. Lake Erie, etc., R. R. Co., 175 U. S. 348, 20 Sup. Ct. 138, 44 L. Ed. 192. The Missouri statute provided that every railroad corporation operating a railroad shall be liable for all damages sustained by any agent or servant thereof, while engaged in the work of operating such road, by reason of the negligence of any other servant or agent thereof. It was held that the right of recovery was not limited to injuries inflicted by negligence of a fellow servant while actually moving trains, and that the term "operating a railroad" includes all work directly necessary for the running of trains over a track, including section hands engaged in repairing the track over which the trains must run. This is a very reasonable view, as it cannot be doubted that the efficient operation of a railroad and the safety of the traveling public depend very largely and directly upon the ceaseless vigilance of the sectionmen. Their work entails many perils peculiar to it as an essential factor in the movement of trains. It would be a strange result if an enactment, designed to protect railroad employes, should be held to exclude this important class charged with the duty of making the track secure, and that, too, in the absence of any intimation of such intent in the language of the enactment. On this point the case of Rutherford v. Southern Railway, 56 S. C. 448, 35 S. E. 136, and the case of Bodle v. Southern Railway Co., 61 S. C. 468, 39 S. E. 715, are conclusive, and we are satisfied with the ruling in these cases. Both cases held that sectionmen, as employes of a railroad company, were within the provision of article 9, § 15, of the Constitution. In Bodle's Case the section master was injured while engaged with his men in carrying rails up an embankment for the purpose of loading them upon his dump car for removal to another place, the injury resulting from negligence of the railroad company to furnish sufficient force of hands to lift the rails safely. In Rutherford's Case a section hand was injured while engaged with other employes in loading flat cars, slowly moving along the track, with iron or steel rails, the injury resulting from the failure of Lune Walker, who was caller for the gang, to countermand the order to throw the rails on the car in time for plaintiff to escape from the falling rail. The court held that it was immaterial whether Walker had been appointed caller by Summer, as section master having general supervision of the work, or was selected by the other hands, who voluntarily subjected themselves to his order, and that in either case Walker would be a person having a right to control or direct the services of the plaintiff in the particular work in which he was engaged when injured. The instructions given were in accordance with the law as declared in the Rutherford Case.

It remains to consider whether there was any evidence tending to support the verdict. As shown in the Rutherford Case, an employe of a railroad company has the same rights and remedies as a person not an employe in three instances: "(1) Where the injury results from the negligence of a superior officer or agent; (2) where it results from the negligence of a person having a right to control or direct the services of the party injured; (3) when it results from the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in another department of labor, or on another train of cars, or one engaged in a different piece of work." "In all other cases not falling under either of the classes above indicated the law upon the subject of the defense of fellow servant remains the same as it was before." It is conceded that the case does not fall within the first and third classes. Does the case fall within the second class? On this point George Brown testified that he was one of a squad of section hands moving the rails, and was appointed caller at one end of the rail by Captain Pittman, the section master, and that it was the duty of the men to obey what he said; that Tom Austin was appointed caller at the other end; that about 15 hands had a hold of the rail, and the rail was getting heavy; that Austin said "Steady," and he (Brown) said "Drop down"; that the boys threw it too quickly, and the rail flew back and struck plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that both Austin and Brown had been giving the orders; that Brown called "Throw away," and Austin said "Steady," and he paid attention to his call. All the witnesses agreed that Austin was caller at one end of the rail and Brown at the other, but most of the witnesses testified that it was Brown's duty to call "Deal" or "Pick up" when the rail was to be lifted, and that it was Austin's duty to call "Throw away" when the rail was to be dropped. Pittman, the section master, testified that he appointed no one caller, that it was the custom of the section hands to choose a caller and that they had chosen Austin, and he was the man they should have obeyed, and that he (Pittman) was not present at the time of the accident.

The testimony tends to show that the injury was the result of the confusion arising from the opposite calls of two men having the right to direct the services of plaintiff in the matter of moving rails. The case was properly submitted to the jury, and for the same reason there was no error of law in refusing a new trial.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Ex parte REMBERT.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 99*)—CUSTODY OF CHILD.
In awarding the custody of children, the court should exercise a wise discretion, looking to the real welfare of the children as the principal consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 84; Dec. Dig. § 99;* Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 16-24.]

2. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 99*)—CUSTODY OF CHILD—RIGHT OF FATHER.

Though the right of the father to custody of his minor children will, in a proper case, be recognized even as against the mother, such right is subject to the discretion of the court, exercised for the best interests of the children and may be affected by the father's previous voluntary agreement as to such custody.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 99;* Parent and Child, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-32.]

3. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 99*) — CUSTODY OF CHILD.

A letter by a father, assenting in most positive terms to the mother's custody and control of their children and separate maintenance for them, cannot be ignored by the father in his subsequent petition for his custody of the children.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

Original petition by Edward E. Rembert for writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of obtaining custody of his three children. Proceedings dismissed.

Lee & Moise, for petitioner.

JONES, J. The petitioner makes application in the original jurisdiction of this court for writ of habeas corpus to award him, as father, the custody of three infant children, alleged to be unlawfully detained from him by their mother. The petitioner, Edward E. Rembert, is a resident of Sumter county, and the children, Arthur Rembert, Andre Rembert, and Edward Rembert, aged, respectively, thirteen, nine, and six years, are in the custody of their mother, Christine E. Rembert, wife of petitioner, now living in the city of Charleston, S. C. It is alleged that on May 26, 1908, Mrs. Rembert deserted the home of petitioner and unlawfully carried away these children, and is detaining them illegally and against his wishes, and that he is entitled to their custody as their father.

Mrs. Rembert in her verified return alleges that she left the home of her husband, the petitioner, on account of his base conduct and violence towards her, and his drunkenness; that she had previously on several occasions left his home on this account, and would return upon his solicitation, only to have the same conduct repeated; that she and the children are residing in the city of Charleston, S. C., with her father and mother; that she has the children at school; that they are happy, and have the best surroundings and her constant protection. She further alleges that petitioner has relinquished to her his parental right to the children, as shown by his letter, exhibited as follows:

"Rembert, S. C., April 23, 1907.

"Dear C.: I wired you children would be down to-morrow. I do not now require that you shall stay with them. Just do as you please with them. I turn them over to you completely. Our ideas are too totally different to raise the same children; so it is best for one to have complete control. This I would have required from you, had I kept them; so I extend same to you. On the first of each month I will send you check for $100. This must cover everything. Now please understand this most positively. Arthur can calculate everything for G. and E., pocket money, clothes, etc., and I will make a deposit four times a year for them—with him for G. and the Prest. of St. Mary's for E. I hope this will end a disagreeable correspondence. I, of course, won't expect a reply. Your check will be forwarded May 1st. Hoping the children will arrive safely, and wishing you every success and happiness, I am in haste Yours affect., Edward.

"P. S. Understand the children are yours, just as if I were dead, and your actions are your own. I know we are just as separated as if you had your divorce and new husband. There is no one to question your actions now. E."

Petitioner denies that he has relinquished the custody of his children, and with reference to this letter admits that he wrote the same, but alleges that it was written as an experiment, and in the hope that by casting such responsibility on respondent he might thereby induce her to arrive at a proper conception of her duty to the petitioner and his family, and reform her conduct after a practical experience in establishing an independent household elsewhere.

It seems that Mrs. Rembert and the children have been at the home of petitioner at intervals since the date of that letter, but that she went away, taking the children with her, without objection on the part of petitioner. Mrs. Rembert in her return further alleges that the probate court of Charleston county has appointed her guardian of said children; but it appears that an effort is now being made on behalf of petitioner to revoke such appointment for want of jurisdiction. It also appears that Mrs. Rembert, as guardian of the children, has instituted suit against Arthur G. Rembert, as trustee of said children, involving an accounting for rents and profits of a valuable tract of land in Sumter county, now in the possession of petitioner under said trustee. It further appears that on August 31, 1908, Mrs. Rembert commenced an action against petitioner for alimony and separation, and that Judge Watts, upon a rule to show cause, on October 21, 1908, made his order allowing $80 per month to Mrs. Rembert as alimony pendente lite and council fees, from which order an appeal has been taken to this court.

The charge made that petitioner is morally unfit to have the custody of his children cannot be sustained upon the testimony submitted in this case. The testimony of many reputable citizens of Sumter county completely refutes any such suggestion. Nor can it be doubted that the children are the object of his love, and that he is able and willing to provide for their comfort and proper training. On the other hand, it has not been shown that the mother is unfit for the custody and training of her children, and, while she is scant of means, the children are devoted to her, are happy with her, are being trained in the public schools of the city of Charleston, and, so far as appears, are in wholesome and comfortable surroundings in the home of their grandparents. In awarding the custody of children, the court should exercise a wise discretion, looking to the real welfare of the children as the principal consideration. Brown v. Robertson, 76 S. C. 153, 56 S. E. 786, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1173.

But, in view of all the circumstances, the court is not prepared to say that the best welfare of the children will be promoted by taking them from the loving care of their mother. The paramount right of the father has been often recognized and enforced by this court, and will in proper cases be recognized, even as against the mother; but the father's right is not absolute. Not only is it subject to the discretion of the court, exercised for the best welfare of the child, but may be affected by his own previous voluntary definite agreement as to the custody of the child. Ex parte Reynolds, 73 S. C. 296, 53 S. E. 490, 114 Am. St. Rep. 86. In this case the letter in evidence shows in most positive terms the assent of the petitioner that respondent shall have custody of the children and separate maintenance for them. It does not appear that this arrangement has been annulled by the parties, and it cannot be ignored or capriciously disregarded by petitioner.

Having reached the conclusion that the welfare of the children does not require that they be taken from their mother, in whose custody petitioner has voluntarily placed them under circumstances looking to their separate maintenance under her control, the court will, at least for the present, leave the children in their mother's custody. We refrain from expressing any conclusion as to the charges respecting the conduct of petitioner towards respondent, as that matter will be more appropriately involved in the pending suit for alimony, and we wish our judgment herein not to be regarded as preventing the circuit court in that suit from making any proper judgment touching the custody and maintenance of the said children as may be found to be within the scope of the action and the general power of the court. We dismiss the proceedings herein without prejudice to another application on a different state of facts, either in the circuit court in the alimony suit, or in this court after the termination of said suit.

The writ of habeas corpus is refused, and the proceedings dismissed.

ANCRUM v. CAMDEN WATER, LIGHT & ICE CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 750*)—LIABILITIES UNDER CONTRACTS TO PERFORM DUTIES OF MUNICIPALITIES.

When a public duty is required of a municipality, one who contracts with it to perform the duty for it incurs the same liabilities as the law imposes on the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1579; Dec. Dig. § 750.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS—CONTRACT WITH WATER COMPANY—INDEMNITY AGAINST FOR LOSSES.

As the law does not require municipal corporations to maintain waterworks, but merely authorizes them by 22 St. at Large, p. 83, and 23 St. at Large, p. 49, to build and operate them as municipal property, when the statute of 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 1039) empowered them to grant others exclusive franchises to do so, without limiting the power, except as to the vote necessary to approve the same, and requiring that the grant should provide a maximum water rate, it left them free as to other terms and conditions, and they might provide for indemnity against fire losses if they saw fit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS—CONTRACT WITH WATER COMPANY—INDEMNITY AGAINST FIRE LOSSES.

If it be an unfair discrimination against other taxpayers for a city to pay from its general revenue indemnity for fire losses, a water company could not avail itself thereof to avoid a liability assumed in such a case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 200*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS—CONTRACT WITH WATER COMPANY—LIABILITIES FOR BREACH.

A city and any of its inhabitants, on one side, and a water company, on the other, are entitled to such damages resulting to them from a breach of the contract between the city and the company as are fairly within the contemplation of the parties, either expressly provided by the contract or fairly implied therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 200*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS—CONTRACT WITH WATER COMPANY — AGENCY OF CITY FOR CITIZEN.

A city, in contracting with a water company, does not make the contract as the agent of the individual citizen, on the ground that the city, as his agent, makes it for him, as its principal, though such a contract is made invalid by law unless confirmed by a two-thirds vote.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1*)—DEFINITION.

A municipal corporation is a legal institution formed by charter from sovereign power, erecting a populous community of prescribed area into a body politic and corporate, with corporate name and continuous succession, and for the purpose and with the authority of subordinate self-government and improvement and local administration of affairs of state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4620-4627; vol. 8, p. 7726.]

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 66*)—INHERENT RIGHTS OF INHABITANTS.

A city's inhabitants have no inherent right to direct its affairs; all these rights being conferred on them by the lawmaking power of the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1*)—CITY AS AGENT FOR INHABITANTS.

A city is not in any legal sense the agent of its inhabitants, either singularly or collectively, but is a legal institution in the nature of a governmental agency, deriving its powers from the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

9. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS—CONTRACT WITH WATER COMPANY — LIABILITY FOR FIRE LOSSES.

A municipal water company is not liable for fire losses of an individual citizen of a city, on the ground that in contracting with the city it contracted with him through the city as his agent, though such relationship is not necessary to confer on him the legal right to benefits provided in its contract with such a company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

10. CONTRACTS (§ 330*)—PARTIES—AGREEMENT FOR BENEFIT OF THIRD PERSON.

Where one person makes a promise for the benefit of a third, the latter may sue thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1592; Dec. Dig. § 330.*]

11. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS—LIABILITY FOR FIRE LOSS.

It is presumed that parties contract for their own benefit, and not for that of others, not parties, and so a contract by a city is presumed to be for the benefit of the municipality as a whole, and not for the benefit of its inhabitants as individuals; and in order for an inhabitant to have the benefit of a contract with a water company, so as to render it liable to him for fire losses sued for, it is not sufficient to show that it contracted with the city to have an adequate supply of water to extinguish fires, but he must show that it was intended that he should be the direct beneficiary of this provision, to the extent that it would indemnify him for losses due to its negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

12. CONTRACTS (§ 321*)—STIPULATIONS AS TO CONSEQUENCES OF BREACH—EFFECT.

A stipulation by parties themselves as to what shall be the consequences of a breach, if reasonable, is controlling, and excludes other consequences.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1508; Dec. Dig. § 321.*]

13. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS—CONTRACT WITH WATER COMPANY — LIABILITY FOR FIRE LOSSES.

A contract of a water company did not directly undertake to respond to individuals for fire losses, though it stipulated to keep a sufficient water supply for the protection of public and private property, and its compensation as provided therein was entirely inadequate to meet the payment of such losses. Besides this, it provided for a forfeiture of its franchise for failure to perform its duties, except in a case of temporary failure due to casualty, and for failure to keep the hydrants in repair a forfeiture of $10 per month for each hydrant was provided. Held, that its obligations were limited by the contract, and did not contemplate payment for such losses in case of its negligence.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Kershaw County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Anna Calhoun Ancrum against the Camden Water, Light & Ice Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Kirkland & Smith, for appellant. W. B. De Loach, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendant, Camden Water, Light & Ice Company, appeals from an order of the circuit court overruling a demurrer to the complaint. The question to be decided is whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. These are the material allegations: The defendant owns and operates waterworks in the city of Camden, under a contract of date 21st May, 1903, entered into by the city council and the defendant with proper legal sanctions, which conferred upon the defendant the exclusive franchise for 17 years to furnish to the city of Camden water for the extinguishment of fires and other municipal purposes, and to the inhabitants of the city water for private purposes. On 27th June, 1907, a four-story building of the plaintiff was destroyed by a fire, which would have been extinguished without great damage by the fire department of the city, but for the fact that, on account of the negligence of the defendant the water mains and hydrants through which the defendant had contracted to supply water for the extinguishment of fires furnished no appreciable water pressure. The plaintiff had insurance for $3,000, but her net loss from the fire was $12,000, and for this sum she demands judgment against the water company.

The important inquiry whether the defendant is liable to a private citizen under such a state of facts depends, as we shall endeavor to show, on the terms of the contract, which is attached to the complaint as a part thereof. Hence it is necessary to set out in full such portions as bear on the issue. The general undertaking of the defendants, as set out in section 1, is "to lay, maintain, and operate a system of water pipes in, over, across, and along the streets, alleys, and public places of and within said city of Camden, for the distribution of water for municipal, domestic, business, and personal uses, and likewise, for the same period, to build, lay, place, operate, and maintain all necessary hydrants, service pipes, stop and valve boxes, and other appliances usually employed in the operation of a municipal waterworks system." The details of the defendant's obligations are contained in these sections:

"(3) That it will use the Johnson Springs, so called, near said city, as its source of supply, and that it will furnish from said source, and from other such sources as may be hereafter agreed upon, to the party of the first part and its successors, and to the inhabitants of the said city of Camden, an abundant and sufficient supply of pure, wholesome and potable water for domestic, business, personal, and municipal purposes, and for the extinguishing of fires, for and during the full time of this contract.

"(4) That it will cause to be constructed as a part of said water system a Jewell gravity filter of five hundred thousand (500,000) gallons daily capacity, and will cause all water introduced into the pipes and distributing system of and within said city to be carefully filtered through said filtering apparatus, and further, and in connection with said filter, will construct a pumping reservoir, with brick walls and metal roof, and of sufficient size to provide a constant supply of water to the pumps, together with a pumping station to be supplied with duplicate engines so arranged that either or both engines may be employed at the same time as occasion may require, and said engines and pumps to be of sufficient capacity to furnish an ample supply of water for the purpose hereinbefore indicated at all times during the term of this franchise. And said plant shall be constructed according to the plans and specifications hereto attached and made a part of this contract. * * *

"(7) * * * That all pipe, hydrants, and connections shall be of standard weight; that there shall be furnished by said party of the second part to the party of the first part a certificate of manufacturers of said pipe and appliances, showing that the same have been tested at a hydrostatic pressure of 250 pounds to the square inch; that, in addition to the twenty-five (25) fire hydrants now set and connected with the pipe system in said city of Camden, the party of the second part shall set ten (10) other fire hydrants of modern type, with double delivery, so arranged as to connect with hose couplings of two and one-half (2½) inches in diameter. * * *

"(9) That the fire hydrants above referred to shall be kept at all times in good repair and ready for immediate service, and so that, when an alarm is given and fire pressure is called for, said hydrants shall furnish efficient streams for extinguishing fires in all portions of said city."

These provisions are found in the contract to secure to the city of Camden, as a party to the contract, compliance by the water company with its obligations:

"(10) That the hydrants shall be in charge of the chief of the fire department, and shall be subject to inspection by him, and in case of any hydrant being found out of repair he shall, in writing, notify the mayor of said city and the superintendent of the waterworks plant; and if the same is not carefully repaired in one week after giving such notice in writing, the city shall have the right to deduct from the hydrant rent, all hereinafter agreed to be paid, the sum of ten (10) dollars per month until said hydrant is put in working order. * * *

"(20) The party of the first part, and all users of water under this franchise, shall have the right to inspect the source of supply and all machinery and other appliances employed by the party of the second part in connection with the filtration, storage, pumping, and distribution of water at all times during ordinary business hours; such inspection to be made in good faith, and not for the purpose of harassing or annoying the party of the second part, or in any wise interfering with the performance by it of its public duties under this franchise. * * *

"(25) And it is further expressly stipulated and agreed that, in the event that the party of the second part, its successors or assigns, shall willfully fail, neglect, or refuse to well and truly carry out and perform all and singular the duties, agreements, and covenants hereby imposed, then and in such event this franchise and contract and all rights and privileges granted thereby by said first party to the second party shall cease and determine, and be thereafter held and deemed to be null and void, anything herein to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, however, that temporary failure to furnish water and service under this coutract, due to breakage or other casualty, shall not be deemed to be a failure or refusal on the part of the second party hereunder."

In Black v. Columbia, 19 S. C. 424, 45 Am. Rep. 785, a municipal corporation owning its own waterworks was held not to be liable to an inhabitant of the city, whose property was destroyed by fire, when it would have been saved, but for the neglect of the city to provide suitable engines or fire apparatus, or to provide and keep in repair public cisterns. Since that case was decided municipal corporations have in this state by statute been made liable for injuries to persons or property received "through a defect in any street causeway, bridge or public way, or by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation within the municipal limits." Civ. Code 1902, § 2023. We are not now concerned with the liability of a city for a fire loss of one of its inhabitants, which would not have occurred, but for the negligence of the city to provide an adequate supply of water to extinguish the fire. This liability would have to be passed upon as a preliminary question in the case, if the law imposed upon a city the duty of providing public waterworks; for it seems apparent, where a public duty is required of a municipality, one who contracts with a city to perform for it the duty imposed on it by law incurs the same liabilities that the law imposes on the city itself. But the statute law of the state does not require municipal corporations to maintain waterworks. On the contrary, the statutes on the subject negative the idea of command or requirement, in that they in express terms merely authorize towns and cities to build and operate waterworks as municipal property. 22 St. at Large, p. 83; 23 St. at Large, p. 49. Hence, when the statute of 1902 (23 St. at Large, p. 1039) "empowered cities and towns to grant to private persons or corporations the exclusive franchise of furnishing light and water to said cities and towns and inhabitants thereof," without imposing any limitations on the power, except that the franchises, to be valid, should be approved by a vote of two-thirds of the board of aldermen and a majority of the popular vote, and that the grant or the franchise should provide a maximum water rate, it left the municipality free as to the other terms and conditions of the franchise. Thus there was no obstacle to the city council providing, in the contract and franchise with the water company, any safeguards for the welfare of the city or its inhabitants, who were to use the water, or whose property was to be protected from fire loss; for, even if it be considered an illegal or unfair discrimination against other taxpayers for the city to pay from the general municipal revenue for such indemnity for all whose property was subject to fire loss, such discrimination could not avail the water company. Equally free were the city and water company to agree on such sanctions and penalties as they saw fit for the enforcement of the obligations assumed by the water company. Further, the city as a municipality and any of its inhabitants, beneficiaries of the contract, on the one side, and the water company, on the other side, were entitled to such damages resulting to them from a breach of the contract as were fairly within the contemplation of the parties, either expressly provided by the language of the instrument or to be fairly implied from it.

These propositions are nothing more than the application of familiar principles of law to the contract under consideration. But, inasmuch as some of the cases deny the right of the individual citizen to recover in a case like this, on the ground that there is not such privity of contract between a citizen and a water company as to enable him to bring an action on his own behalf, some further attention should be given to that point. We think it is true that the city does not make the contract as the agent of the individual citizen, and that no right of action could accrue to the citizen on the ground that the city as his agent makes the contract for him as its principal. That relation does not exist. The relation of agency implies a principal, controlling the action of an agent within the scope of the agency. The municipality is not subject to the control of an individual citizen, or of a majority of its citizens, or even of the whole body of its citizens, speaking unanimously, except in so far as such control is conferred by statute. A municipal corporation is defined to be: "A legal institution, formed by charter from sovereign power, erecting a populous community of prescribed area into a body politic and corporate, with corporate name and continuous succession, and for the purpose and with the authority of subordinate self-government and improvement and local administration of affairs of state." 28 Cyc. 117. The inhabitants of a city have no inherent right to direct its affairs. All their rights are conferred on them by the lawmaking power of the state. The General Assembly has made any contract for a municipal water supply invalid unless confirmed by a vote of two-thirds of the qualified electors of the city; but that does not make a city the agent of a single elector, or of the aggregate two-thirds of the electors. In short, the municipality is not in any legal sense the agent of its inhabitants, either singly or collectively, but is a legal institution in the nature of a governmental agency deriving its powers from the state. For these reasons, we are entirely unable to agree with those courts which hold the water company liable in a case like this on the ground that in contracting with the city it contracted with the individual through the city as his agent.

But the relationship of agency is not necessary to confer on the individual citizen the legal right to benefits provided for him by the city in its contract with a water company. The English rule is that a third person cannot sue upon a promise made for his benefit, where he is a stranger both to the promise and to the consideration. Baxter v. Camp, 71 Conn. 245, 41 Atl. 803, 42 L. R. A. 514, 71 Am. St. Rep. 176, note; 9 Cyc. 374. This rule has been adopted in a number of the states, with a modification that such third person may sue, if he has some legal or equitable interest in the contract. If the English doctrine, or that doctrine modified as above indicated, should be applied, even then an inhabitant of the city, made the beneficiary, as one of a class, of a contract by the city with a water company, would fall within it; for such inhabitant by his taxes contributes to the consideration of the contract, and as an inhabitant he has a vital interest in its performance. But the rule in this state and some of the other states is broad, and without the limitations of the English rule, either in the original or modified form. It is thus stated in Brown v. O'Bryan, 1 Rich. Law, 270, 44 Am. Dec. 254: "Where one person makes a promise for the benefit of a third person, that person may maintain an action on such promise." Duncan v. Moon, Dud. 332. Having reached the conclusion that the city of Camden could contract with the defendants that it would be liable to its inhabitants, as individuals, for fire losses due to the defendant's neglect to keep an adequate water supply, and that the plaintiff could sue on such a contract, the pivotal question recurs whether the city of Camden did make a contract imposing that liability on the water company.

In the first place, it is to be observed that the presumption is that parties contract for their own benefit, and not for that of others not parties to the contract. So a contract entered into by a city is presumed to be for the city's own benefit as a municipality; that is, for the benefit for the municipal public as a whole, and not for the benefit of its inhabitants as individuals. Hence, in order for the plaintiff to have the benefit of the contract, it is not sufficient for her to show that the defendant contracted with the city to have an adequate supply of water to extinguish fires; but she must show, further, that it was intended that she should be the direct beneficiary of this provision to the extent that the defendant should indemnify her for fire losses due to its negligence. There will hardly be difference of opinion that there are many public municipal purposes to be obtained by contract of this sort, leaving out of view the citizen as an individual. The general municipal purpose of a water supply is to promote the prosperity of a city. This it does by lessening the risk of destruction of property by fire, by lowering the rate of insurance, increasing the general sense of security, and, therefore, the general happiness, diminishing the risk of numbers of persons being thrown out of employment, and generally in giving steadiness and confidence to the life and enterprise of a city. These are the inducements to a city for entering into the contract, and it is for these municipal purposes that it pays for the maintenance of waterworks for fire protection. For the attainment of these municipal ends the city had a right to pay out public funds. It may well be doubted whether it has the right to apply the public funds to a larger compensation, which a water company of necessity must charge for the enormous peril of having to pay for all private property lost by its negligence. Such expenditure of municipal funds raised by taxation of all property would be an unjust discrimination in favor of those whose property is exposed to fire loss, and against those whose property is not subject to that peril.

There is at least a strong presumption against a municipality undertaking to pay for such indemnity from the public revenue. True, the water company would be liable only for losses due to its negligence; but negligence would be chargeable to the company for its inspector of machinery to overlook a defect which he ought to have observed in time to remedy it; for a pumper to fail in his duty; for an employé carelessly to break a main, so that the water would be wasted; for the company not to have adequate machinery; in brief, for it to fail, in the opinion of a jury, to be diligent in any of the almost innumerable details incident to the conduct of such a business. In addition to this, it is considered, as is held in some jurisdictions, that the action for loss in cases like this is an action of tort. Then for their fire losses the insurance companies would be subrogated to the rights of the owners of the property, and entitled to recover from the water company. Mobile Insurance Co. v. Columbia, etc., R. R. Co., 41 S. C. 403, 19 S. E. 858, 44 Am. St. Rep. 731, note; Ætna Insurance Co. v. C. & W. C. Ry. Co., 76 S. C. 101, 56 S. E. 788; American Bonding Co. v. Nat., etc., Bank, 97 Md. 598, 55 Atl. 395, 99 Am. St. Rep. 504, note. That a water company, assuming such liabilities, would have to demand very large compensation to have any profit, or even to save itself from bankruptcy, is most obvious. When it is asserted that a city has undertaken to pay for such indemnity to its individual inhabitants, and that the water company has assumed it, the contract relied on ought to show clearly that such payment by the city and indemnity by the water company were intended. The contract now under consideration contains no direct undertaking to respond to the individual inhabitant for fire loss. The stipulation that it shall keep a sufficient water supply for the protection of public and private property is naturally to be referred to the purpose of the city to promote the general municipal welfare we have pointed out, rather than to indemnify individual property owners from fire loss. The compensation to be paid is $50 each for 70 hydrants, a sum on its face utterly inadequate to meet the expense for furnishing the water and to afford compensation for the enormous risk the plaintiff insists was assumed. These considerations seem to show plainly that the parties did not contemplate by their contract the assumption of liabilities by the water company for the plaintiff's fire losses arising from its neglect to furnish an adequate water pressure.

There is another strong reason for this conclusion. When parties themselves stipulate in the contract what shall be the consequences of a breach of the agreement, such stipulation, if reasonable, is controlling, and excludes other consequences. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. 686; Allen v. Brazier, 2 Bailey, 293; Covington v. Ex. of Lide, 1 Bay, 158; Worrell v. McClintagh, 5 Strob. 115; Williams v. Vance, 9 S. C. 344, 30 Am. Rep. 26; Terry v. So. Ry. Co., 81 S. C. 279, 62 S. E. 249. In this case the parties agreed by the contract that the consequences to the water company for a neglect to perform any of the duties undertaken by it should be a forfeiture of its franchise, except "that temporary failure to furnish water and service under this contract, due to breakage or other casualty shall not be deemed to be failure or refusal on the part of the second party hereunder." For the temporary failure to keep the hydrants in repair a forfeiture of $10 a month for each hydrant was promised. Thus the contract fixed and limited the consequences of the defendant's breach, and the court cannot add to the contract by imposing other and additional consequences.

Authorities holding the plaintiff entitled to recover in a case such as is stated in the complaint lay much stress on the fact that the defendant is a public service corporation. While this is true, it is obvious the water company's status as a public service corporation rests on the contract, and liability for damage cannot be imposed on it beyond that contemplated by the contract. Hughes v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 516, 52 S. E. 107; Poteet v. Telegraph Co., 74 S. C. 491, 55 S. E. 113. Even a common carrier of goods is not liable beyond that. When a carrier accepts goods for transportation, it contracts to be liable for the value of the goods. But it is not liable for anything else, unless such additional liabilities are within the purview of the contract of carriage. McKerall v. Railroad Co., 76 S. C. 342, 56 S. E. 965; Strange v. Railroad Co., 77 S. C. 182, 57 S. E. 724, and cases cited. And the carrier may limit the amount for which it may be liable by special contract to that effect. Johnstone v. Railroad Co., 39 S. C. 56, 17 S. E. 512; Frasier v. Railroad Co., 73 S. C. 140, 52 S. E. 964. We conclude that the obligations and liabilities of the parties are limited by the contract, and that the defendant did not contract to pay the losses of all the citizens of the city of Camden by fires which would have been extinguished if it had not neglected to comply with the contract.

The cases in other jurisdictions are irreconcilable; but the conclusion we have reached is in accord with the great weight of authority. A number of courts of last resort, including the Supreme Court of the United States, hold contrary to our conclusion that in a case of this kind the water company is liable. We cite only one case from each state. Trust Co. v. Fisher, 200 U. S. 59, 26 Sup. Ct. 186, 50 L. Ed. 367; Gorrell v. Greensboro Water Co., 124 N. C. 328, 32 S. E. 720, 46 L. R. A. 513, 70 Am. St. Rep. 598; Mugge v. Tampa Waterworks Co., 52 Fla. 371, 42 South. 81, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171, 120 Am. St. Rep. 207; Coy v. Ind. Depot, 146 Ind. 655, 46 N. E. 17, 36 L. R. A. 535; Lex. Hyd. Co. v. Oots, 119 Ky. 598, 84 S. W. 774, 86 S. W. 684.

But the great majority of the courts hold in such cases there is no liability. Bush v. Art Co., 4 Idaho, 618, 43 Pac. 69, 95 Am. St. Rep. 161; Fowler v. Athens City W. W. Co., 83 Ga. 219, 9 S. COOKE v. PARIS MOUNTAIN WATER CO.
et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—MUNICIPAL WATERWORKS — CONTRACT WITH WATER COMPANY — LIABILITY FOR FIRE LOSSES.

A water company's contract with a municipality, containing a general stipulation to furnish an adequate supply of water to extinguish fires, does not render it liable to a private owner of property for fire losses due to its negligent failure to provide pressure sufficient to extinguish a fire.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 301; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. O. Klugh, Judge.

Action by C. E. Cooke against the Paris Mountain Water Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for appellants.
J. J. McSwain, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This is an appeal from an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint. The contract of the defendant with the city of Greenville is not in the record, while in the very similar case of Ancrum v. Camden Water, Light & Ice Co., 64 S. E. 151, the contract of the water company was set out as a part of the complaint. The complaint in this case, however, rests on the proposition that a contract of a water company with a municipality, containing a general stipulation that it would furnish an adequate supply of water for the extinguishment of fires, carries with such stipulation liability to a private owner of property for fire losses which would have been prevented if the defendant had not negligently failed to provide water pressure sufficient to extinguish the fire. The case of Ancrum v. Camden Water, Light & Ice Co. holds that the contract does not cover such liability, and that the plaintiff cannot recover.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed.

BERLEY v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 285*)—INJURIES—ACTIONS — JURY QUESTIONS — CAUSE OF ACCIDENT.

In a lineman's action for injuries by the breaking of a telegraph pole while he was on it, whether the pole broke on account of a defect therein, and not from the negligence of fellow servants, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1016; Dec. Dig. § 285.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 284*)—ACTIONS—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Allegations of negligence in furnishing a defective pole were sufficiently sustained by evidence that the pole on which a lineman was working broke while the wires were being stretched in the usual way because the pole was rotten near the ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 872; Dec. Dig. § 264.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

The question of assumption of risk is for the jury unless the testimony is susceptible of no other reasonable inference than that plaintiff assumed the risk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1068; Dec. Dig. § 288.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—ACTIONS—JURY QUESTION — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The question of contributory negligence is for the jury, unless the testimony is susceptible of no other reasonable inference than that the servant was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1089; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*) — ACTIONS — JURY QUESTION — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In a lineman's action for injuries from falling from a telegraph pole while wires were being strung thereon, whether plaintiff negligently climbed the pole while the wires were being strung, in violation of the company's rules, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1127; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURIES—JURY QUESTION—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

In a lineman's action for injuries by falling from a telegraph pole which broke while he was working thereon, whether plaintiff went into a place of obvious danger with knowledge of the defect in the pole, so as to assume the risk of working thereon, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1072; Dec. Dig. § 288.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 294*) — TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS — NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT.

In a lineman's action for injuries by the breaking of a telegraph pole while he was on it, a requested instruction that, if the pole he was climbing fell because of a strain put upon it by other employes pulling a wire attached to the pole, plaintiff was the fellow servant of such employes, and could not recover, was properly refused as denying a recovery if the jury found that the pole broke because of defects therein while the other employes were using due care in stretching the wire, or if the injury resulted from the combined negligence of the master and the other employes, the evidence raising those issues.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1162; Dec. Dig. § 294.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 227*)—INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If a pole which a lineman was climbing fell because of the strain put upon it by other employes in stretching a wire attached to it, and the lineman was negligent in remaining on the pole while the wire was being stretched, he could not recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 668; Dec. Dig. § 227.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 177*)—INJURIES—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANT—MASTER'S LIABILITY.

If a lineman was injured by the breaking of a telegraph pole while he was working thereon, caused by the negligence of fellow servants stretching a wire attached to the pole, he could not recover for such injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 352; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

10. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 155*) — DUTY TO WARN — HIDDEN DANGERS — MASTER'S KNOWLEDGE.

A master is only bound to point out hidden dangers at the place of work or machinery if he knows of such dangers, or could have known thereof by exercising ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 310; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

11. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 101*)—MASTER'S LIABILITY—LIABILITY AS INSURER.

A master is not liable as an insurer, but only for negligence in the performance of a duty he owes to the servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 172; Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

12. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION OF CHARGE AS A WHOLE.

In a lineman's action for injuries by the fall of a telegraph pole on which he was working, alleged to have been caused by the master's failure to furnish a pole sufficient to bear the weight of one working on it, the court's charge as a whole impressed upon the jury that no recovery could be had unless the master was negligent in failing to provide a reasonably safe place of work, and, in charging upon the master's duty generally, stated that it was his duty to point out hidden dangers to a servant without adding the qualification that such danger must have been known to the master, or such as he could have known by exercising ordinary care. There was no request to modify the charge by adding the qualification stated. Held, in view of the whole charge, that the jury could not have understood that it was the absolute duty of the master to warn servants of hidden dangers, whether or not he knew of them, there being really no issue requiring greater particularities of statement, as the negligence alleged was not the master's failure to warn of hidden dangers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 704; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, Richland County; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Samuel Berley against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nelson & Nelson, for appellant. Frank G. Tompkins, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant for $1,000 in this action for damages for personal injuries resulting from the falling of a defective pole, which cast him to the ground, while employed as a lineman on one of defendant's telegraph lines near Martinsville, Va. The act of negligence alleged in the complaint is that the defendant failed to provide plaintiff a safe place to work; "the said pole on which he was required to work being decayed and incapable of sustaining the weight of a man working thereon." Defendant, in addition to a general denial, pleaded assumption of risk and contributory negligence. Plaintiff was engaged with a gang of employes of defendant, under the direction of M. V. Lemmond, foreman, in stringing an additional wire on defendant's telegraph line between Leaksville Station, Va., and Stewart, Va., and at the time of the accident had gone over a distance of about 28 miles of said line. On the day of the accident, and for several days previous thereto, it was plaintiff's duty to climb poles, nail on brackets, and fasten the wire thereto after it had been pulled tight by two men on the ground at the next pole with a block and tackle. On this occasion plaintiff climbed the pole carrying up with him the bracket and wire, nailed on the bracket, laid the wire thereon loosely, and descended to the ground, while the other employes were waiting for water, and, when they were ready to pull the wire tight by means of the block and tackle, he went back up the pole for the purpose of fastening the wire. When he was near the top of the pole while the wire was being stretched, the pole broke off at or near the ground, and he was precipitated therefrom into the railroad cut, falling on the cross-ties, sustaining the injuries complained of. At the close of plaintiff's testimony a motion for nonsuit was made on the grounds (1) that the evidence conclusively showed that the injury was not the proximate result of any negligence of defendant, but of the acts of fellow servants or the acts of plaintiff and fellow servants combined; (2) that the injury was within the risks of employment assumed by plaintiff. After verdict a motion for new trial was made on the grounds (1) that the injuries were due to the acts and negligence of fellow servants; (2) that the injuries were not the result of any act of negligence alleged in the complaint. The motions were overruled, and the first and second exceptions assign error.

We find no error. The testimony is practically undisputed that the pole was worm-eaten and rotten at or near the ground, and that it broke and fell while plaintiff was on it at work, when subject to the stretching of the wire in the usual and ordinary manner. There was no testimony that the fellow servants stretched the wire in a negligent manner and that such negligence broke the pole under the ordinary strain involved in the mere stretching of the wire. A natural inference from the testimony is that but for the defect in the pole the usual stretching of the wire would not have broken it. Hence it cannot be said as a matter of law that plaintiff was injured by the acts or negligence of fellow servants, and that the defective pole was not a proximate cause of the injury.

The specific act of negligence alleged—a defective pole incapable of sustaining the weight of a man working thereon—was sufficient to cover the case made by the testimony, which was a defective pole which broke while plaintiff was working thereon in the line of his employment while the wire was being stretched in the usual way. It is argued that the pole was shown to be sufficient to sustain the weight of plaintiff while going up and down it and placing the bracket thereon, and that it was not plaintiff's duty to remain on the pole during the process of stretching the wire, but there was testimony that it was the duty of plaintiff to be on the pole to guide the wire while being stretched, and to fasten it when sufficiently taut. Whenever the testimony is such as to raise a question or issue of assumption of risk or contributory negligence, such issue should be submitted to the jury, and it is the province of the court to decide such matters only when the testimony is susceptible of no other reasonable inference than that plaintiff assumed the risk or negligently contributed to his injury. We think the testimony does not conclusively show either of these defenses. It appears that a rule of defendant required that "poles must not be climbed without being tested, and, if they are weak, assistance must be summoned to hold them while being worked upon." For this purpose the defendant supplied pike poles and guy ropes. For defendant it was testified that this rule was read to and was known by plaintiff, but he testified he was not aware of the rule. He had been working at this particular part of the work but a few days. It further appeared that the usual test to ascertain whether the pole was safe was to shake it, and, if the pole was deemed unsafe, the climber should call to his assistance any members of the gang, who, with the pike poles and guy ropes, should support the post for the climber. If the pole was found much decayed near the ground, it was the duty of the employes to cut down the pole, cut off the decayed end, and reset the pole before the climber ascended it. This had been done in only three instances on the line of 28 miles, and plaintiff testified that he had not seen a pole so reset. The plaintiff, however, testified that, before climbing the pole, he looked at it to see if it was rotten, and pushed it, and could find no fault. This testimony was sufficient at least to raise an issue whether plaintiff had knowingly or negligently breached any rule of the company designed and promulgated for his safety, or had negligently climbed the pole under the circumstances, or had gone into a place of obvious danger, or, with knowledge of the defective condition of the pole, had voluntarily assumed the risk of working upon it.

The third exception assigns error in refusing to charge defendant's twelfth request, as follows: "If you find from the testimony that at the time of the accident and alleged injuries the plaintiff, Samuel Berley, was one of a gang engaged in repairing the line, and the pole he was climbing fell on account of the strain put upon it by reason of the other employes in the same gang with plaintiff pulling a wire attached to said pole while plaintiff was upon said pole, I charge you that the plaintiff and other employes in said gang were fellow servants, and plaintiff cannot recover." The request was properly refused because it was faulty in denying plaintiff a right to recover should the jury take the view that the pole was so defective that it broke while the fellow servants were stretching the wire with due care, or should the jury take the view that the injury was the result of the combined negligence of the master and fellow servants. The law was correctly given to the jury in charging defendant's tenth request, as follows: "If you find from the testimony that at the time of the accident and alleged injuries the plaintiff, Samuel Berley, was one of a gang engaged in repairing the line of defendant and in stringing an additional wire along said line, and that the pole he was climbing fell by reason of the strain put upon it by the other members of said gang stretching a wire attached to said pole, and that plaintiff was negligent in remaining upon said pole while said wire was being stretched, or the other members of said gang were negligent in stretching said wire while plaintiff was upon said pole, in either event the plaintiff cannot recover, if such negligence contributed to his injury as a proximate cause thereof."

The fourth exception alleges error in instructing the jury that it is the duty of the master to point out to the servant hidden dangers in the place or machinery, without adding as a qualification, if such hidden dangers are known to the master, or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care. A full and accurate statement of the law governing the duty of the master to warn the servant of the hidden dangers would involve the qualification mentioned, as the master is not liable as an insurer but for negligence in the performance of a duty to a servant. But, in view of the whole charge, we cannot think the jury was misled into believing that it was the absolute duty of the master to warn the servant of hidden dangers, even though the master did not know or could not with reasonable diligence have known of such danger. The charge as a whole impressed it upon the jury that no recovery could be had unless the defendant was negligent in failing to provide a reasonably safe place. The specific charge complained of was only intended to be a general statement of the master's duty, and there was no request for a modification in the particular mentioned, and really no issue requiring greater particularity of statement, as the complaint is not based upon negligence of the master in failing to warn of hidden dangers.

The fifth and sixth exception alleges error in modifying defendant's first request to charge, which was as follows: "The general rule resulting from considerations of justice and policy is that he who engages in the employment of another for the performance of specified duties and services for compensation takes upon himself the natural and ordinary risks and perils incident to the performance of such services, not only so far as they were known to him, but also so far as they could have been known to him by the exercise of ordinary care upon his part; and, if you believe from the evidence that whatever injuries the plaintiff sustained were the result of such a risk or peril, the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for the defendant." Responding to the request, the court said: "That is a true proposition of law. In other words, that the servant assumes all the risks that are necessarily incident to the employment, that is, he assumes the danger ordinarily incident to climbing a pole; but I take it that would be one of the dangers incident to climbing a sound pole. * * * So with a pole the master is called upon to furnish, if he furnishes a pole upon which he desires his wires to be strung, and he furnishes a pole not strong enough to support not only the weight of the servant while engaged in the employment, but whatever was necessary to enable him to properly perform his duty, and it breaks under those circumstances without negligence on the part of the servant, the master would be liable." The contention is, the first modification precluded the jury from considering whether or not the falling of decayed poles was one of the risks assumed by plaintiff under his employment in so far as said risks were known or could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care on his part. This objection cannot be sustained. The court especially covered this point by instructing the jury in accordance with defendant's second, sixth, and seventh requests. It is further contended that the second modification was erroneous, as the complaint only alleged that the pole on which the plaintiff was required to work was decayed and incapable of supporting the weight of a man working thereon, and there was no testimony tending to show that it was necessary for plaintiff to remain upon the pole while the wires were being stretched. This objection is not well taken. We have already stated that there was testimony tending to show that it was usual and proper for plaintiff to be upon the pole while the wire was being stretched for the purpose of guiding and fastening the wire.

The remaining exception presents no material matter not considered and disposed of already.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Where a mortgagee who made an invalid foreclosure sale took a deed from the purchaser, paying him what he had paid at the sale, and thereafter, while in possession, deeded to a purchaser, who took the land under the bona fide belief that the mortgagee had a good title, such purchaser is entitled to subrogation to the mortgage, or an equitable assignment of the mortgage to the amount of the money paid by him and interest thereon.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Clarendon County; R. W. Memminger, Judge. Action by Samuel W. Griffin against Joseph D. Griffin and others for subrogation and other relief. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified.

Johnson S. Wilson and Charlton Durant, for appellants. Joseph F. Rhame and W. C. Davis, for respondent.

WOODS, J. Two opinions have already been rendered in this cause on demurrers to the complaint. 70 S. C. 220, 49 S. E. 561; 75 S. C. 249, 55 S. E. 317, 117 Am. St. Rep. 899. The judgment of the circuit court overruling the demurrer to the amended complaint having been affirmed by this court, the cause was heard by Judge Memminger on the evidence taken by a referee. The defendant Joseph D. Griffin appeals from the judgment of the circuit court on the questions of subrogation and the accounting by the plaintiff for rents as a mortgagee and cotenant in possession.

These are the material facts bearing on the subject of subrogation: Joseph D. Griffin executed to Moses Levi on January 19, 1883, a mortgage to secure the sum of $2,585. The property described in the mortgage was six-elevenths of a tract of land containing 183 acres. Under the power contained in the mortgage Moses Levi on February 4, 1884, undertook to sell the property at public auction and to execute to Ferdinand Levi, the highest bidder at the sale, a deed of conveyance for the consideration of $650 as expressed in the deed. On February 14, 1884, Ferdinand Levi conveyed his interest to Moses Levi for the same consideration. Thereafter, on July 16, 1891, Moses Levi conveyed to the plaintiff, Samuel W. Griffin, his right, title and interest in the land, consisting of "eight interests," as the deed states. The consideration expressed in this deed was $1,000. The plaintiff made the purchase, and took the deed under the bona fide belief that he was receiving a good title. The plaintiff alleges that, under these facts, he is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee, Moses Levi, to the extent of the $1,000, the purchase money mentioned in the deed from Moses Levi to him, and asks for a foreclosure in his favor of the mortgage to that amount, with interest. The circuit judge decreed on the authority of Givins v. Carroll, 40 S. C. 413, 18 S. E. 1030, 42 Am. St. Rep. 889, that the measure of the right of subrogation was not the purchase money paid for the mortgaged land by the plaintiff to Moses Levi, but the bid of Ferdinand Levi of $650 at the auction sale made by Moses Levi, and mentioned as the consideration of the invalid deed which Moses Levi undertook to make to Ferdinand Levi. Subrogation being a pure equity depending on the facts of each case, it is impossible to lay down any rule that will meet the justice of all the varying conditions presented in cases similar to each other. This case differs from Givins v. Carroll in one important particular. In that case Weathersbee was the mortgagee, Lard was the mortgagor, Birt was the purchaser at the invalid sale made by the mortgagee, and Carroll was the purchaser from the master, under proceedings instituted for the partition of the lands of the estate of Birt. The court held that, as Birt had paid only $700 to the mortgagee at the invalid sale, he and those claiming under him alone could be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee only to the extent of the $700 received by the mortgagee from him. This sum of $700 being all that the mortgagee received, that was held to be the extent to which he was required to surrender his mortgage for the benefit of the purchaser. This case would be identical with Carroll v. Givins if Ferdinand Levi, who bought the land at the invalid sale, had conveyed to the plaintiff. But, on the contrary, Moses Levi, the mortgagee himself, conveyed to the plaintiff, and, when he made the conveyance, he had satisfied any equity that Ferdinand Levi had by taking a deed of the land from him for precisely the same consideration that he had received from Ferdinand Levi. Thus Ferdinand received back any money he may have paid to the mortgagee, and could have no equity against him. Moses Levi, after he took the deed from Ferdinand Levi, paying the same consideration he had received, was a mortgagee, holding his original mortgage, owing no equity to any one, except an equity to the mortgagor that, when there should be a valid foreclosure sale, the mortgagor should have credit for at least $650 bid at the invalid sale, whether the land should bring that sum or not. The foundation of this equity of the mortgagor is that he was not responsible for the invalidity of the attempted sale under the mortgage; and it would not exist if the mortgagor himself had had the original sale set aside.

The inquiry, then, was: What was the equity of the plaintiff, who bought and took a deed from a mortgagee in possession under the bona fide belief that the mortgagee was the owner, and that he was receiving a good title? The answer cannot be other than that he is entitled to have from the mortgagee subrogation or an equitable assignment of the mortgage to the amount of the money paid by him and the interest thereon. This was the subrogation asked for by the plaintiff in his complaint. His right to it was settled by the former decree in this language: "It is not necessary to the plaintiff's right of subrogation to allege and prove that either Ferdinand Levi or Moses Levi honestly believed the sale to be valid and the title made under it good, for, the deeds being actually ineffectual to carry the title, the mortgage was not discharged by it, and when the plaintiff actually paid his money and took the deed from the mortgagee, not as a speculative volunteer, but in good faith, believing his title to be good, he was entitled to have from the mortgagee the benefit of the mortgage to the extent of the purchase money paid by him. On this point the case of Sims v. Steadman, 62 S. C. 300, 40 S. E. 677, is conclusive. The correlative equity of the mortgagor and those holding under him is to have credit on the mortgage debt for at least $650, the amount of the original bid, as the proceeds of the sale of the land, even if at the resale now demanded the land should bring less than that sum, for the reason that the mortgagor was in no way responsible for the failure to pass a good title by the deeds made under the former auction sale." It is true in the course of the discussion in Givins v. Carroll the court does say that the price paid at the invalid sale under the mortgage was an extinguishment of so much of the mortgage debt as was secured by the mortgage. But this proposition was not necessary to the decision of the case, and, after careful consideration, we think it unsound. The sale under the mortgage being invalid and not depriving the mortgagor of the land, it left the lien of the mortgage as to the mortgagor undisturbed. The mortgagor pays nothing and loses nothing. Hence there is no obstacle which the mortgagor can interpose to a valid foreclosure for the entire mortgage debt. Under the pleadings and facts of this case, when Moses Levi, who was in fact only a mortgagee, and not a holder of any title whatever, undertook as owner of the land to convey it to the plaintiff, then the plaintiff was entitled to be subrogated to the rights of Moses Levi as mortgagee to the extent of the purchase money paid by him to Moses Levi.

The next question is: What was the purchase money paid by the plaintiff? The consideration expressed in the deed is $1,000 for eight-elevenths of the land. The mortgage from Joseph D. Griffin called for six-elevenths of the land, but it turned out that he owned only five-elevenths. After the execution of the mortgage, Moses Levi acquired by purchase three-elevenths from other persons interested; and his deed to the plaintiff for these three shares was a good conveyance. Therefore the real sum to be regarded as received by Moses Levi as the consideration for the attempted conveyance of the mortgaged property, which was five-elevenths of the land, was five-eighths of $1,000. It follows that under his right of subrogation to the rights of Moses Levi, the mortgagee, the plaintiff was entitled to set up the mortgage against the defendants for the sum of $625, the purchase money. The defendants allege in their answer, however, that Moses Levi was in possession of the land from 1884 to 1891, and that the plaintiff has been in possession since that time, and that the amount of $625 due to the plaintiff under his right of subrogation must be credited with the rents for the entire period of the possession of Moses Levi and the plaintiff. In the circuit decree the plaintiff is charged with the rents received by Moses Levi, but nothing is charged against him for the time that he has himself occupied the land. As we understand, appellants' counsel in their argument do not contend that the plaintiff is chargeable with rents received by Moses Levi, but only with the rents and profits accruing while the plaintiff himself was in possession. The rents collected by Moses Levi were received by him before plaintiff had taken a deed from him, and Moses Levi, and not the plaintiff, was chargeable with these rents as credits on his mortgage. After allowing these credits, there was far more due on the mortgage than the sum of $625, the portion of the mortgage to which the plaintiff was entitled by subrogation. The plaintiff admits that he was in exclusive possession of 64 acres of the land from January, 1891, to February 4, 1907, when the land was divided between himself and the defendant Joseph D. Griffin. The remainder, 119 acres, had been set off to Emily Griffin as her dower, and was held by her until her death in 1895. From that time until the partition this 119 acres was in possession of William H. Griffin, R. M. Griffin, and Lawrence Griffin, none of whom had any interest in the land. It seems clear, therefore, that the plaintiff, Samuel W. Griffin, must account for defendant Joseph D. Griffin's share of the rents and profits of this 64 acres from the date of his possession in 1891 till the death of Emily Griffin in 1895. That is the limit of his accountability because after that date the 64 acres was less than his share of the land, and it was not chargeable to him that the defendant Joseph D. Griffin did not take possession of the remaining 119 acres or his full share thereof. Samuel W. Griffin, being a tenant in common, is not liable for rental value, but only for the profits made or rents actually received. But, in the absence of better evidence of actual profits or rents received, the rental value will be received as such evidence. The plaintiff testified the rental value was not over $100, while the defendant testified it was $250. Up to the time the plaintiff went into possession Moses Levi had been receiving $68 rent for eight-elevenths of the property which would be at the rate of $93.50 for the whole. Allowing for some increase in the value of the usufruct after the year 1891, it seems fair to take the average of these three figures, which would be $147.83, as the rental value of the whole land or $67.20 for five-elevenths. The record does not disclose any fairer method of arriving at the accountability of the plaintiff for the use of the defendant's portion of the land. There is no exception to the allowance of taxes paid by the plaintiff as an offset to the charges for the use of the land.

Under the principle and the conclusions announced, the account will stand thus:

Due by subrogation to the plaintiff January 17, 1891, five-eighths of $1,000	$ 625
Interest to January 1, 1892, at 7 per cent.	41 80
	<hr/>
Less five-elevenths of rents for that year	$ 666 80
Interest to January 1, 1893.....	$ 599 60

Less five-elevenths rents for that year	$ 614 57
	<hr/>
Interest to January 1, 1895.....	$ 547 37
	38 31
Less five-elevenths rents for that year	$ 585 68

Balance due January 1, 1895....	$ 518 48
Interest at 7 per cent. to October 1, 1907.....	462 69
Total	$ 981 17
Taxes and interest thereon as stated in circuit decree.....	132 82

The amount due, therefore, on October 1, 1907, is $1,113.99, instead of $2,028.15, and the judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be modified accordingly.

BOARD OF TP. COM'RS FOR SULLIVAN'S ISLAND v. BUCKLY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 25*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

The Supreme Court takes notice of the fact that the town of Moultrieville on Sullivan's Island was incorporated December 17, 1817 (8 St. at Large, p. 290), and that on February 17, 1906 (25 St. at Large, p. 280), the charter of the town and all acts amendatory thereof were repealed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 49*)—REPEAL OF MUNICIPAL CHARTERS—LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY.

The General Assembly may repeal the charter of a municipal corporation so far as the repeal affects merely the public governmental aspect of the municipality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 134; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 90*)—REPEAL OF MUNICIPAL CHARTERS—SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

Const. art. 3, § 34, forbidding special legislation to change the name of places or to amend or extend the charter of a town, does not prohibit the repeal of charters, and, as a general law cannot be enacted governing the repeal of town charters, the repeal of a particular charter must necessarily be special, so that subdivision 12 of the section requiring the enactment of general legislation has no application to the repeal of charters.

[Ed. Note.—For others cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 98-100; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 49*)—LEGISLATIVE CONTROL.

Where the charter of a town has been revoked by the Legislature, the territory and the inhabitants thereof must be subject to such government as the state under constitutional limitation may impose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

5. STATUTES (§ 90*)—LEGISLATIVE CONTROL—STATUTES.

Act Feb. 17, 1906 (25 St. at Large, p. 280), establishing a town government for the town of Sullivan's Island, is not invalid as special legislation under Const. art. 3, § 34, art. 7, § 11, authorizing the General Assembly to provide such a system of township government as it shall think proper, etc., and forbidding special legislation to amend or extend the charter of a town, since, in view of the fact that the land on the island is practically the property of the state, and the island is largely used as a summer resort only, the act, though special legislation, is valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 98-100; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—VALIDITY OF STATUTES—PRESUMPTIONS.

Every presumption must be indulged in favor of the validity of legislation, though the question is judicial, and not legislative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 46; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

7. TOWNS (§ 16*)—LEGISLATIVE CONTROL—LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

The principle of local self-government does not inhere in townships, and they have such local rights of government as the Legislature confers on them, and Act Feb. 17, 1906 (25 St. at Large, p. 280), establishing a township government, and providing that the Governor shall appoint a commission of five persons, three of whom shall be lot holders and two of whom shall be registered electors, which commission shall have charge of township affairs, is not invalid as violating the principle of local self-government.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; D. E. Hydrick, Judge.

Action by the Board of Township Commissioners for Sullivan's Island against B. Buckly. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lee Royal, for appellant. Burke, Rivers & Erckman, for respondent.

JONES, J. This is an action to enforce a license, and the appeal comes from an order of Judge Hydrick overruling a demurrer to the complaint; the ground of demurrer being that plaintiff had no legal capacity to sue. In this connection the complaint alleged: "That under and by virtue of an act of the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, entitled 'An act to establish a township government for the township of Sullivan's Island, in Charleston county, state of South Carolina,' as approved 17th day of February, 1906, the plaintiff was created a body politic and corporate with such rights and powers as are fairly and sufficiently set forth in said above entitled act, which act gives the said board of township commissioners the control and management of the affairs of the township of Sullivan's Island, S. C." Under this demurrer defendant seeks to raise the question that Act Feb. 17, 1906 (25 St. at Large, p. 280), is unconstitutional (1) because it provides for a board of five members, and requires only two of them to be registered electors of Sullivan's Island; (2) because it is special legislation to repeal the charter of the town of Moultrieville and place the government of the territory of Sullivan's Island, which embraces the territory of Moultrieville, under the board of township commissioners created by the act; (3) because it is special legislation in violation of article 3, § 34, subd. 1, Const., in that it changed the name of the town of Moultrieville, also in violation of article 3, § 34, subd. 3, in reference to changing, amending, or extending the charter of an incorporated town, also in violation of article 8, § 1, requiring general laws for the organization and classification of municipal corporations. We have not been called upon to consider whether such questions can be raised under demurrer for want of capacity to sue; on the contrary, respondent also desires the judgment of the court on the questions raised.

The court takes notice of the fact that the town of Moultrieville on Sullivan's Island was incorporated December 17, 1817 (8 St. at Large, p. 290), and that on February 17, 1906, the charter of said town and all acts amendatory thereto and all acts relating to the government thereof were repealed (25 St. at Large, p. 280). Sullivan's Island, except such portions as may have been ceded to the United States, is considered the property of the state, and has been devoted by the state for the purpose of a health resort. Previous to 1857 the occupants of lots on Sullivan's Island were mere tenants at will of the state, and in 1857 (12 St. at Large, p. 603) it was declared that the tenure of the owners of lots under the license to build should be tenants from year to year. Whetmore v. Rhett, 12 Rich. Law, 565. Under the original charter of 1817 the corporators were "all persons, citizens of the United States, now owning dwelling house on the said island, or who may hereafter own dwelling houses thereon, or occupying under lease during the season that people resort thither for health or safety a dwelling house," and "all free male white inhabitants of said island owning or renting dwelling houses thereon" were entitled to vote for intendant and five wardens. In 1873 (15 St. at Large, p. 446) the charter was amended, the corporators being "all persons citizens of the United States who now reside or may hereafter reside, or who may own buildings erected on any lot in the town of Moultrieville, Sullivan's Island," and those entitled to vote were "all male residents of the said town and all male owners of lots upon which buildings have been erected, citizens of the United States who have attained full age." It thus appears in the history of Moultrieville the state has sought to give lot owners a right to participate in the government of the town whether residents or not. After the adoption of the Constitution of 1895 and the legislation pursuant thereto regulating qualifications of electors, the government of the town of Moultrieville has been in the control of the resident qualified electors. In this situation the General Assembly deemed it advisable to establish a township government for Sullivan's Island as a part of the county of Charleston, and adopted the act in question. Section 1 of the act provides "that as soon as practicable and within thirty days after the approval of this act, the Governor shall appoint a commission to be composed of five persons, three of whom shall be lot holders and two of whom shall be registered electors on Sullivan's Island, which commission shall be known as the board of township commissioners for Sullivan's Island, and shall have charge of the township affairs of said township with the powers and duties hereinafter set forth." Commissioners appointed under this act have been in charge ever since. The right of the General Assembly to repeal the charter of a municipal corporation of the state cannot be questioned unless there is some constitutional inhibition. Meriwether v. Garrett, 102 U. S. 472, 26 L. Ed. 197; 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) par. 66; Cooley, Con. Lim. (5th Ed.) pp. 230, 231, 232. There is no restriction in the Constitution upon such repeals, certainly not so far as the repeal affects merely the public governmental aspect of the municipality, as in this case. The first and third subdivisions of article 3 of section 34, forbidding special legislation to change the name of places and to amend or extend the charter of a town, has no reference to repeals of charters, as is manifest by the terms of this section; nor could a general law be well enacted governing the repeal of town charters, since the repeal of a particular charter must necessarily be special, hence subdivision 12 of said section has no application as to repeals of charters.

The charter of Moultrieville having been revoked, the territory and inhabitants therein must necessarily be subject to such government as the state, under constitutional limitation, may impose. Is the act of February 17, 1906, void as special legislation? We think not. Section 11 of article 7 of the Constitution expressly declares that the "General Assembly may provide such system of township government as it shall think proper to any and all the counties, and may make special provision for municipal government and for the protection of chartered rights and powers of municipalities." Construing this provision in Grocery Co. v. Burnet, 61 S. C. 214, 39 S. E. 385, 58 L. R. A. 687, the court says: "This section was evidently framed in view of the provisions of article 3, § 34, and was intended to give the Legislature a wider latitude in the making of special provisions for county and township government." Then when we consider that the land on Sullivan's Island is practically the property of the state, and its use as a health resort during the summer and the custom of most lot owners, many of whom reside in the city and county of Charleston, not to occupy their premises during the winter, and yet having a very large interest in the government of the island, we cannot affirm that Sullivan's Island as a township of Charleston county is not in a class by itself and the subject of special legislation. The Legislature has declared that the act is advisable, and every presumption must be indulged in favor of the legislation, even if the question is judicial, and not legislative, a matter which the court has not finally settled. Bulst v. City Council, 77 S. C. 273, 57 S. E. 862.

With respect to the contention that the act is void because it requires the Governor to appoint a commission to be composed of five persons, three of whom shall be lot holders and two of whom shall be registered electors on Sullivan's Island, it is contended that the statute violates the principle of local self-government, and deprives the electors of Sullivan's Island from choosing their own officers; but the principle of local self-government does not inhere in townships. They have such local rights of government as the Legislature sees fit to confer upon them. We find nothing in the Constitution prohibiting the Legislature from ordaining for Sullivan's Island the particular system of government provided in the act.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Florence County; Charles G. Dantzler, Judge.

Action by M. W. Bardin and others against the Commercial Insurance & Trust Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Willcox & Willcox, for appellant. J. P. McNeill and S. W. G. Shipp, for respondents.

JONES, J. This action was to recover a tract of land in Florence county containing 231 acres. The answer, besides a general denial, pleads the statute of limitations, adverse possession, and presumption of a grant. At the close of plaintiffs' testimony defendant moved for a nonsuit on the grounds that there was no evidence of a grant or presumption of a grant from the state, and no testimony tending to show that plaintiffs and defendant claimed from a common source. This motion being overruled, defendant submitted no testimony, and the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiffs; and from the judgment thereon defendant appeals, renewing the question presented on the motion for nonsuit.

We think there was no error. There was testimony that S. S. A. Brooks in 1882 conveyed a 441-acre tract of land, which included the tract in question, to I. V. Bardin; that the tract in dispute was mostly woodland or bay land, the principal value of which was the timber; that it was known as the "Bardin land," and was used by Bardin for the purpose of getting wood, straw, and timber therefrom when needed; and that Bardin paid the taxes thereon until his death in 1897. His widow and children, the plaintiffs, continued in possession, using the land in the same way, or permitting their tenants to use the land for wood, straw, and timber, and the widow continued to pay the taxes thereon. This action was commenced on September 21, 1905, 23 years after the Bardins acquired color of title and possession. The possession of ancestor and heir may be tacked to show 20 years' possession so as to presume a grant, or 10 years' adverse possession so as to make out title by adverse possession, because there is no break in the continuity of possession. Duren v. Kee, 26 S. C. 219, 2 S. E. 4; Epperson v. Stansill, 64 S. C. 488, 42 S. E. 426; Kilgore v. Kirkland, 60 S. C. 85, 48 S. E. 44. The possession of the Bardins was adverse and continuous for more than 20 years; and, while the land in question was not cultivated or inclosed, it was used for the supply of fuel and timber, the ordinary uses for which such land was fitted. Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 103. The payment of taxes on the land for a number of years by the Bardins was also some evidence to be submitted to the jury on the ground whether the state had parted with title. Busby v. Railroad Co., 45 S. C. 313, 23 S. E. 50; Kolb v. Jones, 62 S. C. 195, 40 S. E. 168.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

JONES et al. v. PROVIDENT SAVINGS LIFE ASSUR. SOCIETY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 1, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1207*)—PROCEEDINGS AFTER REMAND—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

Plaintiffs sued a life insurance society to avoid an increase of premiums on a policy or for a rescission. Plaintiffs agreed to a continuance on condition that they should not be required to pay further premiums pending the suit. Judgment for plaintiffs was reversed, with directions to enter judgment for the society. Held that, on remand, the trial court properly allowed the society's motion for judgment, such agreement not entitling plaintiffs to a determination fixing a rule by which future assessments and dividend credits should be made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wake County; Lyon, Judge.

Action by W. O. Jones and others against the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 147 N. C. 540, 61 S. E. 388.

The plaintiffs, filing their complaint, alleged, in substance, that they were holders and beneficiaries of an insurance policy in defendant company, and that, by the terms of the policy, the premium payable thereon should never exceed the amount printed on the policy for the attained age of 65 years; that the holder, W. O. Jones, having attained and passed the said age, the defendant company had wrongfully assessed against him, and had compelled payment of premiums largely in excess of the amount demandable under the contract and policy to his damage.

The plaintiffs further allege that W. O. Jones was induced to enter into said contract by the false and fraudulent assurances on the part of defendant's general agent, that the premiums on the policy would never exceed the amount printed thereon for an attained age of 65; the specific relief demanded being set forth as follows:

"(1) That the said premiums be declared excessive, and that an account be taken of all sums paid on premiums since said plaintiff W. O. Jones attained the age of 65 in excess of the rate prescribed for that age on the back of the policy, and that the defendant be adjudged to pay the same to the plaintiffs, and that it be declared that all future premiums shall conform to the representations and agreements as aforesaid.

"(2) That, if this reasonable prayer be not granted, the entire amount of the premiums, with interest thereon, be paid the plaintiffs by the defendant, and said policy be rescinded."

Denial was made of these allegations, and, on issues submitted, the jury rendered the following verdict:

"(1) At the times alleged in the complaint was J. Sterling Jones the general agent of the defendant company? Answer. No.

"(2) Did the said J. Sterling Jones, as the general agent of the defendant company, induce the plaintiff, W. O. Jones, by false and fraudulent representations, to apply for insurance in the terms of the application, and to take out a policy of insurance from the defendant company, as alleged in the complaint, upon an understanding and agreement, made at and before the delivery of the policy, that the premium upon the said policy should never exceed the rate prescribed in a table on the back of the said policy for the age of 65? Answer. No.

"(3) Was the plaintiff W. O. Jones, by reason of said alleged false and fraudulent representations and agreements, induced to accept the said policy, and pay the premiums thereon, and was he thereby misled and prevented from examining and questioning the terms of the policy as so represented and agreed at and before the delivery of the policy and until he had attained the age of 67 years, and until the said premiums began to exceed the rate prescribed for the age of 65? Answer. No.

"(4) Was the said J. Sterling Jones authorized and empowered by the defendant company as its agent under his contract with the defendant to issue policies of insurance or to change or alter the contents thereof? Answer. No.

"(5) If the said J. Sterling Jones, under his contract with the defendant, was not authorized and empowered to issue policies of insurance or to change or alter the contents thereof at and before the delivery of the policy by the defendant to the plaintiff W. O. Jones, did the plaintiff Jones at or before the acceptance of the policy have notice from the defendant or its agent that the powers of the said J. Sterling Jones were so limited that he was not authorized to issue policies of insurance or to change or to alter the contents thereof? Answer. No.

"(6) Did the said W. O. Jones, after the delivery and acceptance of the policy by him, continue to pay the alleged excessive premiums thereafter under protest of himself or his agent, and by reason of assurances and promises of the defendant company through J. Sterling Jones, or other agents of the defendant, as alleged by the plaintiff, that the said excessive payments as alleged would be properly adjusted so as to conform to the alleged representations and agreements as set forth in the complaint, and did the plaintiff fail to sue the defendant by reason of such assurances and promises, and at the request of defendant's agent or agents? Answer. Yes.

"(7) Did the plaintiff W. O. Jones, after having an opportunity to learn the character, terms, and conditions of the policy, without disavowing its terms and giving notice of protest to the defendant or its agents, by his acts, conduct, dealings and negotiations with the defendant, either himself or through and by his agent ratify, or acquiesce in the terms of the said policy? Answer. Yes.

"(8) How many premiums did plaintiffs pay under protest? Answer. Two.

"(9) Did plaintiff W. O. Jones ascertain that the policy of insurance was not in accordance with the alleged representations of J. Sterling Jones more than three years before the institution of this action? Answer. Yes.

"(10) Did the plaintiff W. O. Jones ascertain that the policy of insurance was not in accordance with the alleged representations of J. Sterling Jones more than 10 years before the institution of this action? Answer. No.

"(11) Did plaintiffs before the commencement of this action demand of defendant a reasonable and equitable adjustment of the matters in difference, or, upon refusal, a return of the premiums, and was such demand refused? Answer. No.

"(12) Did the plaintiff's cause of action arise more than three years before the beginning of the suit? Answer. No.

"(13) Did the plaintiff's cause of action arise more than 10 years before the beginning of the action? Answer. No.

"(14) Has defendant constantly carried on business and maintained an agency in this state, in compliance with the laws of this state since the date of the policy issued to plaintiff August 1, 1887? Answer. Yes.

"(15) Did defendant file with the Secretary of State copies of its charter and by-laws as required by chapter 62, p. 197, Pub. Laws 1899, and thereupon become domesticated in this state? Answer. Yes.

"(16) What amount, together with interest, has been paid on said policy in excess of the rate prescribed for the age of 65 in the lower or second table on the back of said policy? Answer. $1,754.09 (by consent).

"(17) What has been the cost to the defendant of carrying the liability imposed upon it by this policy issued to the plaintiff since the same was issued August 1, 1887, to the present time? Answer. This issue not to be answered by the jury."

And the court below, being of opinion that, according to the admitted stipulations of the policy, the premiums could never exceed the maximum rate for the attained age of 65 years, and that all premiums paid in excess of that amount were illegal, gave judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,754.09, the amount of such excessive premiums as established by the verdict. On appeal this judgment was reversed, and for reasons assigned in the opinion written by the Chief Justice, as reported in 147 N. C. 540, 61 S. E. 388, it was ordered that, on the verdict and the admitted stipulations of the policy, judgment should be entered for defendant. This opinion having been certified down, and the defendant having moved for judgment in accordance therewith, the plaintiff resisted the motion, and filed a petition in the cause, alleging that under and by virtue of an agreement in the cause entered into between the parties, of date April 20, 1907, and whereby the defendant had obtained a continuance of the same, the plaintiffs were entitled to have the rule or rules established and declared in this action by which future assessments and dividend credits should be made. It was further urged that this relief was within the scope and purpose of the original action. The petition was disallowed, in so far as the same contemplated further litigation in this cause between the parties, and final judgment given for defendant on the verdict as rendered.

It was further provided in said judgment that no forfeiture of the policy should be declared by reason of the nonpayment of any premiums on and after April 20, 1907, and the right of the plaintiffs to challenge the validity and correctness of all premiums or assessments or dividends since said date was secured and preserved. From the refusal of the court to allow further litigation between the parties in the cause now constituted, the plaintiffs excepted and appealed.

Shepherd & Shepherd and J. W. Hinsdale, for appellants. J. H. Pou, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The construction and interpretation of this contract of insurance, and the effect of the stipulations therein, and also of the verdict rendered by the jury, were all involved and presented on the former appeal in the cause, and, after full and careful consideration, the court, being of opinion with defendant, directed that judgment be entered in its favor. This opinion having been certified down, it became the duty of the judge below to comply with the order made, and there is no error to plaintiffs' prejudice in the judgment as entered. Dobson v. Simonton, 100 N. C. 56, 6 S. E. 369; Calvert v. Peebles, 82 N. C. 334. And we are of opinion that there is nothing in the scope of the original complaint nor in the agreement made in the cause to require or justify the court in opening up the controversy as desired by the plaintiff.

The action was instituted and tried on the theory that the amount of the premiums to be assessed against the holder were fixed and expressed at the attained age of 65 years, and could in no event ever exceed that sum. It was further contended that, if this were not true, the plaintiff had been induced to enter into the contract under false and fraudulent assurances that this was its purport, and judgment was demanded in the one case for all premiums wrongfully collected in excess of the stipulated amount, or, if this was not the correct interpretation of the contract on its face, and fraud was established by the verdict, that the contract relation be severed, and all premiums collected should be returned. Defendant controverted both positions taken by plaintiffs, and claimed, further, that, if recovery was had by plaintiff, the cost and value of the insurance which the company had carried on the life of W. O. Jones should be allowed and deducted from any recovery plaintiff should make. Issues were framed determinative of the substantial issues arising on the pleadings as understood by both parties, as no objection to the issues from either appear in the record, and the jury have rendered a verdict against the plaintiffs on their allegations of fraud, and the court has held against their legal position as to the force and meaning of the stipulations of the contract, and the agreement relied upon by plaintiffs was never intended to have the effect contended for by the plaintiffs. This agreement was entered into between the parties in April, 1907, on condition that defendant should be granted a continuance. Its principal intent and purport was to relieve the plaintiffs of the payment of further premiums pending the litigation, and to prevent the forfeiture of the policy by reason of nonpayment. This effect has been allowed it in the judgment as entered by the court, and the intimations in the agreement, looking to a further accounting between the parties, were evidently made in view of further adjustment to be required in case the plaintiffs should succeed. This was the view of the agreement entertained by the judge below, the same who presided at the trial of the cause, as indicated by the judgment concerning it entered and signed by him at October term, 1907, as follows: "Consent Order. North Carolina, Wake County. Superior Court, October Term, 1907. Jones et al. v. Provident Life Assurance Society of New York. In this case it is agreed that if judgment be given finally for plaintiffs, defendant shall be entitled to credits on said judgment for all unpaid premiums, with interest from date when such premiums should have been paid. This order is made in furtherance of an agreement of counsel that premiums falling due after February 1st, 1907, should not be paid until the final termination of the suit, and then at the rates which the Court should hold the legal rate of premiums. Nov. 6, 1907. B. F. Long, Judge Presiding." And in our opinion it cannot be maintained that a collateral agreement of this character should have the force and effect to change the scope of the action and open up questions which involve an inquiry into the scheme and plan of defendant's organization, and an investigation as to the regulation and management of the internal affairs of the company. Such a result is not within the scope of the action as originally constituted was never contemplated by the parties, and is not a just or correct interpretation of the agreement relied upon.

There is no error, and the judgment below will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

STATE v. QUICK.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 1, 1909.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 203*)—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATIONS—CONDITION OF DECLARANT.

Deceased was shot about 6 o'clock p. m., and died at midnight. His wife testified that he said he was going to die several times before the doctor came, but she was not certain as to whether these statements were made before or after he told how he was shot. Held, that his statements as to the shooting were properly admitted as dying declarations.

2. WITNESSES (§ 274*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

A witness who has testified as to the character of accused may be asked on cross-examination, for the purpose of testing the witness' conception of good character, and not to prove bad character by affirmative evidence of specific acts, whether a person who carries a concealed weapon and drinks whisky in a barroom on Sunday is considered a man of good character.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

The allowance of a question, on cross-examination of a witness for the accused, which is objectionable in form is harmless, where the accused admits the facts embodied in the question.

5. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where an intentional killing with a deadly weapon is admitted, a charge which erroneously submits to the jury a view of the case not supported by the evidence, whereby they are permitted to convict of manslaughter, instead of murder, if they reject the plea of self-defense, is error prejudicial to the state, and not to the accused, and does not require a reversal of a conviction of the lesser degree of homicide.

6. HOMICIDE (63*)—MANSLAUGHTER—MUTUAL COMBAT.

If two men fight upon a sudden quarrel, and one kills the other, the chances being equal, the crime is manslaughter.

7. HOMICIDE (§ 119*)—MANSLAUGHTER—MUTUAL COMBAT.

If one who enters a fight in self-defense, and without malice uses unnecessary force resulting in death, the crime is manslaughter.

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR.

The reading of extracts from opinions of the Supreme Court as a part of the charge in a criminal case is unwise, but is not ground for reversal, where it appears that the extracts are of a very general character, and could not possibly have misled the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Richmond County; Long, Judge.

Cary Quick was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison & Whitlock, A. S. Dockery, John P. Cameron, and W. M. Kelly, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett, for the State.

BROWN, J. The defendant was tried for murder in the second degree and convicted of manslaughter. It appears from the evidence set out in the record that this defendant, with Lone Knight, Ebb Quick, and Lauder Quick, had an altercation with Jule Combs, at the latter's saloon in Richmond county, over the price of a pint of gin. There were several pistol shots fired, and Combs was wounded and in consequence thereof died.

1. The defendant excepts to the ruling of the court below admitting the dying declarations of the deceased. There can be no question that the declarations are pertinent and material, as they tend to prove that all the defendants were participants in an unjustifiable assault upon the deceased at the time he was shot. The wife of the deceased testified concerning her husband's condition: "He was weak, and continued to grow weaker. He could not help himself at all. He remained in bed after being brought home until he died. He said that he was going to die—about the first word he said after he came home. He said this several times. There was nothing said by him about his getting well during this time." On cross-examination witness stated that her husband "said he was going to die soon after he got there; said he could not live. About two hours after he got there, the doctor came. He said he was going to die before the doctor came. After the doctor came, he did not say anything about dying, because the doctor gave him something to put him to sleep; cannot be certain whether he told how he was shot before or after he told he was going to die." The deceased was shot about 6 or 7 o'clock p. m., on Sunday November 11, 1906, and died at 12 o'clock that night. Under our precedents we think it was proper to admit the declarations of the deceased as dying declarations. State v. Pearce, 46 N. C. 251; State v. Whitt, 113 N. C. 716, 18 S. E. 715.

2. Witness Adams for defendant testified that his general character is good. On cross-examination by the solicitor the court permitted the following question: "Witness is asked if he thinks that a man who would visit a barroom on Sunday afternoon, carrying concealed on his person a pistol, and remain at the barroom drinking whiskey, etc., would entitle such a person to be considered a man of good character." We see no objection to the question. The evident purpose was to test the witness' conception of what constituted good character and not to prove a bad character by affirmative evidence of specific acts. Assuming that it was objectionable in form, it was harmless, as the defendant had already testified as a witness in his own behalf, and admitted the very facts embodied in the inquiry.

3. The defendant excepts to the instructions of the court placing the burden of proof upon the defendant to justify the killing of the deceased, contending that the burden of the issue never shifts from the state to satisfy the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, upon the entire evidence in the case, of the defendant's guilt. For this position the learned counsel cite Stewart v. Carpet Co., 138 N. C. 60, 50 S. E. 562, and Board Education v. Makeley, 139 N. C. 31, 51 S. E. 784, and insist that the rule upheld in those cases is applicable here. We do not think those precedents have any application in an indictment for homicide. The position of counsel is one of the propositions laid down by Judge Wilde in his dissenting opinion in the well-known case of Commonwealth v. York, 9 Metc. 93, 43 Am. Dec. 373, and was taken by counsel before this court, in State v. Willis,

63 N. C. 26. But the proposition was repudiated in that case, and the doctrine reiterated that in all indictments for homicide, where the intentional killing is established, or admitted, the law presumes malice from the use of a deadly weapon, and the defendant is guilty of murder (now in second degree), unless he can satisfy the jury of the truth of facts which justify his act or mitigate it to manslaughter. The burden is on the defendant to establish such facts to the satisfaction of the jury, unless they arise out of the evidence against him. This rule has been uniformly adhered to by this court in indictments for homicide, and it was reiterated in the recent case of State v. Worley, 141 N. C. 764, 53 S. E. 128, where the cases are cited. The defendant, Cary Quick, was examined in his own behalf, and not only admits the intentional killing, averring that he did it in self-defense, but states that he fired at the deceased four times. His honor's ruling was in accord with the unvarying precedents in this state, which have ever followed the common law. 1 East, P. C. 279. The exception cannot be sustained.

4. The defendant contends that the court erred in instructing the jury "that, if the jury found there was a mutual affray between deceased and Cary, into which they both willingly entered, and during the progress of the fight Cary shot and killed deceased in the transport of passion aroused by the fight, but without malice, it would be no more than manslaughter; but, if Cary had satisfied the jury that he was without fault in entering the fight, and that he fired the fatal shot in self-defense agreeably to the principles governing this defense set out hereafter to acquit him." We see nothing in this instruction of which the defendant can reasonably complain. The charge of the court is very full, and presented clearly and fairly to the jury the defendant's plea of self-defense and the evidence in support of it. Suppose the court erroneously submitted to the jury a view of the case not supported by evidence, whereby the jury were permitted, if they saw fit, to convict of manslaughter instead of murder, what right has the defendant to complain? It is an error prejudicial to the state, and not to him. His plea of self-defense had been fully and fairly presented to the jury, and rejected by them as untrue. What then was the duty of the jury, if there was no evidence of manslaughter? Clearly under the law they should have convicted the defendant of murder in the second degree. How then can the defendant, his plea of self-defense having been wholly discarded by the jury, and the burden being upon him to reduce the offense to something less than murder in the second degree, reasonably complain of a charge, however erroneous in that respect, which permitted the jury to convict of a lesser degree of homicide? The appellant in all cases, civil as well as criminal, is not only required to show error, but that he was injured by it. The deduction seems to us to be founded in the very logic of the law that evidence which is amply sufficient to support a conviction of murder must, of necessity, be sufficient to sustain a conviction of manslaughter. But independent of that, there are phases of the evidence which warranted a verdict for manslaughter, and not for murder, and therefore his honor's charge is unobjectionable.

There is evidence tending to prove that the quarrel was a "drunken brawl," started suddenly by an altercation over some gin; that the deceased whipped out his pistol and shot at defendant about the same time if not a little sooner than defendant shot at him; that the parties fought willingly, suddenly, and upon equal terms. This brings the case within those precedents which hold that if two men fight upon a sudden quarrel, and one kills the other, the chances being equal, this constitutes manslaughter. State v. Massey, 65 N. C. 480; State v. Hildreth, 31 N. C. 429, 51 Am. Dec. 364; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 481; State v. Ellick, 60 N. C. 456, 86 Am. Dec. 442. Killing, the result of passion produced by fight, is manslaughter. State v. Miller, 112 N. C. 878, 17 S. E. 167; State v. Crane, 95 N. C. 619. It is further held that if a person upon whom an assault is made with violence resent it immediately by killing the aggressor, and act therein in heat of blood, and not exclusively in his own defense, it is manslaughter. State v. Tuckett, 8 N. C. 210; State v. Roberts, 8 N. C. 350, 9 Am. Dec. 643; State v. Smith, 77 N. C. 488; State v. Barnwell, 80 N. C. 466. There are phases of the evidence and reasonable inferences which may be drawn from it which support this theory. Again there is evidence tending to prove that while the defendant may have entered the affray unwillingly, and have fired at first in self-defense, yet he continued to fire, as is contended, unnecessarily. The defendant himself admits that he was the only person who shot deceased, and that he fired four times at him. There are circumstances in evidence which surround the occurrence from which it may be fairly inferred that the defendant's repeated firing was unnecessary, and possibly further wounded the deceased after the latter had ceased to fire and was disabled. It is well settled that if the defendant entered the fight in self-defense, and without malice used unnecessary force, which resulted in death, it is manslaughter, and that the question of excessive force is one peculiarly for the jury.

5. The defendant excepts because the judge read to the jury lengthy extracts from opinions delivered by this court in certain cases. We doubt the wisdom of such practice, as the language and reasoning of an opinion is generally based upon the facts of that particular case, and the facts may differ, but we are unable to see that any appreciable harm was done to the defendant by the extracts read as a part of his honor's charge in this case.

as they were of a very general character. The plea of self-defense, and the evidence in support of it, was put before the jury by the court with such clearness that the jury could not possibly have been misled by any of the extracts read to them. The jury having repudiated the defendant's plea of self-defense, he is fortunate, upon the evidence adduced, that he escaped with a conviction for manslaughter only.

Upon a review of the entire record we find no error.

WALKER, J. (concurring in result). My assent to the conclusion reached by the court in this case is based upon the opinion, which I entertain, that there is some evidence of manslaughter. I cannot concur in the view taken by the court in its opinion that a defendant in a criminal action can, under any circumstances, be convicted of, and punished for, an offense, where there is no evidence to support the verdict, even though the offense of which he is convicted may be embraced by the general charge in the indictment, and may therefore be considered by the jury where there is evidence that will sustain a conviction. It is said that if the jury rejects the defendant's plea of self-defense, they should convict him of murder in the second degree, if there is no evidence of manslaughter. Conceding this to be true, provided the jury have repudiated the plea of self-defense, as unsupported by evidence, why is it not equally true that, as we know the jury have acquitted the defendant of murder, either in the first or the second degree, they should have acquitted him entirely, if there had been no evidence of manslaughter. The conclusion that they should thus have acquitted him is indeed sustained by the better reason, for they have actually and certainly acquitted him of murder in any degree, and their refusal to acquit altogether may have been caused by the erroneous instruction of the court as to manslaughter. Can it be that, if there is no evidence of the offense, for which the defendant has been convicted, the verdict can be justified because he could have been convicted of a higher offense, and the jury has merely failed to acquit him? In a prosecution for a homicide, where the jury acquit of murder, there are only two other verdicts they can render, namely, guilty of manslaughter, or not guilty. If there is no evidence of manslaughter, is it not more accurate to say that they should acquit, or is there a rule of law that they may convict of manslaughter, even though there is no evidence of that offense, having been committed, merely because they could have convicted of the higher felony? I do not think so, and for this reason I am unable to concur in all that is said in the opinion of the court. I think that a conviction must be founded, not alone upon the charge preferred in the indictment, but upon some evidence sufficient in law to establish it.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 169*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRINSIC CIRCUMSTANCES.

In construing a contract, if the language of the contract does not clearly express the intention of the parties, the character of the subject-matter and the circumstances surrounding the transaction must be considered in determining their intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 752; Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 155*) — CONSTRUCTION — AGAINST PARTY DRAIVING CONTRACT.

Where the language of a contract, given without consideration, was on a printed form, and its meaning was doubtful, it should be construed most strongly against the party who furnished the printed form and drew the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 736; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

4. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS — CONDITIONS — TENDER OF DEEDS.

Where the owner of standing timber gave an option, without consideration, to sell the timber within 30 days, the owner to at once prepare and execute deeds therefor when the purchaser signified his intention to exercise the option, the owner was bound to prepare and tender the deeds after notice by the purchaser that he accepted the option.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 121*)—ACTIONS — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to enforce specific performance of a contract to sell standing timber, by which the owner was to immediately prepare and tender the deeds upon the acceptance of the option, evidence held to show that the parties subsequently modified the contract so as to require the purchaser to prepare the deeds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 394; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

6. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 23*)—AUTHORITY — EVIDENCE.

In an action for specific performance of an option contract to sell standing timber, evidence held to show that the person who undertook to prepare the deeds was acting for the purchaser, and not for the owner, in doing so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 41; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

7. CONTRACTS (§ 248*)—MODIFICATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a contract was modified by letters was for the court to determine, the letters containing all the evidence of the alleged modification.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1140; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1062*)—HARMLESS ERROR—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES.

Error in submitting to the jury the question whether a contract was modified by certain letters was not prejudicial, where the jury correctly decided the question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4215, 4216; Dec. Dig. § 1062*]

9. CONTRACTS (§ 299*)—PERFORMANCE—TIME—STRICT PERFORMANCE.

If the parties to a contract agree upon the time of performance, in the absence of waiver or those providential interventions which excuse strict performance, the courts will not relieve the parties from performance as agreed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. § 1398; Dec. Dig. § 299*]

10. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 78*)—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—TIME OF PAYMENT—TIME AS ESSENCE.

The equitable doctrine that time is not of the essence of executory contracts for the sale of land does not apply where, from the nature of the property or the surrounding circumstances, it would be inequitable to interfere with the contract as made, and would defeat the intention of the parties, as where the subject-matter of the contract is fluctuating in value and the vendee does not take possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 121, 125; Dec. Dig. § 78*]

11. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—TIME OF PERFORMANCE.

Where one engaged in purchasing options on standing timber took, without consideration, an option to purchase timber within 30 days, by the terms of which he was to pay part of the price upon delivery of the deeds and the rest in installments, the deeds to be executed when the option was accepted, time was of the essence of the agreement, and the purchaser was bound to tender the cash payment and notes upon delivery of the deed, and, even in absence of any specific provision as to payment, the price would have to be tendered within the 30 days.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 3*]

12. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 13*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE—PERFORMANCE IMPOSSIBLE—PARTING WITH TITLE.

A contract for the purchase of standing timber could not be specifically enforced by the purchaser, where the owner had parted with title before suit was brought.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 13*]

13. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 128*)—TIME AS ESSENCE OF CONTRACT—RECOVERY OF DAMAGES.

Where time was of the essence of an option contract to purchase standing timber, the purchaser must show strict performance with the terms of the contract as to time of payment, in order to recover damages for failure to convey, in an action for specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. § 414; Dec. Dig. § 128*]

14. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 57*)—OPTION CONTRACTS—AMBIGUITY—INTENT—CONSIDERATION.

An option contract to sell standing timber will not be specifically enforced unless it is unambiguous, understood by the parties, and based upon a valuable consideration.

Appeal from Superior Court, Duplin County; Ward, Judge.

Action by Caldwell Hardy, trustee, and others, against Maury Ward, to compel specific performance of a timber contract. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

On December 22, 1905, defendant executed and delivered to plaintiff, trustee for the Carolina Timber Company, a paper writing whereby, in consideration of $1, he sold the company "the right or option of purchasing from said party of the first part at any time within thirty days from the date of this agreement in fee simple and with general warranty, at the price hereinafter named, all the pine timber, ten inches in diameter.

* * * If the said company, its assigns or successors, shall avail themselves of this option and purchase said timber hereunder, then when they shall have so signified their intention of doing, the said party of the first part shall, at once, make, execute and acknowledge a good and sufficient deed with warranty to the said company, its assigns or successors upon compliance, by them, with the terms of sale as above prescribed," etc. The price to be paid for the timber was $7,500, of which $2,500 was to be paid "cash upon delivery of deed," the balance in five annual instalments of $1,000 each, carrying interest from date. The contract contained provisions in regard to the time within which the timber was to be cut, not material to the decision of this appeal. The contract was signed by defendant, duly proven, and registered.

On January 9, 1906, the plaintiff's representative addressed to defendant the following letter: "This is to notify you that my company will exercise your option and I will be glad if you will assist Mr. Beasley in making up the deed. I talked to him over the phone today and told him to push your matter through at once. I am writing to Mr. Beasley, telling him to call on you to help him on your deed." Mr. Beasley was plaintiff's attorney.

On January 8, 1906, he wrote defendant: "I have been employed by the Carolina Timber Co. to trace your title and will thank you for any information as to books and pages where your deeds are recorded. You can look over your papers and it will save me lots of time." Defendant sent Mr. Beasley, "as per request," a list of deeds, dates, pages, and books of registration, etc., covering the lands included in the option. At the conclusion of the list he writes in regard to two tracts that he "can couple them without survey," saying: "Write me if you wish this done to facilitate writing deed. The only complications in title are on the Ira Robinson tract and J. C. Mills tract. This is not to conflict with closing option. I am to give security to indemnify the company in case of any legal restraint. Draw satisfactory papers for me to sign for that purpose." This letter is without date. On January 12, 1906, Mr. Beasley wrote defendant asking information in regard to title to several tracts, and defendant answered the letter January 15th, saying: "I expect to straighten up the titles as opportunity affords, but wished to do so at suitable times. Draw such paper as is satisfactory to your company, and do not make it unreasonable, we wish them to have what they buy. * * * Hope you will be able to get papers ready soon." Mr. Beasley wrote defendant January 18th, and again on January 20th. In the last letter he said: "The Carolina Timber Co. requests me to write you that they will take your timber according to option as soon as you can furnish them a fee simple title to the same." On January 28, 1906, Mr. Beasley wrote defendant: "The Carolina Timber Co. is ready to pay you according to agreement and we are still standing by what we promised to do and we know you will do likewise. The money and notes are ready for you."

Defendant sold the timber to another purchaser January 23, 1906, for $10,000. The plaintiff tendered money January 30th, and notes bearing date January 26th. Plaintiff sues for specific performance, and, if that cannot be had, for damages. Plaintiff excepted to the admission of the letters from Beasley to defendant.

His honor submitted the following issues to the jury:

"(1) Did the defendant enter into an agreement with the plaintiff of date December 22, 1905, as alleged in complaint?

"(2) Did the plaintiff signify their intention of availing themselves of the purchase under their option, and accept the terms thereof, during the 30 days mentioned therein?

"(2½) Did plaintiff make an offer to accept the option of December, 1905, as modified by the letter of Meyers dated January 9, 1906, and introduced in evidence, and, if so, did the defendant accept the modification made by said letter?

"(3) Were the plaintiffs willing and able to perform their part of the said contract after accepting terms of same prior to the 23d of January, 1906?

"(4) Has the defendant wrongfully broken the said contract and refused to execute deed thereunder as alleged in the complaint?

"(5) What damages, if any, are plaintiffs entitled to recover of the defendant?

"(6) Did the plaintiff tender purchase price before the expiration of 30 days?

"(7) Did the defendant tender deed before the expiration of 30 days?"

By consent, the sixth and seventh issues were answered "No." Plaintiff requested his honor to instruct the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they would answer the second issue "Yes." This was refused, and plaintiff excepted. The same request was made as to the third and fourth issues, which was refused, and plaintiff excepted. Plaintiff excepted to the submission of the issue numbered 2½. The court, by consent, answered the first issue "Yes," and instructed the jury that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to establish the affirmation of the second issue, and that, if they had satisfied them that they accepted the terms of the contract within 30 days, to answer the issue "Yes." The jury answered the issue "No." On the issue numbered 2½ his honor instructed the jury that, if they were satisfied that plaintiff agreed that Beasley was to write the deed and plaintiff (defendant) consented to it, they would answer the issue "Yes," otherwise they would answer it "No." "If you find from the greater weight of the evidence that such acceptance as was made by the plaintiff was contained in the letter of Meyers dated January 9, 1906, and that defendant accepted the modifications contained in said letter and acted upon by them, you should answer the issue 'Yes.'" Plaintiff excepted. His honor instructed the jury that, if they answered the third issue "No," they should answer the fourth issue "No," and the fifth issue "Nothing." To this instruction plaintiff excepted. The jury answered the third and fourth issues "No," and the fifth issue "Nothing."

His honor rendered judgment for the defendant upon the verdicts, to which plaintiff excepted and appealed.

J. O. Carr, for appellants. Simmons, Ward & Allen, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts as above). Eliminating immaterial matter, the verdict of the jury, read in the light of the pleadings and the evidence, discloses this case: Defendant on December 22, 1905, gave to plaintiff the right, or option, of purchasing at any time within 30 days "from the date of the agreement" the timber described in the contract, with the provision that, if the plaintiff should avail itself of the option "and purchase the timber" thereunder and should so signify its intention, the defendant should "at once make, execute and acknowledge" a deed for the timber and deliver the same to the plaintiff "upon compliance by it with the terms of sale"; that is, paying $2,500 cash, and executing its notes for $5,000, payable in five annual installments. On January 9, 1906, plaintiff signified its acceptance of the option by writing the letter of that date set out in the record. Subsequent to the receipt of that letter the correspondence between Mr. Beasley, plaintiff's attorney, and the defendant took place, concluding with the letter of January 20, 1906, and the sale of the timber by defendant January 23, 1906, to a third party. It is conceded that no deed was at any time tendered by defendant, and no money was tendered by plaintiff until January 30, 1906. Plaintiff's exceptions to the refusal of his honor to give the instructions asked and to the instructions given present the questions, the solution of which are decisive of the appeal. Was the plaintiff required, by the terms of the option, to tender the money and notes within 30 days? Did the letter of January 9th modify the terms of the option and put upon plaintiff the duty of preparing the deeds for defendant to execute, and thereby relieve him of the obligation imposed by the contract to "at once make, execute and acknowledge" the deeds when plaintiff should signify its acceptance of the option?

The learned counsel for plaintiff insists that, by a proper construction of the paper writing, the "right or option" given plaintiff was to signify its purpose to buy within 30 days; that is, to enter into a contract of purchase for the land, as distinguished from a completed purchase, within the time named; that when, at any time within the 30 days, plaintiff signified its acceptance of the option, the relation of vendor and vendee was created, no time being fixed within which the money was to be paid and the deed executed; that, in this condition of the transaction, both parties were allowed a reasonable time to complete the trade. It is true that an option is a mere proposition on the part of the owner of the land to sell, and, until accepted by the person to whom it is made, is unilateral. We had occasion to consider the several definitions of the term, and the legal rights and liabilities growing out of it, in Allston v. Connell, 140 N. C. 485, 53 S. E. 292, and Trogden v. Williams, 144 N. C. 192, 56 S. E. 865, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 867. We found a very satisfactory discussion of the duties imposed upon the person to whom the option is given in the opinion of Woods, J., in Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. 743, 8 L. R. A. 94. In that case the option was in the following words: "I am willing to sell my land * * * for the price of six dollars and twenty-five cents per acre cash; and the parties for whom Mr. H. are negotiating for said land shall have the privilege of buying said property at said price and on said terms, for sixty days, from the seventh day of June, 1883." After a very exhaustive discussion, with a wealth of authority, in regard to the general principles of law applicable to options, he says in regard to the one under consideration: "The period of 60 days from the 7th of June, 1883, mentioned in the option, within which plaintiff had the privilege of buying said land at the price of $6.25 per acre cash, expired on the 6th of August, 1883. During the whole of that period, and during the whole of the said 6th of August, the plaintiffs had the privilege of converting the offer of John Burr into a valid and binding contract by an unconditional acceptance of and compliance with the terms thereof. They could not do so by any other acceptance, nor could they comply with said terms in any other manner than by actual payment or tender of the whole price of the land before the 60 days expired. * * * It was their privilege to accept unconditionally and comply with the same by paying or tendering the cash within the 60 days, and thus secure to themselves the right to compel John Burr to perform his contract." In Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463, 14 S. E. 249, the option contained no reference to payment in cash, or otherwise. It was a simple proposition to sell within a fixed period, concluding: "If not accepted as provided, this agreement is null and void." The acceptance was by telegram. "Will take property. Meet me at Toronto first train." The court, distinguishing the case from Weaver v. Burr, supra, held that tender of the cash was not a condition precedent to the conversion of the option into a contract. Brannon, J., referring to Weaver's Case, said that the majority of the court "construed the cash payment in the option in that case as an act required by it to be done within the limit, the option having prescribed cash payment as part of the term; further providing that the parties should have the privilege of buying the property at said price and on said terms, for sixty days, thus including, as their judges thought, cash payment within the sixty days. But here cash is not mentioned. The only thing required to be done within the limit assigned by the option is acceptance." The learned justice quotes, with approval, the language of Prof. Pomeroy: "Where the contract is really an offer on one side, with a provision that this offer must be assented to and accepted, where a mere acceptance is contemplated, or payment must be made, where payment was the act of acceptance contemplated at or before a specified date, then, of course, the act of assent or payment must be done within the prescribed time, and time is from the very form of the contract essential. If, therefore, a vendor agrees to convey, if payment be made, at or before a given date, or if an option is given which is to be accepted by payment within a given time, then the time of payment is certainly essential; in fact, payment is a condition precedent to the vesting of any right in the vendee." Contracts, § 387.

With these general principles and two well-considered opinions to aid us, we inquire what, in the light of the facts in this case, duty was imposed upon the plaintiff to entitle it to demand specific performance of the option, or to bring it into contractual relations with the defendant? If the language used does not clearly express the intention of the parties, we must have regard to the character of property with which they were dealing, the conditions by which they were surrounded, and other circumstances throwing light upon the transaction. It must be noted that the subject-matter of the transaction was standing timber, and not the land itself. We may also note, as appears from the numerous appeals in this court and the recent history of the increasing demand with rapidly increasing value of standing timber, that it would be unreasonable to suppose that the defendant intended to "tie up" his valuable timber without any consideration paid by plaintiff for an almost indefinite time, and, by the simple notice of an acceptance, to come under a contractual obligation in which time was not "of the essence." It is in evidence that plaintiff had several "buyers" of timber in the section, and that the contracts were drawn by it, usually a printed form, which persons agreeing to sell timber were called upon to sign. The plaintiff assumed no obligation and paid nothing for the option, the recited consideration being $1. If the language used in the option is of doubtful meaning, it should be construed most strongly against the plaintiff. The option given is "the right of purchasing" within 30 days. In Weaver's Case the option gave "the privilege of buying." We can perceive no substantial distinction between cases in this respect. If other language does not modify that which we have quoted, we should hold that the plaintiff acquired, by the option, the right to purchase the timber by tendering the cash and notes within 30 days. This would, we think, effectuate the intention of the parties, closing the transaction within the time fixed. The further provision, however, clearly shows that the money was to be paid and the notes tendered "upon delivery of the deed," and the defendant was to "make, execute and acknowledge" the deed "at once"—when the plaintiff signified that it would avail itself of "the option and purchase said timber." This language imposed upon the defendant the duty of making—that is, preparing, executing, and tendering—the deed before the plaintiff was required to tender the money.

It is clear that, as the contract was drawn and executed, the defendant was under obligation to prepare and tender the deed after notice that plaintiff desired to "exercise the option." Did the letter of January 9, 1906, modify or change the obligation of the parties in this respect? The answer to this question is dependent upon the construction placed upon the letter of January 9th and the subsequent correspondence between plaintiff's attorney, Mr. Beasley, and defendant. In the letter of January 9th, plaintiff says: "I will be glad if you will assist Mr. Beasley in making up the deed. * * * I told him to push your matter through at once. I am writing to Mr. Beasley telling him to call on you to help him on your deed." This language is a clear expression of a purpose on the part of plaintiff that its attorney will write the deed. Mr. Beasley put this construction upon the terms of his employment by plaintiff. On January 8th, a day prior to the letter of plaintiff to defendant, he writes defendant: "I have been employed by the Carolina Timber Co. to trace your title"—asking him to send information, in regard to his deeds, etc. Defendant complies with the request, sending memorandum of dates, books, pages, etc., of registered deeds. He calls attention to complications in title of two tracts, but says: "This is not to conflict with closing option. I am to give security to indemnify the company in case of any legal restraint. Draw satisfactory papers for me to sign for that purpose." On January 15th defendant writes in regard to details, concluding: "Hope you will be able to get papers ready soon. If you wish further, kindly advise me." The letter dated January 20th appears to have been "postmarked" at Kenansville, "January 24, 6 A. M. 1906," and at Rose Hill, its destination, "January 24 9 A. M. 1906." Plaintiff says that he received it January 24th. He says: "I told him on the 20th that I wanted to close the matter. * * * Plaintiff had not notified me before then that it would approve and accept title contract."

Mr. Arringdale, a witness for plaintiff, says that he was with defendant one week before the expiration of the option, and he acknowledged that he had sold the timber to plaintiff. That he told defendant that Beasley would help him, and that we were ready to close up the transaction—to get his papers ready—said he would do so right away.

Mr. Meyers, who wrote the letter of January 9th, testified that he got the money and notes "three or four days after the option was out. * * * Beasley was our attorney. There was strong competition in this community for purchase of timber. This was not usual form, but was one of Camp Manufacturing Company's options."

Plaintiff insists that Mr. Beasley was defendant's attorney to draw the deed, and that, therefore, the letters are not competent evidence against it. We do not concur in this view. Plaintiff's witness Meyers, who wrote the letter of January 9th, expressly says, "Mr. Beasley was our attorney." The entire evidence is consistent with this statement. Plaintiff insists that his honor should not have submitted issue numbered 2½ to the jury, but should have construed the letters and held, as a conclusion of law, that they did not modify the contract. We incline to plaintiff's view in this respect; but if the jury have decided the question, construed the letters correctly, there is no prejudicial error in the course pursued by his honor. It is elementary that, if a question of law be submitted to the jury and they decide it correctly, the error is cured by the verdict. If the letter of January 9th so modified the original contract or option as to relieve the defendant of the duty of preparing the deed and imposed upon the plaintiff that duty, it is conceded that no deed was prepared or tendered. The parties evidently understood that, notwithstanding the terms of the original option contract, Mr. Beasley was to prepare the deeds and the contract of indemnity. We do not find any evidence tending to show a failure on the part of defendant to furnish to him the information necessary to do this. His letter giving information, while not dated, was evidently written upon receipt of, and in reply to, the letter from Mr. Beasley of January 8th. Mr. Beasley acknowledged receipt of this letter on January 12th, saying that he had "traced up most of your titles." He makes inquiry about title to several tracts. Defendant answers on the 15th of January, giving details, and concluding, "I believe this covers your questions." He explains that all of the titles are clear except two tracts, and he had before written Mr. Beasley that the complications in regard to them were not to delay closing the transaction; that he was to give indemnity to plaintiff. We think that the letters show that plaintiff's attorney was to prepare the deeds, and that on January 22, 1906, defendant was not in default in closing the transaction. The jury found that the acceptance of the option by plaintiff was subject to the modification in this respect; we concur in this conclusion. That time was of the essence of the contract was recognized by both parties, and we think correctly so. If the parties agree upon a day of performance, in the absence of waiver, or those providential interventions recognized as sufficient to relieve them from strict performance, the courts are not permitted to do so. The equitable doctrine that, in executory contracts for the sale of land, time is not of the essence, is subject to well-defined exceptions. Among the circumstances which will take a contract out of the operation of the doctrine, are "the nature of the property, or the surrounding circumstances which would make it inequitable to interfere with and modify the legal right." Bispham, Eq. 391. Among the contracts mentioned by Mr. Bispham which, by reason "of the subject-matter," are exceptions to the doctrine, are contracts for sale of "trades or manufactories and mines." He further says: "As to 'surrounding circumstances' which may render time of the essence of the contract, they must, of course, depend upon the facts of each particular case; such as whether the value of the property has greatly diminished; whether the vendee has bought to sell again; and so forth. Indeed, in this country, the fact that land bears a much more commercial character than it does in England, is subject to more fluctuations and has more of a speculative value, has led to not a few expressions of judicial opinion that time ought, as a general rule, to be considered as of the essence of a contract. But, perhaps, the safest statement of the law is that the general rule is the same in the United States as in England, but that exceptions growing out of the circumstances of the individual transaction are more numerous and looked upon with more favor." Bispham, 394.

It will be found, we think, upon examination of our Reports, that the equitable doctrine has usually been applied to cases when, upon the execution of a bond for title by the vendor and a bond for the purchase money by the vendee, the latter has been let into possession of the land, and both parties, by their conduct, have acquiesced in the status quo, notwithstanding the lapse of time. This was the case in Falls v. Carpenter, 21 N. C. 237, 28 Am. Dec. 592, followed in Scarlett v. Hunter, 56 N. C. 84, Pearson, J., saying: "When there is a contract for the sale of land, the vendee is considered, in equity, as the owner, and the vendor retains the title as security for the purchase money. He may rest satisfied with this security as long as he chooses, and, when he wants the money, he has the same right to compel payment, by a bill for a specific performance, as the vendee has to call for title." In such cases "it is taken for granted that the parties are content to allow matters to remain in statu quo until a movement is made by one side or the other." The reason upon which these, and similar cases, are decided, fails when the subject-matter of the contract is standing timber, mines, or property of which the vendee is not let into possession and the value of which is fluctuating. While we do not question the wisdom or justice of the doctrine which has received the sanction and approval of the chancellors for centuries, we do not think that it should be extended so as to include contracts which, on account of the subject-matter, surrounding circumstances, etc., its application would defeat the intention of the parties and subject property to unreasonable burdens not in contemplation of the owners when entering into the contract or giving an option. While the courts will not unduly restrict the freedom of contract, or constitute themselves guardians for the owners of such property by refusing to enforce the execution of contracts fairly made, free from obscurity, the terms of which are understood by the parties, we cannot fail to see from the records of this court that by printed contracts skillfully drawn, sometimes of difficult construction, valuable property rights are disposed of and burdens of uncertain extent and more uncertain duration are imposed upon lands. When the enforcement of these contracts is sought by appeal to the equitable powers of the court, a due regard to the rights of parties and the conservation of one of the most valuable natural resources of the state imposes upon us the duty of requiring that the contract shall be free from ambiguity, understood by the parties, and based upon a valuable consideration. In this case it is manifest that specific performance cannot be had, because the defendant has parted with his title before the suit was instituted. Recognizing this difficulty, plaintiff asks for damages. In this aspect of the case, there being no equitable element, it must allege and prove strict performance of the contract on its part according to its terms as modified. This it cannot do. We have given the record and the carefully prepared argument of counsel a careful consideration, and are of the opinion that there is no reversible error. Let this be certified.

No error.

SYKES v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)—MESSAGES—DELIVERY—NEGLIGENCE—CLAIMS—PRESENTATION.

A provision of a telegraph company's contract for the transmission of a message that any claim for failure to properly transmit the same must be presented within 60 days after the filing of the message for transmission or be barred is valid.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 54*)—MESSAGES—NEGLIGENT TRANSMISSION—CLAIMS—FILING—TIME.

Where a person, alleged to have been injured by a failure to deliver a death message within a reasonable time, failed to present any claim for damages within 60 days after knowledge of the nondelivery of the message, as required by the terms of a contract under which the message was transmitted, his right to recover was barred, notwithstanding the telegraph company was guilty of inexcusable negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Long, Judge.

Action by N. R. Sykes against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Benj. Lovenstein and Manning & Foushee, for appellant. F. L. Fuller and Tillett & Guthrie, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for mental anguish alleged to have been caused by the negligent failure of the defendant to deliver a death message. Plaintiff's wife was critically ill, and his brother, J. W. Sykes, in his own name, but as agent for the plaintiff, N. R. Sykes, delivered a telegram to the defendant at Durham, N. C., to be sent to Caze Cates at Haw river, N. C., for the purpose of informing the plaintiff's two sisters of his wife's condition, though their names were not mentioned in the message, nor was the defendant's operator notified that it was sent for that purpose. The message, which was sent on December 6, 1907, was not delivered, but on December 7, 1907, the plaintiff learned of its nondelivery. This action was commenced March 13, 1908. The contract with the company required that the plaintiff should present his claim within 60 days after the filing of the message for transmission, or be barred of a recovery. It was admitted that no claim had been presented, although the plaintiff knew of the defendant's default more than 60 days before this action was commenced. At the close of the evidence the court, on motion of the defendant, nonsuited the plaintiff under the statute, and he appealed. The validity of the stipulation as to presenting the plaintiff's claim within 60 days, after knowledge of the nondelivery of the message has been received by him, is too well settled now to be questioned. "The object of the requirement is to give the company cognizance of facts creating the liability, in order that it may use these for investigating the cause of the loss or injury. It is impossible for these companies to keep up with all mistakes of their employes, and the injuries arising therefrom; and, while they may be clearly liable for claims presented—and for which they would readily, without suit, indemnify the injured party—yet, if they have no facts on which to base an investigation in order to determine whether they are liable, they would very probably be heavily taxed with an expensive litigation. So, if the plaintiff has good grounds to recover damages, he should impart these facts to the company, in order to avoid litigation." Jones on Telegraph & Telephone Companies, p. 380, § 395. The object, therefore, in requiring notice of the claim is to enable the company to ascertain whether it is liable for the damage. This stipulation, exempting the company from liability where the claim for damages is not presented in 60 days, is not a condition restricting its liability for negligence; nor is it in the nature of a provision limiting the time within which an action may be commenced, and therefore having the force and effect of the statute of limitations. We have so held in Sherrill v. Telegraph Company, 109 N. C. 527, 14 S. E. 94. In that case the court, by the present Chief Justice, after deciding in favor of the validity of the stipulation, says: "If, therefore, the action was begun within 60 days after knowledge by the plaintiff of the failure to deliver the message, it would be such compliance with the stipulation as could be required in a case where a message was not delivered at all. If not brought within such time, the plaintiff is barred by his own negligence in not presenting his claim within the specified time." It is admitted in the case, and was also admitted here at the bar, that the action was brought more than 60 days after the plaintiff had acquired knowledge of the nondelivery of the message, and, under the authority of that decision, this action cannot be maintained. The court properly ordered a nonsuit to be entered. It is so expressly decided in Lewis v. Telegraph Company, 117 N. C. 436, 23 S. E. 319. The defendant was guilty of inexcusable negligence in this case, but the plaintiff's failure to comply with a plain and valid stipulation, requiring notice of his claim to be given, has forfeited his right to recover against the defendant even for its gross violation of duty.

No error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lee County; Long, Judge.

Action by David Clark and others against the Saco-Pettee Machine Company and others. From the decree, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 63 S. E. 153.

This is a proceeding brought under section 1199 of the Revisal of 1905 for the dissolution and settlement of the Eugenia Manufacturing Company, a corporation heretofore doing business in that portion of Moore county, N. C., now within the county of Lee. The creditors of the corporation are named as defendants in the proceeding. The action was originally instituted in the superior court of Moore county and afterwards removed to the county of Lee. A. W. Graham was duly appointed receiver of the said corporation. On the 8th day of April, 1908, an order of sale and decree of foreclosure of a deed of trust securing the bonded indebtedness of the corporation was made by Jones, Judge, at chambers in Richmond county. This decree was filed in the superior court of Moore county on April 8, 1908. The property was not sold as appears by report of the receiver to the April term, 1908, of said court, and another decree was entered, which refers to the first-named decree as follows: "And said decree is hereby in all other matters affirmed." The only modification made was in appointing another day of sale. It appearing that April term was a criminal term, and the property not having been sold, another decree was entered at May term, 1908, of the superior court of Moore county, as follows: "This cause coming on to be heard at the May term, 1908, of the superior court of Moore county, before his honor, E. B. Jones, judge presiding, and it appearing to the court that all creditors and stockholders of the Eugenia Manufacturing Company have been made parties to this action, and that no answer nor demurrer has been filed to the complaint therein, and that an order of sale has heretofore been made of the real and personal property of the said Eugenia Manufacturing Company, which was affirmed at the April term, 1908, of this court, and it appearing to the court that said April term, 1908, of this court was for the trial of criminal cases only, with the right to take judgment in civil actions when a jury trial was not required: Now therefore, upon motion of Walter Clark, Jr., and W. A. Devin, attorneys for the plaintiff and the receiver, it is ordered that the order of sale heretofore made in this case be, and the same are. In all things confirmed, and it is further ordered that this cause be removed to the county of Lee, and it is further ordered that in the event said receiver shall be of the opinion that it is to the interest of the creditors of the said Eugenia Manufacturing Company that the said sale be postponed to the first Monday in August, he is hereby authorized to postpone said sale. E. B. Jones, Judge Presiding."

On the 3d day of August, 1908, the receiver sold said property of the Eugenia Manufacturing Company at public auction, and on the 3d day of August, 1908, in the office of the superior court of Lee county, filed his report of sale. Answers were attempted to be filed on August 17, 1908, by certain creditors, which were ordered to be stricken from the record as having been filed without leave after time for pleading had expired. This feature of the case was considered by the superior court, in an opinion 63 S. E. 153. At August term, 1908, of the superior court of Lee county, the motion to confirm the sale was made and resisted by certain creditors by their attorneys, whereupon his honor, Judge Long, presiding, made an order by consent as follows: "This cause coming on to be heard before his Honor, B. F. Long, judge presiding, upon motion and consent of the parties, it is ordered that all motions in the cause be continued to be heard by the court at Monroe, N. C., in the Eighth judicial district on Thursday, the 3d day of September, 1908." It appears from the findings of Judge Long recited in his subsequent decree that on account of high water prevailing in the district, by consent of the parties, the cause was again continued to be heard on Wednesday, the 9th of September, 1908, of the superior court of Richmond county in pursuance of the above-recited order made at August term of the superior court of Lee county. The cause was heard at Rockingham, Richmond county, on the date agreed by consent, all parties being present, at which time Judge Long made an elaborate decree reciting all prior orders and decrees in the cause, and confirming the sale of the property, and directing title to be made, and distributing the proceeds of sale, and applying the same in accordance with the original decree of sale made by Judge Jones. To this decree the defendants, creditors, excepted and appealed.

BROWN, J. (after stating the facts as above). We think the exception to the ruling of his honor at August term, 1908, refusing to open the case and permit answers to be filed traversing certain allegations of the complaint and praying for affirmative relief, cannot be sustained. It was within the sound discretion of the judge below to open the case at that late day and set aside the sale and allow the answers to be filed, but his discretion was exercised against the defendants and is not reviewable by us, certainly not when there is no evidence that such discretionary power has been abused. The parties, having slept on their legal rights, forfeited them, and as they failed to convince the judge below that he should exercise his discretion in their behalf, this court cannot now help them. The matter we think was practically disposed of by us at last term (63 S. E. 153), when we held that the answers, having been filed in the papers in the case without authority of the court and long after time for pleading had expired, were properly ordered to be stricken from the official records.

It is contended by the defendants, in excepting to the decree of confirmation, that his honor had no jurisdiction to render such decree after the term had expired and outside of the county of Lee. We would have no hesitation in holding with the defendants but for the finding by the judge that all parties consented that the matter should be heard and determined while the judge was in the district at Union county, and, the parties being unable to reach Union court, by consent the matter was heard at Richmond court, and the decree of confirmation was then rendered. It is well settled that by consent of parties a judge of the superior court may hear such motions and enter judgments out of term and in another county than the one wherein the cause is pending. Bank v. Perego, 147 N. C. 296, 61 S. E. 68; Bynum v. Powe, 97 N. C. 374, 2 S. E. 170; Godwin v. Monds, 101 N. C. 354, 7 S. E. 793.

It is further contended that the court should have ordered another sale as the original decree was rendered by Jones, Judge, in Richmond county at Chambers, and that such decree was void ab initio. It is possible that the decree of April 8th, rendered outside of the county of Moore, where the cause was then pending, was of such a sweeping character as to constitute something more than a mere direction to a receiver to sell property, and that under Bank v. Perego, supra, the judge had no jurisdiction to render it at chambers in Richmond county except upon a consent hearing; but this decree was ratified and adopted by the court in term time in April and again in May in Moore county before the cause was removed to Lee county. At the May term the defendants had been brought in and had been made parties and were before the courts and took no exception to the decree then rendered. This decree undertakes to ratify and affirm the decree of April 8, 1908, and also the decree of April term, not only as to the order of sale contained in the decree, but declares that said decrees "are in all things confirmed." Having full and complete jurisdiction at May term over all the parties as well as the subject-matter of the action, Judge Jones adopted and again promulgated the decree he had formally made in Richmond county. This the judge had the right to do, and the legal effect is the same as if he had rewritten and again signed and entered the Richmond decree in eisdem terminis. No answers were filed at that time, no issues raised, and there was no reason why the decree should not have then been rendered. In this view of the case it is immaterial to consider whether the Richmond decree of April 8th was absolutely void or only voidable. It was in writing and spread on the minutes of the court, and the decree of May term gave it vitality by reference to it as much so as if it had been copied in the May decree. Id certum est quod certum reddi potest.

This conclusion at which we have arrived, after a full investigation of the record, we think disposes of every assignment of error.

The judgment of the superior court rendered by his honor, Judge Long, is affirmed.

MELVIN v. PIEDMONT MUT. LIFE INS.
CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 349*)—NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—FORFEITURE.

Under a policy stipulating that on the failure of insured to pay the weekly premiums for five weeks all claims on insurer are, by such arrears, forfeited, the failure of insured to pay weekly premiums for five weeks operates as a forfeiture of his rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 891, 900; Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 365*)—NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—FORFEITURE—REINSTATEMENT.

A partial payment of arrears of premiums by insured in a policy stipulating for a forfeiture for nonpayment of weekly premiums for five weeks and for reinstatement on payment of all dues, etc., does not work a reinstatement, in the absence of an agreement to that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 365*)—NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—FORFEITURE—REINSTATEMENT.

Where a life policy provided for a forfeiture for nonpayment of weekly premiums for five weeks, and authorized the reinstatement of insured on his paying all back dues, provided he was in good health and so remained for five weeks thereafter, insured, who paid his dues in arrears and died two days later, was not reinstated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cumberland County; Biggs, Judge.

Action by Charles Melvin, by his next friend, R. L. Melvin, against the Piedmont Mutual Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence there was motion for nonsuit, under the Hinsdale act (Revisal 1905, § 539), motion overruled, and defendant excepted. The case was submitted to the jury on issues as follows:

"(1) Did the insured fraudulently misrepresent his age in the application for the policy in controversy? Ans. No.

"(2) Is the defendant indebted to the plaintiff, and, if so, in what amount? Ans. Yes, forty-five dollars, the amount of the policy."

Sinclair & Dye, for appellant. Thos. H. Sutton, for appellee.

HOKE, J. The policy declared on contains a stipulation, made a part of the contract of insurance, in terms as follows:

"(5) Whenever the insured shall fail to pay the weekly premium on this policy for five weeks and shall be due five weeks' premium, all claims on the company are by such arrears forfeited. But the insured may be reinstated by paying up all back dues, and shall be entitled to full benefits sixty days from date of paying such dues; provided the insured shall be in good health when such dues are paid and for five weeks thereafter."

There was evidence showing that, on January 18, 1908, the deceased was indebted for six weeks' unpaid weekly dues and premiums, and on that day he paid four weeks of such arrears, which was received by the agent and by him turned over to the superintendent, who entered the same on the company's books to the credit of the insured; and, on the 20th of January, 1908, the insured died.

The court below was of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to have the issue of defendant's liability submitted on the question of waiver, by reason of the payment of the four weeks' back dues, and the receipt of same by the company, but we do not think this is a correct view of the case on the facts presented. By the terms of the contract, "on a failure to pay the weekly premiums for five weeks, all claims on the company are by such arrears forfeited," and, at the time the payment on these six weeks of back dues was made, the rights of the insured under his policy had ceased. Freckmann v. Royal Arcanum, 96 Wis. 133, 70 N. W. 1113; Supreme Lodge v. Keener, 6 Tex. Civ. App. 267, 25 S. W. 1084; Carlson v. Supreme Council, 115 Cal. 466, 47 Pac. 375, 35 L. R. A. 643. While provision for reinstatement is contained in the policy, the stipulation is that such reinstatement shall occur on the payment of "all back dues"; and the authorities are very generally to the effect that, under such a stipulation, a partial payment of back dues will not work a reinstatement. Continental Life Ins. Co. v. Willets, 24 Mich. 268; Hudson v. Insurance Co., 28 N. J. Eq. 167; Supreme Lodge v. Oeters, 95 Va. 610, 29 S. E. 322. Certainly no such result could be allowed unless there was evidence of some understanding or authorized agreement to that effect. Apart from this, by the express provisions of the contract, a reinstatement is only to occur after 60 days from paying the back dues, and on condition that the insured shall be in good health when such dues are paid, and for five weeks thereafter. He died in two days after the partial payment was made.

We are of opinion that the defendant's motion for nonsuit should have been allowed, and it is so ordered.

Reversed.

HOOKFIELD v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 271*)—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where the paragraphs of the answer put in evidence by plaintiff were complete in themselves, the court properly excluded distinct averments in defendant's own interest when offered by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1101; Dec. Dig. § 271.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 178*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

A transfer company in the habit of hauling goods for a consignee and others in a town is only the agent of the consignee, as concerning notice to the agent as to goods actually hauled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 680, 681; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 178*)—NOTICE TO AGENT.

Where, in an action against a carrier for its failure to notify the consignee of the arrival of freight and the charges thereon, it appeared that a transfer company was in the habit of hauling goods for the consignee and others, but there was no evidence that the company was told to haul the freight in question, evidence of notice to the transfer company of the arrival of the freight was properly excluded, in the absence of proof that such notice, if given, was communicated to the consignee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 680, 681; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENTS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where the original complaint in an action against a carrier demanded judgment for the value of goods received for transportation but not delivered, and for the penalty provided in Revisal 1905, § 2632, an amendment alleging that the carrier failed to notify plaintiff of the arrival of the goods and the charges thereon, as required by section 2633, and demanding the penalty imposed by the section, did not state a cause of action different from that set up in the original complaint, and the allowance of the amendment was in the discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 686-709; Dec. Dig. § 248.*]

5. COMMERCE (§ 33*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Where goods received by a carrier for transportation from a point outside of the state to a point within the state were misssent, and the carrier rebilled the goods from a point in the state to the point of destination over the line of another carrier, which received and transported the goods, the transportation by the latter carrier was not an interstate shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

6. COMMERCE (§ 33*)—INTERSTATE COMMERCE—INTERFERENCE BY STATES.

Revisal 1905, § 2633, requiring a carrier to inform the consignee of the freight charges and to deliver the freight on tender or payment of the charges, subject to a penalty for failure to do so, is not invalid as interfering with interstate commerce, a failure to deliver freight not being interstate commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 959*)—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—REVIEW.

The refusal to permit defendant to amend his answer so as to plead the statute of limitations, being a matter of discretion for the trial court, is not reviewable.

8. CARRIERS (§ 191*)—ACTION FOR NONDELIVERY OF FREIGHT—COUNTERCLAIM FOR WAREHOUSE CHARGES.

A carrier, wrongfully withholding and refusing to deliver freight, when sued therefor cannot counterclaim for warehouse charges.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by S. Hockfield against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This was a civil action instituted before a justice of the peace. The plaintiff did not file any written complaint. The summons required the defendant "to answer the complaint of plaintiff for the nonpayment of $200 and interest from August 21, 1907, until paid, $97, value of box of pants shipped him by Manhattan Pants Company, and $103, penalty for delay in such case provided in section 2632, Revisal of 1905."

The defendant filed a written answer in the justice's court denying that it was indebted to plaintiff, and set up a counterclaim for $25 for storage of the box of pants. The justice gave judgment for $93, value of the goods, and $50. The case was carried by appeal to the superior court. The plaintiff was allowed to amend and allege that "the defendant received at Durham, N. C., the box of pants addressed to plaintiff at Durham; that the defendant, upon the arrival of said box of goods so addressed to plaintiff as consignee, failed to notify plaintiff of its arrival and the charges thereon, as required by section 2633 of Revisal of 1905, and for such failure demands the sum of $50, as penalty imposed by said section 2633 of Revisal of 1905."

The jury responded to the issues as follows: "(1) What is the value of the case of pants shipped to plaintiff? Ans. $93. (2) Did defendant unlawfully refuse to deliver the case of pants to plaintiff? Ans. Yes. (3) Did defendant, upon the arrival of the case of pants, notify plaintiff, the consignee, of the arrival and the charge for transportation upon the same? Ans. No. (4) What damage, if any, by way of penalty, is plaintiff entitled to recover of defendant? Ans. $50. (5) What amount, if anything, by way of counterclaim for storage is defendant entitled to recover of the plaintiff? Ans. Nothing." Judgment accordingly. Appeal by defendant.

Guthrie & Guthrie, for appellant. Manning & Foushee, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. The plaintiff introduced two of the four paragraphs of the answer filed before the justice of the peace. The defendant offered the other two paragraphs. In Lewis v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 382, 43 S. E. 919, it is said: "Where a paragraph of an answer admits a specific fact, and in another part of the same paragraph denies the allegations of the corresponding paragraph of the complaint, the plaintiff is entitled to introduce the admission without introducing the part denying the allegations of the complaint." Here the paragraphs of the answer put in evidence by the plaintiff were complete in themselves, and it was not error to exclude the distinct averments in its own interest made by the defendant. It could put on evidence in support of them at the trial. Stewart v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 385, 48 S. E. 793.

A transfer company was in the habit of hauling goods for plaintiff and others, but that only made it the agent of plaintiff as to goods actually hauled. There was no evidence that the transfer company was told to haul these goods, and it was not error to exclude a question asked of an agent of such transfer company to show notice given to him of plaintiff's goods being in the depot, when there was no evidence that such notice, if given, was communicated to the plaintiff. The plaintiff testified that he applied for the goods in person repeatedly.

The court allowed the plaintiff to amend its complaint, and the defendant to amend its answer, but not to plead the statute of limitations. The amendment did not set up a cause of action wholly different, but merely amended complaint to claim the penalty of $50 under Revisal 1905, § 2633. Such amendment was in the discretion of the court, as was also the refusal of an amendment pleading the statute of limitations. Parker v. Harden, 122 N. C. 111, 28 S. E. 962; Goodwin v. Fertilizer Co., 123 N. C. 162, 31 S. E. 373.

The fourth exception is abandoned. The fifth exception presents the contention that this is an interstate shipment, and that Revisal, § 2633, does not apply. It is true that the shipment originated at Baltimore, Md., but it seems to have gotten "missent" and left its route, which was via Dunn, N. C., thence over Durham & Southern Railroad to Durham, N. C. The defendant's answer avers that by reason of said error or mistake the A. C. L. Railroad Company "rebilled" the goods from Selma to Durham over defendant's line, and that it received and transported the goods by virtue of said Selma to Durham, B/L, and that the original waybill or B/L from Baltimore to Durham never came into its possession. Clearly this is an intrastate matter. But if it had been an interstate transaction, the penalty imposed by Revisal, § 2633, has nothing to do with interstate transportation, but deals only with the neglect of duty of the defendant after the transportation was fully completed and the goods lay in its warehouse, not in the cars, at Durham. The plaintiff demanded his goods again and again, but the defendant would not make out its freight charges nor deliver the goods. The penalty laid by Revisal 1905, § 2633, has been held not a burden on interstate commerce (Harrill v. Railroad, 144 N. C. 532, 57 S. E. 388), and indeed the failure to deliver freight is not interstate commerce (Morris v. Express Co., 146 N. C. 171, 59 S. E. 667, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 983).

Exception 6 is for refusal to permit defendant to amend answer so as to plead the statute of limitations. This was a matter of discretion, and not reviewable.

The defendant still has the goods, and the plaintiff has been sued by consignor and been forced to pay their value, with court costs added. There is no possible ground for defendant's counterclaim for warehouse charges on goods it wrongfully withheld and refused to deliver.

No error.

STATE v. ROBERSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 146*)—PRESUMPTIONS OF MALICE.

Where defendant admits that he killed deceased with a pistol, the law presumes malice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 269; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 147*)—DEGREES—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Though malice is presumed from the fact that defendant shot deceased, the burden is on the prosecution to show such deliberation and premeditation as to justify a conviction of murder in the first degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 272, 272½; Dec. Dig. § 147.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 269*)—PREMEDITATION—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence in a murder case held to justify submitting the question of premeditation and deliberation to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 563; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 169*)—EXECUTION OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for murder, it appeared that defendant and R. had been employed by deceased, and that there was a dispute about their wages; that defendant was armed, and after threatening to make trouble for deceased, if he did not get his money, went to the shop of deceased and shot him. Defendant sought to show that just before going to the shop R. came along the street, and said to him, "I have got mine," and that he then went to the shop to get his wages, thinking that deceased had concluded to pay his men, but the court excluded the remark of R. Held, that the ruling was not error, as such remark threw no light on the question of defendant's premeditated intention to shoot deceased, unless he received his money, and could not have affected the result.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 169.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 14*)—"PREMEDITATION" AND "DELIBERATION."

By "premeditation" and "deliberation" is meant that "the reason and judgment is exercised, that the fact of the killing is weighed and considered, and that as a result there is in the mind the fixed purpose to kill, which must precede the act of killing, although the length of time between its formation and the killing is not material."

7. HOMICIDE (§ 286*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

An instruction "that killing with a deadly weapon raises a presumption of malice" is not subject to the objection that the jury might have understood the court to mean that such killing "raised the presumption of murder in the first degree."

Walker and Hoke, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Martin County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Robert Roberson was convicted of murder in the first degree, and appeals. No error.

Wheeler Martin and Winston & Everett, for appellant. Attorney General Bickett, for the State.

BROWN, J. 1. The most important contention made by the prisoner upon this appeal is that there is no evidence of a premeditated and deliberate homicide. The prisoner having admitted that he slew the deceased with a pistol, the law presumes malice, but nevertheless places the burden on the state to fully satisfy the jury that it was deliberately and premeditatedly done, to justify a conviction of murder in the first degree. The state examined several witnesses, whose testimony, set out fully in the record, tends strongly to prove that the prisoner and Will Roberson had been employed by deceased, and that there was a dispute about their wages, which had greatly incensed prisoner. On the day of the homicide prisoner armed himself with a pistol, and threatened that, unless the deceased paid him his money, he was going to give him trouble about it; that he had the pistol in his bosom while at the shop of one Moore, and there made threats against deceased that, if he did not pay him, he would give him trouble; that he took the pistol from his bosom and started from Moore's place towards the butcher shop of deceased near by. The butcher shop has a lattice window, which was raised. Deceased was inside, leaning on the butcher's block. Prisoner fired at him three times from the outside of the market house, and then ran. The evidence tends to prove that deceased was unarmed, that a small knife was on the block, and a hatchet under the counter, but that deceased had hold of neither. The only witness examined for the prisoner was the prisoner himself. His evidence makes out a clear case of self-defense. He testifies that he saw Will Roberson come from Whichard's shop, and that Will said, "I have got mine"; that he went to the shop to get his money, and asked deceased for it; that deceased cursed him, and refused to pay him; that the deceased grabbed the hatchet, and endeavored to kill prisoner; and that then prisoner fired on him. We think that the evidence was amply sufficient to justify his honor in submitting the question of premeditation and deliberation to the jury. The prisoner was angry with deceased about the wages he claimed. He had armed himself with a pistol the morning of the homicide, and concealed it in his bosom. He made threats against the deceased that, unless he was paid, he would give deceased trouble. Such threats, coupled with the character of the weapon with which the prisoner had armed himself, justify the inference that he meant to kill or do serious bodily harm. He carried the pistol concealed, but took it out at the market house, and fired at the unarmed man from the outside of the structure, as deceased was leaning on the block, and repeated his fire until he had shot three times, and then ran. From these facts, supported by abundant evidence, the inference that the shooting was deliberately and purposely done, with intent to kill if the prisoner did not get his money, is well warranted. State v. Hunt, 134 N. C. 684, 47 S. E. 49, State v. Teachey, 138 N. C. 587, 50 S. E. 232, State v. Exum, 138 N. C. 599, 50 S. E. 283, State v. Daniel, 139 N. C. 549, 51 S. E. 858, and State v. Conly, 130 N. C. 683, 41 S. E. 534, are cases somewhat in point. The prisoner was evidently "taking the law in his own hands," and avenging his own wrongs. In this connection we may well quote from an eminent English writer: "Let it be observed that in all possible cases deliberate homicide upon a principle of revenge is murder. No man, under the protection of the law, is to be the avenger of his own wrongs. If they are of such a nature for which the laws of society will give him an adequate remedy, thither he ought to resort, but be they of what nature soever, he ought to bear his lot with patience." Foster's Crown Law, 296.

2. J. D. Moore, a witness for the state, testified: "I was sitting in front of my shop when I heard the report of a pistol, and saw the prisoner shoot Whichard three times, and then run." "Just before the shooting the prisoner was sitting down at my stove and talking to me. He said that Whichard (the deceased) owed him some money, and he was going to have it or give Whichard some trouble about it. After a while he got up and went immediately to the market. He took his pistol out of his shirt front and commenced firing. I saw Will Roberson come across the railroad from Whichard's market just before the defendant went there." On cross-examination of this witness the prisoner proposed to show that Will Roberson, who had been at work with the prisoner for Whichard, came from Whichard and held up some money, and said to prisoner, "I got mine." Defendant's counsel stated that the purpose was to show that witness induced defendant to think that Whichard had changed his mind, and was paying off, and that this showed why defendant went to the market. This evidence, on objection by the state, was excluded and defendant excepted. We are of opinion that the rejected evidence tended to throw no light upon the real question at issue, and could not possibly have been of any value to the prisoner had it been admitted, and could not have affected the result. The reason assigned for its competency is that this declaration of Will Roberson conveyed to the prisoner the information that Will Roberson had received his money, and induced the prisoner to go at once to Whichard in order to get his pay, in the belief that he would get it, and thus to disprove any premeditation. The rejected declaration is a circumstance tending to prove only one fact, viz., that the prisoner went to Whichard's market to demand the money he claimed that Whichard owed him, but it failed to throw any light whatever upon the prisoner's purpose in case Whichard still refused to pay him. It was offered solely upon the question of premeditation and upon no other phase of the case, and if it fails to disprove that, then it is worthless for any purpose. An examination of the evidence and contentions of the state and of the prisoner discloses the worthlessness of the rejected declaration. The evidence of the state is very strong, and tends to prove that prisoner armed himself and went to the deceased intending to kill him, or do him bodily harm, only in the event that he did not get his money, that he did not get his money, and that, without any sort of provocation, he shot the deceased, who was unarmed, three times and killed him. The defense of the prisoner is self-defense, and rests entirely upon his own evidence. It is evident that the jury utterly rejected the prisoner's evidence, or else they must have acquitted him. Had they credited his evidence, they could not have done otherwise under the instructions of his honor. It is thus perfectly plain that the rejection of the declaration of Will Roberson, "I got mine," did not in the least affect or detract from the prisoner's defense. Did the rejection of it militate in any degree against prisoner upon the question of premeditation? The state did not contend that the prisoner went to the market armed, and with one purpose to kill the deceased in any event, but only in the event that deceased refused to pay him. The deceased did refuse, and the prisoner carried out his previously formed purpose and killed him. The rejected declaration tends to prove why prisoner went to the market at the time he did, viz., to get his money, a fact admitted by the state, and, had he received his money, there would have been no homicide. But the contention and evidence of the state is that the prisoner went to the market to get his money, and that he intended to kill the deceased only in the event he failed to do so. The rejected declaration throws no light whatever on prisoner's intentions in case of such failure. On the contrary, the decided probability is that the knowledge that the deceased had paid Will Roberson, and refused to pay him, "added fuel to the flame," and but hardened the prisoner's previously formed purpose to kill the deceased if he did not pay him.

3. The prisoner submitted some prayers for instruction upon the question of premeditation, and excepted because the court declined to give them, and further specifically excepted to the charge of the court as follows: "By 'premeditation' and 'deliberation' is meant that the reason and judgment is exercised, that the fact of the killing is weighed and considered, and that as a result there is in the mind the fixed purpose to kill. The fixed purpose to kill must precede the act of killing, although the length of time between the time it is formed and carried into effect is not material." "This premeditation and deliberation, like any other fact, may be shown by circumstances, and in determining there was such, the jury may consider evidence of absence of provocation, absence of a quarrel at the time of the killing, and threats, if there is such evidence. Not that you are compelled to find premeditation and deliberation from such evidence, but that, if there is such evidence, you may consider it in determining whether there was such premeditation and deliberation as I have indicated." Almost every word in this charge has been repeatedly upheld by this court. It follows all the decisions from Fuller's Case, 114 N. C. 885, 19 S. E. 797, to Banks' Case, 143 N. C. 652, 57 S. E. 174. The charge is substantially the charge which was approved by this court in State v. Teachey, 138 N. C. 598, 50 S. E. 232. See, also, State v. Exum, supra; State v. Booker, 123 N. C. 713, 31 S. E. 376. The prisoner excepts to the following charge: "Malice, which is a necessary element of murder in the first and second degrees, means killing without legal excuse, and is presumed from killing with a deadly weapon." This is a correct proposition of law. The killing with a deadly weapon raises a presumption of malice. That is all the charge says. There is no intimation that it raises a presumption of murder in the first degree. Such a charge would be obnoxious to Lochler's Case, 118 N. C. 1154, 24 S. E. 410. In another part of the charge the court gave the jury explicit instructions that the defendant must have weighed and determined the matter, and formed a fixed purpose to kill, and must have killed as a consequence of this fixed purpose. The portion of the charge excepted to is evidently a part of the judge's charge that murder is the unlawful killing of another with malice aforethought, and that killing with a deadly weapon raises a presumption of malice. The jury could not, in any view of the charge as to deliberation and premeditation, have possibly thought that the judge intended to say that the killing with a deadly weapon raised a presumption of murder in the first degree, and as a matter of fact the judge did not say it. The able and painstaking judge who tried this case below delivered a most exhaustive and clear charge to the jury, in which he did the prisoner full justice.

We have examined the entire record, and each exception taken, with the care demanded in a matter of such solemnity, and we find no error of which the prisoner can justly complain.

No error.

WALKER, J. (dissenting). While I concur with the majority in the rulings upon the other exceptions, I think the court below erred in not admitting what was said and done by Will Roberson, in the presence and hearing of the defendant, before he went to the market for the purpose of seeing Whichard about his wages. That he went there to get his money was shown by the testimony of the state's witness J. D. Moore, for he told Moore, not that he intended to give Whichard trouble because he had refused to pay him, but that he intended to have his money, or give Whichard some trouble, implying that he would first demand it of Whichard. The defendant and Will Roberson had worked together for Whichard, and the latter had before refused to pay their wages. It seems that afterwards Whichard changed his mind, and paid Will Roberson what was due to him, and the latter then, in the presence of the defendant and J. D. Moore, held up his hand with the money in it, and said, "I have got mine." We must assume this to be true, as the court excluded the testimony. This was not hearsay evidence. It was itself a fact or circumstance, and its competency and relevancy depend upon what impression it made on the mind of the defendant. It was surely competent for the defendant to show, if he could, that he went to see Whichard with a peaceful, and not a hostile, purpose. The state had introduced evidence tending to show that his purpose was a hostile one, and any fact or circumstance tending to show the contrary would seem to be relevant to the issue. It was not an unreasonable inference for the defendant to draw from what Will Roberson said and did that Whichard had changed his mind, and intended to pay both of them what he owed. Why should he pay the one, and not the other? They had both worked under the same circumstances, and were equally entitled to their hire. No reason appears from the evidence why he should distinguish between them or discriminate against the defendant. The jury may have convicted the defendant of murder in the first degree because they found from his previous threat, or the conversation with Moore, that he went to the market with the deliberate intent to kill Whichard, and not that he had formed his purpose to kill after he had reached there. In this view it was material for the defendant to show, if he could, that he approached Whichard with no homicidal intent, but believing from what he had heard Will Roberson say that he would receive his wages, and would have no trouble with Whichard. The jury should have been permitted to hear the excluded evidence, so that they might determine, in the light of all the facts and circumstances, whether there had been premeditation and deliberation on the part of the defendant. I cannot say the evidence was so slight as to render harmless the ruling of the court by which it was rejected. The state of the defendant's mind was the question involved. If the evidence had been admitted, and upon it, when considered in connection with the other facts, the jury had found that the defendant went to see Whichard for the sole purpose of getting his money, thinking that Whichard would pay him as he had paid Will Roberson, and that there would be no trouble, the question of premeditation and deliberation would naturally have been restricted to evidence of what occurred after the defendant had reached the market. It is true the jury, with the evidence admitted, might have found that the defendant had fully made up his mind to kill Whichard if he refused to pay his wages, although he may have thought that he would get his money without any trouble, but the question of premeditation and deliberation must be decided by the jury from all the facts as they may find them to be, and the slightest circumstance, forming substantially a part of the res geste, and closely connected with the act of killing, may sometimes turn the scales in favor of the defendant.

If we are permitted to draw only that inference from the rejected testimony which is favorable to the state and unfavorable to the defendant, it may be the judge's ruling was correct, but is this the proper method of interpretation? Where the question is one of intent, the slightest circumstance, especially where it accompanies an act of the defendant immediately preceding the homicide, may be of sufficient weight to change the verdict. The jury, in this case, may have rejected the plea of self-defense, and convicted the defendant for the very reason that the testimony he offered was excluded by the court, as he was thereby left with nothing except his own testimony (viewed, of course, with some suspicion) and the state's testimony as to the threat alleged to have been made to J. D. Moore. If he had, at one time, conceived the purpose to kill Whichard in the event of his refusal to pay him, may not the jury have found upon the rejected testimony, if it had been admitted, that he had abandoned that purpose, and approached Whichard fully believing that there would be no occasion for trouble, as there was no reason why he should not be paid which did not apply with equal force to Will Roberson. The question was as to the state of his mind when he went to the market, where Whichard was, and not what he may have decided to do after Whichard refused to pay him, if there was such refusal. The defendant was entitled to have the jury consider every fact or circumstance tending to enlighten them upon this question. The exclusion of the evidence was tantamount to an absolute acceptance of the state's theory, and the truth of the evidence supporting it, that he went to the market for the purpose of killing Whichard if he refused to pay his wages. It is true the rejected testimony tended to prove that the defendant went to collect his money, but this is not all it tended to prove, as I have shown.

HOKE, J., concurs in dissenting opinion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Death action by Mollie C. Parker against the North Carolina Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Guthrie & Guthrie, for appellant. V. S. Bryant, Aycock & Winston, and A. L. Brooks, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, which is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's lessee, the Southern Railway Company. It is alleged in the complaint that prior to August 6, 1907, the defendant leased its road, fixtures, and franchise to the defendant for a term of years, and that on said day "the defendant's lessee, by and with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the defendant, was operating freight and passenger trains along said line of railway," the intestate being one of its locomotive engineers, and that, while so employed and engaged in the performance of his duty, he was killed by the collision of the engine, which was then in his charge as engineer, and a train of the defendant's lessee, and that the collision was caused by the negligence of the said lessee. The defendant demurred, upon the ground that it did not sufficiently appear in the complaint that the lease was in force at the time the plaintiff's intestate was killed, nor that the intestate was acting under instructions given by the said lessee. We have stated only the substance of the complaint and demurrer. The court overruled the demurrer, and permitted the defendant to answer, and to this ruling the defendant excepted and appealed. We do not entertain any doubt as to the correctness of the ruling of the court. It appears, at least substantially, in the complaint, that at the time the intestate was killed the Southern Railway Company was operating the railway of the defendant as its lessee, and that the intestate was in the employ of the lessee and in the discharge of his duty as one of its engineers. That the defendant, as lessor, is liable for the negligent killing of the intestate by its lessee, has been settled by numerous decisions of this court. Logan v. Railroad, 116 N. C. 940, 21 S. E. 959; Brown v. Railroad, 181 N. C. 455, 42 S. E. 911.

The plaintiff contended in this court that the demurrer was frivolous, and judgment by default and inquiry should have been entered in the court below, and that we should direct such a judgment to be entered. But he did not move for judgment, as required by Revisal 1905, § 560, which provides that "if a demurrer, answer or reply be frivolous, the party prejudiced thereby may apply to the court or to the judge thereof for judgment thereon, and judgment may be given accordingly." See, also, Revisal 1905, § 472. Nor did the plaintiff except to the judge's order and appeal. The judge had the discretion to permit the defendant to answer after he had overruled the demurrer, even if it was frivolous. Dunn v. Barnes, 73 N. C. 278; Clark's Code (3d Ed.) p. 295, § 272, and notes.

The case of Morgan v. Harris, 141 N. C. 360, 54 S. E. 382, is directly in point. The Chief Justice, speaking for the court, says: "When a demurrer is overruled, the defendant is entitled to answer over as a matter of right, 'if it appear that the demurrer was interposed in good faith.' Revisal 1905, § 506. But, when the demurrer or answer is frivolous, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment, unless the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, permits the defendant to answer over. This was not done here, because the judge did not hold the demurrer frivolous, and leave to answer was, therefore, not necessary. The refusal to hold a demurrer or answer frivolous, and to render judgment thereon, is not appealable. Walters v. Starnes, 118 N. C. 842, 24 S. E. 713; Abbott v. Hancock, 123 N. C. 89, 31 S. E. 271, where the reasons are given. The plaintiff's appeal must, therefore, be dismissed; but when the case goes back, with this judgment holding the demurrer to be frivolous, the plaintiff will be entitled to judgment by default, unless the court below is of the opinion that, in the exercise of a sound discretion, the facts justify permission to answer over. Revisal 1905, § 1279."

The case of Walters v. Starnes, 118 N. C. 842, 24 S. E. 713, cited by the plaintiff, does not sustain his position. The court, in that case, merely held that the demurrer was frivolous, contrary to the ruling of the judge, but did not direct judgment to be given in the superior court for the plaintiff. It was left with the judge to exercise his discretion.

No error.

IN RE DENNY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

INSANE PERSONS (§ 33*)—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN—FINDINGS.

A finding on a lunacy inquisition that D. was incompetent to manage her own affairs, but was not wholly deprived of her reason, was a sufficient finding to justify the appointment of a guardian for her, under Revisal 1905, § 1890, authorizing the appointment of a guardian for persons who are incompetent from want of understanding to manage their own affairs, by reason of excessive use of intoxicating drinks "or other cause."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insane Persons, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Person County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Application for the appointment of a guardian for Melissa Denny on an inquisition of lunacy. The jury returned a verdict finding that Melissa Denny was incompetent from want of understanding to manage her own affairs, but that she was not totally deprived of her reason, on which the clerk refused to appoint a guardian, and dismissed the petition. On appeal to the superior court the clerk was overruled, and the appointment of a guardian directed, from which the lunatic appeals. Affirmed.

Aycock & Winston, Bryant & Brogden, and L. M. Carlton, for appellant. W. T. Bradsher and N. Lunsford, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This proceeding is brought under Revisal 1905, § 1890, which was Code, § 1670. This section clearly makes four classes of persons for whom a guardian may be appointed, namely: (1) Idiots; (2) lunatics; (3) inebriates; and (4) those who are incompetent from want of understanding to manage their own affairs by reason of the excessive use of intoxicating drinks or other cause. The verdict of the jury settles the fact that Melissa Denny belongs to the fourth class, and is a sufficient finding. In re Anderson, 132 N. C. 243, 43 S. E. 649; Sims v. Sims, 121 N. C. 298, 28 S. E. 407, 40 L. R. A. 737, 61 Am. St. Rep. 665. Armstrong v. Short, 8 N. C. 11, was decided under chapter 15, p. 383, Laws 1784, when such inquisition was limited to the first three classes: (1) Idiots; (2) lunatics; (3) inebriates. The fourth class was added by Code, § 1670.

The same point now presented came up in re Anderson, 132 N. C. 243, 43 S. E. 649, where it was held that a finding that Anderson was "not an idiot or lunatic, but that he was of unsound mind and incompetent from want of understanding to manage his own affairs," was "sufficient to meet the language and the spirit of the statute." The finding herein is in the exact language of the statute. The cause of such want of understanding would often be impossible to assign, and the jury is not required to find it. It is the fact of a want of understanding sufficient to manage her own affairs which requires the court to appoint a guardian, whatever the cause. The appointment of a guardian is not restricted to cases where the want of sufficient understanding is due to the excessive use of intoxicating drinks, but extends to cases where it is due to "other cause." It is said in re Anderson, supra, that the provision creating the fourth class may be subject to abuse, but that the sole function of the court is to construe and apply the law. The same case upholds the jurisdiction upon the same procedure.

Revisal 1905, § 1890, is somewhat stronger than Code, § 1670 (under which in re Anderson, supra, was decided), in that it adds the words, "Incompetent person," so that the concluding paragraph of Revisal 1905, § 1890, reads: "And he [the clerk] shall proceed to appoint a guardian of any person so found to be an idiot, inebriate, lunatic, or incompetent person."

No error.

CAMP MFG. CO. v. DURHAM FERTILIZER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 849*)—ASSIGNMENT—WARRANTY.

There is an implied warranty on the part of the assignor of a judgment that it is a valid, subsisting obligation against the debtor for the amount specified therein, and has not been paid, in whole or in part.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1560; Dec. Dig. § 849.*]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 95*)—ASSIGNMENT OF JUDGMENT.

Where plaintiff acquired knowledge on April 25, 1904, that summons had never been served on one of the persons against whom a judgment assigned to plaintiff by defendant had been rendered, and that as to such alleged judgment debtor the judgment was invalid, but plaintiff commenced no action against his assignor, either for money had and received, for deceit, or breach of an implied warranty that the judgment was valid, until October 14, 1907, the action then brought was barred by the three-year statute of limitations (Clark's Code [3d Ed.] § 115, subsec. 9).

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 473; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; Long, Judge.

Action by the Camp Manufacturing Company against the Durham Fertilizer Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Action to recover the sum of $860, being the principal, together with interest thereon from January 1, 1893, of a judgment recovered by the defendant at March term, 1893, of the superior court of Durham county, against J. F. Newsome, Robert Holloman, and W. E. Jenkins. This judgment on March 21, 1901, was assigned to plaintiff by defendant "for value received and without recourse on it"; the real consideration paid for the assignment being $75. The defendant pleaded that it was not liable under the terms of the assignment and the several statutes of limitations. From a judgment upon a "case agreed," dismissing the action, the plaintiff appeals.

Winborne & Lawrence and Manning & Foushee, for appellants. F. L. Fuller, for appellee.

BROWN, J. (after stating the facts as above). In the statement of facts it appears that the judgment assigned was entirely regular upon its face. It afterwards transpired that, while purporting to have been served on the defendant Jenkins, in fact the summons had never been served on him. The defendant admits the general rule to be that there is an implied warranty on the part of the assignor of a judgment that such judgment is a valid, subsisting obligation against the debtor for the amount specified therein, and has not been paid in whole or in part. But it is contended that the use of the words "without recourse on it," in the transfer of the judgment involved in this action, relieved the assignor of that implied warranty. It is further insisted that the plaintiff's cause of action is barred by lapse of time.

The first proposition of the defendant is sustained by a very strong opinion of the Georgia Supreme Court in Thompson v. Bank, 102 Ga. 696, 29 S. E. 610; but it is unnecessary to pass on it here, as we are clearly of opinion the action is barred, whether it be considered as an action for money had and received, for deceit, or for breach of an implied warranty. The action could not well be maintained on either of the two first-mentioned grounds, as there is not a total failure of consideration, or any fact tending to indicate deceit or fraud. The judgment is valid against the other two defendants, and may eventually be made out of them; and it is admitted that this defendant believed it to be valid as to the other defendant therein, and that it purported on its face to be so. It is admitted that the plaintiff had knowledge on April 25, 1904, that the summons had never been served on Jenkins, and that as to him the judgment was invalid. In any view the plaintiff's cause of action accrued then. It could have then commenced action at once for a breach of the implied covenant of warranty, and, upon establishing that the judgment was invalid, it could have recovered damage, unless prevented by the words of the assignment. As more than three years had elapsed before the commencement of this action on October 14, 1907, it would appear that, giving the plaintiff the benefit of the three-year statute, his cause is barred. Clark's Code (3d Ed.) § 115, subsec. 9, and cases cited.

It is contended by defendant that the cause of action accrued at date of the assignment, March 21, 1901, and authority is cited in support of that proposition; but it is unnecessary to consider it, as we are clear that, giving the plaintiff the benefit of the shortest period which, under our statutes, can apply to this transaction, the cause of action, if any ever accrued, is barred.

Affirmed.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 680*)—POWER TO GRANT GAS FRANCHISES.

Elizabeth City Charter (Priv. Laws 1905, p. 45, c. 15) § 19, authorizing ordinances for the government of the city not inconsistent with the laws of the state to secure order, health, quiet, and safety, does not authorize the grant of a gas franchise including the right to pipe streets for furnishing gas to customers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 680.*]

3. GAS (§ 7*)—POWER TO GRANT GAS "FRANCHISE."

The right to place gas pipes and mains in the public streets of a city for the distribution of gas for use is a franchise, the privilege of exercising which can only be granted by the state or by the municipal government of the city acting under legislative authority.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2929-2941; vol. 8, p. 7666.]

4. GAS (§ 6*)—"FRANCHISE"—"LICENSE"—"PROPERTY."

A gas "franchise" is property, a vested right protected by the Constitution, while a "license" is a mere personal privilege, and revocable, except in rare instances and under peculiar conditions.

5. GAS (§ 7*)—VALIDITY OF FRANCHISE—BREACH OF COVENANT BY GRANTEE—RIGHT OF ACTION.

Where the ordinance by which plaintiff city undertook to grant a gas franchise to defendant was ultra vires and void, there was no consideration for the covenants made by defendant in relation thereto, and no action lies on the collateral bond for breach thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Pasquotank County; Gulon, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth City against D. B. Banks and the Fidelity Deposit & Trust Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The pleadings, upon which judgment was rendered, disclose this case: On the application of defendant D. B. Banks, the plaintiff, a municipal corporation, duly chartered by the General Assembly of North Carolina, through its mayor and aldermen on June 19, 1905, undertook to grant to said Banks by an ordinance duly passed on July 3, 1905, a franchise extending 30 years to construct in said town a gas plant for the purpose of furnishing gas for light, fuel, and power to the citizens of Elizabeth City. Said franchise carried the right to use the streets of said city as the said Banks deems necessary and requisite for the purpose of laying pipes and other devices incidental and necessary to the establishment, location, and operation of said plant. Permission is given said Banks to use alleys, lanes, highways, streets, bridges, and streams within the limits of said city; also to place poles and string wires along the streets, etc. Permission is given said Banks to contract with the citizens of said town for furnishing gas for light, fuel, and power and to contract with the town of Elizabeth City for said purpose. Maximum rates which said Banks was to charge the citizens for gas were fixed in said ordinance. The city reserved the right to buy the plant at the end of 10 years at a price to be fixed by arbitration. In consideration of the grant of the franchise, Banks contracted with the city that he would begin the erection of said gas plant within 9 months from the passage of the ordinance and complete the same within 21 months from said date, subject to certain contingencies named. For the purpose of securing the performance of the covenants entered into by him, and in consideration of the grant of said franchise, the defendant Banks, as principal and the defendant Fidelity Deposit & Trust Company, executed to plaintiff a bond in the sum of $5,000, conditioned that, if the said Banks should fail to comply with the stipulations in said contract, they would pay to said city $5,000 as liquidated damages; it being recited therein that "in the opinion of the undersigned the said amount of $5,000 is not an unjust, absurd, or oppressive amount, but a fair and just compensation to be paid upon the failure," etc. Plaintiff alleges that defendant Banks began the construction of the plant within 9 months, but failed to complete the same within 21 months. Defendant admitted the execution of the bond, but denied that the plaintiff had any corporate power to grant the franchise, and that its attempts to do so were utterly void; that, by reason thereof, there was no consideration to support the covenants made by Banks, the performance of which was secured by the bond, and that same were void; that, by reason of the absence of power to grant the franchise, the ordinance passed by the board of aldermen was ultra vires and void. Defendants also aver that defendant Banks began to construct said plant within nine months, but was prevented from completing it by the financial panic which overtook the country, rendering it impossible for him to procure the materials necessary for completing the work; that he asked for an extension of time, which was refused, etc. His honor, being of the opinion that the condition of the bond had been forfeited, and that the matter set up in the answer did not constitute a defense thereto, rendered judgment, upon the pleadings, for $5,000 and cost. Defendants excepted and appealed.

Aydlett & Ehringhaus and Edward Duffy, for appellants. J. Heywood Sawyer, Shepherd & Shepherd, Pruden & Pruden, and Geo. J. Spence, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The question which lies at the threshold of this case is whether, in the absence of any legislative authority, express or implied, the plaintiff, through its governing body, had any power to grant to the defendant Banks the franchise to use its streets in the manner set forth in the ordinance. It is conceded that prior to the enactment of section 2916, subsec. 6, Revisal, which became effective August 1, 1905, no such power was conferred upon municipal corporations by the General Statutes prescribing the powers of cities and towns. By that statute they are authorized "to grant, upon reasonable terms, franchises to public utilities." Looking, therefore, to the charter of the plaintiff (Priv. Laws 1905, p. 39, c. 15), we find no express power conferred upon the board of aldermen to grant franchises in or over the streets of the city. Section 19 confers the power to make such ordinances, as they may deem necessary, for the government of the city, not inconsistent with the laws of the land, and by all needful ordinances, to secure order, health, quiet, and safety within the city limits and for one mile beyond. Such special powers as are conferred are confined to passing ordinances relating to markets, fires, observance of the Sabbath, nuisances, powder, speed of riding and driving vehicles, keeping the sidewalks clear of obstructions, etc., regulating building material, regulating charges for hacks, omnibuses, and appointing inspectors of fish and meats. Provision is made for electing a street commissioner with power to keep in repair the streets, bridges, etc. The board of aldermen are given power to lay out and open streets, to extend or discontinue them, and to condemn land for these purposes. We find no grant of power to make provision for furnishing lights, power, or fuel or for establishing plants for that purpose. No question is presented upon this record in regard to the power by implication for providing for lighting the streets. This would doubtless be found, by necessary implication, in the power to regulate the streets, provide for the safety of the people, etc. This under the more recent decisions of this court would be not only an implied power, but a duty the discharge of which would involve a necessary expense. Fawcett v. Mt. Airy, 134 N. C. 125, 45 S. E. 1029, 63 L. R. A. 870, 101 Am. St. Rep. 825; Davis v. Fremont, 135 N. C. 538, 47 S. E. 671, and other cases reversing Thrift v. Elizabeth City, 122 N. C. 31, 30 S. E. 349, 44 L. R. A. 427. It will be noted that the contract made with defendant Banks makes no other provision for furnishing light for the streets than a permission to make a contract with the city for that purpose. He is under no obligation to do so. This question is therefore eliminated from the discussion. The purpose of granting the franchise is to permit defendant Banks to supply light, fuel, and power to the citizens of the town. He does not come under any obligation to furnish all of the citizens. It is true that maximum rates are prescribed, and the city reserves the power to buy the plant, after ten years, at a price to be fixed by arbitration. Whether the plant to be established by the defendant Banks is a public utility may be open to controversy, but our decision does not rest upon that question, and it is not necessary to discuss it. We assume, for the purpose of the decision, that it is a public utility. It is an elementary principle of law that a municipal as any other corporation can exercise only such powers as are expressly granted, or necessarily and fairly implied in, or incident to, the exercise of powers, which are granted. Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of the power is resolved against the corporation. 1 Dillon, Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) 89. Mr. Justice Bynum in Smith v. Newbern, 70 N. C. 14, 16 Am. Rep. 766, states the doctrine, approved by Judge Dillon, and uniformly followed by this court—in fact, so far as our examination goes, of all American courts. He says: "All corporations derive their powers from legislative grants, and can do no act for which authority is not expressly given or may not be reasonably inferred. But, if we say that they can do nothing for which a warrant could not be found in the language of their charter, we deny them in many cases the power of self-preservation, as well as many of the means necessary to effect the essential object of their creation. Hence they may exercise all the powers within the fair intent and purpose of their creation which are reasonably necessary to give effect to powers expressly granted." Reese, Ultra Vires, § 170; Railway v. Railway, 114 N. C. 725, 19 S. E. 697.

Applying this general principle to the case at bar, what power has a municipality, through its governing board, to use or permit the use of its streets for other than the purpose of a highway? It does not appear nor do we deem it at all material to inquire whether the city owns the fee in the soil over which the streets are laid out or only an easement. Whatever differences of opinion exist in respect to the rights of abutting owners in regard to the use of the streets for other than the purposes of highways do not affect the merits of this case. In either event the law is well settled that the title either of the fee in the soil or an easement is vested in the municipality in trust for the use of the people as and for a public highway, and that it cannot without legislative authority, divert them from this use. How far the power of the Legislature to permit other burdens to be imposed upon them may be exercised, without providing for compensation to the municipality, is not involved in this discussion, and we only refer to it to exclude any suggestion that, in defining the power of the Legislature to impose burdens upon the streets of a municipal corporation, we are referring to that question. We held in Brown v. Electric Co., 138 N. C. 533, 51 S. E. 62, 69 L. R. A. 631, 107 Am. St. Rep. 554, and Staton v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 428, 61 S. E. 455, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 949, that the Legislature could not do so without providing for compensation to the abutting owner. That the Legislature has very extensive powers over the public streets as a part of the public highways of the state is well settled, and that such power as the municipal authorities have are derived from legislative grant is equally well settled. Judge Dillon says: "Public streets, squares, and commons, unless there be some special restriction when the same are dedicated or acquired, are for the public use, and the use is none the less for the public at large as distinguished from the municipality because they are situated within the limits of the latter, and because the Legislature may have given the supervision, control, and regulation of them to the local authorities. The Legislature of the state represents the public at large and has, in the absence of special constitutional restraint and subject to the property rights and easements of the abutting owners, full and paramount authority over all public ways and public places." 2 Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) 656. That the commissioners of a town cannot, without legislative authority, sell a street or park, has been uniformly held by this court. Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 10 S. E. 689, 7 L. R. A. 548, 17 Am. St. Rep. 681; White v. Railroad, 113 N. C. 610, 18 S. E. 330, 22 L. R. A. 627, 37 Am. St. Rep. 639; Southport v. Stanly, 125 N. C. 465, 34 S. E. 641; Turner v. Commissioners, 127 N. C. 153, 37 S. E. 181. In White v. Railroad, supra, Shepherd, C. J., discusses the question in the light of the authorities: The opinion is amply sustained, both by reason and authority. When we look beyond our own jurisdiction for cases "in point," we find that the principle has been applied to attempted grants of franchises to put gas pipes in the streets. In Gaslight Co. v. Norwich Gas Co., 25 Conn. 19, it appears that the common council of the city, whose general powers are much the same as the board of aldermen of plaintiff, undertook by a resolution to confer upon the plaintiff an exclusive franchise for 15 years to lay and maintain its pipes over or under the streets of the city. Hinman, J., says: "The right of way over the streets being public to all who may have occasion to use them, and the only power of the city over them being given by its charter in order to regulate such use, it seems clear that the city can make no grant which shall convey to the grantee any interest in them which can in any proper sense be deemed property." The opinion is quoted with approval by Judge Dillon. 2 Mun. Corp. 693. The franchise in that case was exclusive, but, as will be seen, the decision is put upon the ground stated. The plaintiff also claimed the franchise under an act of the Legislature and in respect to this the court held that the grant of an exclusive franchise was void because of constitutional inhibition. In N. O. Gaslight Co. v. Light & Heat Co., 115 U. S. 659, 6 Sup. Ct. 252, 29 L. Ed. 516, it is held that the right to place gas pipes and mains in the public streets of a city for the distribution of gas for public and private use is a franchise, the privilege of exercising which can only be granted by the state or by the municipal government of the city acting under legislative authority. In State v. Cin. Gas Co., 13 Ohio St. 262, the court, holding the same opinion, said: "This franchise may be granted directly by the state or by a municipal corporation if it is clothed with power to make the grant. Such power in the municipality must either be expressly granted or arise out of the terms of the statute by necessary implication so direct and necessary as to be clearly conferred." Purnell v. McLane, 98 Md. 589, 56 Atl. 830. In Jersey City Gas Co. v. Dwight, 29 N. J. Eq. 242, Van Fleet, vice chancellor, says: "The defendants claim the right to use the public streets of Jersey City for the purpose of placing pipes therein, through which they may furnish gas to their customers. This is a right which the sovereign power alone can confer. The rule must be considered settled that no person can acquire a right to make a specific or exceptional use of a public highway not common to all the citizens of the state except by a grant from the sovereign power." In Boston v. Richardson, 13 Allen, 146, it is said that the right of putting gas pipes in public highways has never been exercised except by virtue of an express statute. Mobile v. L. & N. R. R., 124 Ala. 182, 26 South. 902; R. R. v. Ocola, etc., R. R., 39 Fla. 306, 22 South. 692; Gaslight Co. v. Middletown, 59 N. Y. 228. The authorities are quite uniform upon the subject.

The wisdom of putting the limitation upon the power of governing boards of towns and cities is apparent. If they be permitted, without express power known to the people who select them, to grant to persons and corporations franchises over the public streets, the arteries of business, social and community life would be to subject them to burdens unwisely or otherwise conferred, limiting and restricting their use by the people for whose benefit they have been laid out and by whose taxes they are maintained. In the absence of any express grant of power in the charter, it would be difficult if we adhere to the canons of construction of corporate charters to find it by implication. It will hardly be contended that the laying of gas pipes for the purpose of furnishing light, fuel, and power to the citizens by a private business enterprise is essential to, or implied in, the power to regulate and control the use of the streets. As we have seen, the courts have not found the power except as an express grant from the sovereign. If the attempt to confer the franchise upon defendant Banks is ineffectual because the plaintiff had no power to do so, the result is that the ordinance was ultra vires, and therefore void. The doctrine is strongly stated in Penn. R. R. v. Nat. Ry. Co., 23 N. J. Eq. 441: "Whether franchises are delegated by special charters or under general laws, they are emanations from the people in their sovereign capacity. What is not conferred is withheld, and remains in their original source. The attempt to exercise them by individuals or companies until so conferred can be nothing but an unwarrantable usurpation of power. This doctrine is rooted and grounded in the common law, and equally so in public policy and public expediency." If it be suggested that, while the ordinance was ineffectual to confer a franchise for 30 years, it was valid as a license, and protected defendant Banks from prosecution for maintaining a nuisance, the obvious answer is that a franchise is property, intangible it is true, but none the less property, a vested right protected by the Constitution, while a license is a mere personal privilege, and, except in rare instances and under peculiar conditions, revocable. The plaintiff did not undertake to give, or defendant to acquire, a license, but a franchise, upon the faith of which he was to invest a large sum of money and establish a business of permanent character. In the absence of power in the board of aldermen to grant a franchise in the streets, we can see no reason why the Legislature at the next or any future session could not, in the exercise of its right to control and prescribe the use to which streets might be subjected, have prohibited the defendant Banks from continuing to use the streets or maintain his pipes, lines, poles, and "other devices" thereon. Whether a succeeding board of aldermen would have been estopped to do so after the pipes were laid and the other means for maintaining and operating the plant established it is not necessary to decide. That corporations may, under some conditions, be estopped from avoiding ultra vires acts is settled, but the question does not arise upon this record because it does not appear that any substantial work was done under the authority of the ordinance, and the plaintiff declared the franchise forfeited under the terms of the grant. It is again suggested that the ordinance was ratified by the plaintiff subsequent to the act of 1905. Revisal 1905, § 2918.

Without discussing the question whether a contract void because ultra vires can be ratified, we find in the pleadings nothing to indicate a purpose to ratify or any act which is capable of being construed into a ratification. It is alleged in the complaint that defendant Banks failed to commence the erection of the plant within 9 months and to complete it within 21 months. The defendant Banks alleges that he laid a part of the pipes within nine months from the date of the ordinance. It does not appear that he laid any pipe after August 1, 1905, or that any other act was done by him in connection with the work. He has never used the franchise. The plaintiff does not allege any ratification or any act which could be so construed. If, as we have seen, the ordinance was void, because the plaintiff was without authority to grant the franchise, it is evident that the defendant Banks acquired nothing of any value by reason of its passage. If he had, in the performance of his covenant, begun the work within the prescribed period, he would have been liable to be enjoined or prosecuted for obstructing the streets. It is manifest that, as he acquired nothing, his covenants are without any consideration to support them. There is a total failure of consideration, and no action can be maintained for damages by either party. It is manifest that plaintiff cannot maintain an action for damages because of the failure of defendant to do an unlawful act—that is, obstruct the streets—which is indictable at common law. The plaintiff conferred no right upon the defendant Banks, and therefore can claim nothing from him on account of its unauthorized attempt to do so. We forbear discussing the other questions raised by defendants in their brief.

The judgment must be reversed, with direction to the superior court to set it aside, and take such further action as is in accordance with law.

Reversed.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 14, 1909.)

1. WILLS (§ 614*)—ESTATE CREATED—LIFE ESTATE—"DURING TERM OF HER WIDOWHOOD."

A devise to a widow "during the term of her widowhood, and, after her marriage," the property to be divided between other persons, creates in the widow only a life estate.

2. WILLS (§ 587*)—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—RESIDUE.

The provisions of a will for the sale of some of testator's property to pay debts and legacies, and that, if any surplus remains, it should go to his widow, do not make her the chief residuary legatee so as to vest in her the remainder in other property after her life estate therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by H. J. Sink and others against Mahaley Sink and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Walser & Walser, for appellants. E. E. Raper, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for waste alleged to have been committed by the defendants on the land described in the complaint, and for an injunction against the further commission of waste. The court virtually intimated that the plaintiffs could not recover, as under the will of William A. Sink his widow acquired a fee-simple estate, and not merely an estate for life. The plaintiffs excepted to the ruling, submitted to a non-suit, and appealed.

The decision of the case must turn upon the construction of the eleventh item of the will, which is as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife Mahaley the remainder of my land, after selling off, as directed in the 10th item, whatever there may be remaining, to have and to hold to her own proper use and behoof, to embrace my Mansion house and other out houses and improvements of the land I now live on, during the term of her widowhood, and after her marriage to be equally divided between my brother and sisters or their legal representatives share and share alike." W. A. Sink died without having had any children, leaving as his heirs at law a brother and sisters. In his will he directed that certain land and other property be sold to pay his debts and the legacies given in the will, and that if, after paying the same, any surplus remained, it should go to his widow Mahaley Sink. We are of opinion that the estate in the land devised to the widow could not endure beyond her life. Blackstone says that, if an estate be granted to a woman during her widowhood or to a man until he be promoted to a benefice, in these and similar cases, whenever the contingency happens, when the widow marries, or when the grantee obtains a benefice, the respective estates are absolutely determined and gone. Yet, while they subsist, they are reckoned estates for life; because, the time for which they will endure being uncertain, they may by possibility last for life, if the contingencies upon which they are to determine do not sooner happen. 2 Blk. 121. In Fuller v. Wilber, 170 Mass. 506, 49 N. E. 916, the devise was as follows: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife all my real and personal estate of whatever name, for her sole use and benefit so long as she remains my widow, except the legacies to my children." With reference to this devise the court, by Morton, J., said: "The first question in these cases is: What interest did the widow of Elijah Wilber take under her husband's will? There is some ground, perhaps, for saying that, with the exception of the legacies to the children, she took the entire estate absolutely and in fee, subject to be divested of it if she married again; but we think that the better construction, and the one which is according to the weight of authority, here and elsewhere, is that she took a life estate determinable on the happening of that event. Knight v. Mahoney, 152 Mass. 523, 25 N. E. 971, 9 L. R. A. 573; Loring v. Loring, 100 Mass. 340; Dole v. Johnson, 3 Allen (Mass.) 864; Mansfield v. Mansfield, 75 Me. 509, 512; Nash v. Simpson, 78 Me. 142, 147, 3 Atl. 53; Evan's Appeal, 51 Conn. 435; Cooper v. Pogue, 92 Pa. 254, 257, 37 Am. Rep. 681; 4 Kent, Com. 26, 27; 2 Bl. Com. 121; 1 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) 63. The words 'so long as she remains my widow' imply a continuance of the estate during widowhood, and no longer; and, at most, it could not extend beyond her life." In Kratz v. Kratz, 189 Ill. 276, 59 N. E. 519, the devise was to the wife during her widowhood of the real and personal estate "absolutely and unconditionally," and the court held that her interest was limited to the period of her widowhood—that is, during her life or until she remarried. See, also, Batterton v. Yoakum, 17 Ill. 288. This court decided in the case of In re Brook's Will, 125 N. C. 136, 34 S. E. 285, that where a testator devised all his property to his wife during her widowhood, with the condition that, "should she marry, then the law is my will," gave the widow no more than a life estate, as her death terminated her widowhood, and therefore her interest in the property. We have carefully examined the whole will, and can find nothing therein to change the settled meaning of the words used by the testator in devising certain land to his widow. There is no general residuary clause in the will. The direction to pay the surplus of any money arising from the sale of some of his real and personal property did not constitute her his general residuary devisee, so as to vest the remainder after her life estate in her. There are some expressions indicating a contrary purpose; that is, an intention that it should go to his heirs.

The cases cited by the defendants' counsel (Foust v. Ireland, 48 N. C. 184, and McKrow v. Painter, 89 N. C. 437) are not in point, as they were decided upon a construction of language quite different from that contained in the will now under consideration. In this will the devise to the widow is "during her widowhood," and hence is no more and no less than a devise for life. It is not in contemplation of law less than a devise for life, because it may, at her pleasure, endure for life. It is plainly an express limitation of the estate to her for life, subject to be divested in favor of the persons designated in the will as the ulterior devisees if she should remarry. Rausch v. Rausch (Sup.) 31 N. Y. Supp. 786; Dubois v. Van Valen, 61 N. J. Eq. 381, 48 Atl. 241; Patton v. Church, 168 Pa. 321, 31 Atl. 1079; 30 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 748.

There was error in the ruling of the court. The nonsuit will therefore be set aside.

Error.

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 102*)—ACCRUAL OF CAUSE OF ACTION—GUARDIANSHIP—ACCOUNTING.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 83*)—SUSPENSION OF STATUTE—DEATH OF DEBTOR.

Revisal 1905, § 367, provides that if a person entitled to sue die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement of the action, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced after the expiration of that time and within one year from his death, but, if the debtor dies, the action must be begun within one year after issuing letters testamentary or of administration. Held, that where there is at the death remaining unexpired any part of the time limited which part will expire in less than one year after issuing letters on the debtor's estate, the "one year" is not added to the statutory time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanly County; Webb, Judge.

Action by D. T. Lowder, administrator of Nancy Adderton, against T. A. Hathcock, Jr., administrator of T. A. Lowder. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. F. Klutz and J. R. Price, for appellant. R. L. Smith, R. E. Austin, and Montgomery & Crowell, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. T. A. Lowder qualified as guardian of Nancy Adderton, a lunatic, in 1854, and filed his last annual account in November, 1858. She died in 1887 or 1888, and D. T. Lowder qualified as her administrator November 9, 1901. T. A. Lowder, the guardian, died in 1890, and T. A. Hathcock qualified as his administrator September 13, 1899. The annual account filed in 1858 showed a balance then in hands of the guardian of $1,087.10, and this action is to recover said sum, with compound interest from that date. The guardian survived his ward 11 or 12 years, and, if action had been brought during his lifetime, doubtless he would have shown some disbursements on account of his ward in the 30 years between 1858 and 1887 or 1888, when she died, if not of all the fund. Of course, no statute runs against an express trust, but the express trust was terminated by her death (Parker v. Harden, 121 N. C. 58, 28 S. E. 20; Fagart v. Bost, 122 N. C. 522, 29 S. E. 838; Dunn v. Dunn, 137 N. C. 534, 50 S. E. 212; 15 Am. & Eng. Encyc. 45), as was also the disability of her lunacy.* It was then incumbent upon the ward's distributees to have letters of administration taken out, and to call for an accounting.

There is a distinction as to the suspension of the statute when the debtor dies and when the creditor. When the latter dies, as in this case, Code, § 164 (then in force) now Revisal 1905, § 367, provided: "If a person entitled to bring an action die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive an action may be commenced after the expiration of that time, and within one year from his death." When it is the debtor who dies, the action must be begun "within one year after issuing letters testamentary or of administration." It is true this is an enabling and not a disabling statute, and does not cut down the time given by the general statute, but extends it (if not expired) to at least one year after death of a creditor and at least one year after issuing letters to the representative of a debtor. Person v. Montgomery, 120 N. C. 111, 28 S. E. 645. But whether the three years or six years or ten years statute bars (all of which are pleaded) is immaterial as more than thirteen years elapsed after the ward's death before this action began. When there is at the death remaining unexpired any part of the time limited, but it will expire in less than "one year after the death" of the creditor, or in less than "one year after issuing letters" on the debtor's estate, such "one year" embraces and is not added to, the unexpired statutory time. In this case the guardian had been exposed to an action for over 11 years after the death of the ward, and the time limited for an action against him had expired at his death. Even if it had not quite expired, this action was not begun until more than "a year" (in fact, more than two years) "after issuing letters" to his administrator. Coppersmith v. Wilson, 107 N. C. 31, 12 S. E. 77; Winslow v. Benton, 130 N. C. 58, 40 S. E. 840.

In every aspect the plea of the statute was a complete bar, and it was properly sustained. Affirmed.

REDMAN v. NORFOLK & W. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action by a railway employé for injuries caused by the alleged sudden moving of a train used with a ditching machine, whether the train was suddenly moved held, under the evidence, to be for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 286.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY TO WARN OF DANGER.

It would be the duty of those in charge of a train used with a ditching machine, before moving the train at a time when the dipper of the machine was not in such a position as to make it necessary and proper, to give some warning or signal, so that employés on the cars liable to be injured could protect themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY TO WARN OF DANGER.

The duty imposed on an engineer in charge of a work train to signal before moving the train is for the protection of employés who are on duty at the places assigned to them, and he is not required to look out for those, who, leaving their posts, have voluntarily or in violation of their duties assumed a more dangerous position.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 137*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY TO WARN OF DANGER—LEAVING POST OF DUTY.

Where a railroad employé was assigned to work on a car of a work train attached to a ditching machine, his duty being to hook a chain onto the machine, which could only be done while standing and which was required to be done every two or three minutes, he did not deviate from the line of his duty by sitting on the side of the car, so long as he could rise and promptly hook the chain when signaled, and hence the engineer owed him the duty to signal before starting the train at an unexpected time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 270; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 203*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—MASTER'S NEGLIGENCE.

An employé does not assume the risk of an injury sustained from the master's negligence.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 247*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

If a railway employé on a work train was negligently sitting so near the edge of a car that, when the train started without signal, he fell off and was injured, his negligence would be the proximate cause of the injury, and he could not recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 795-800; Dec. Dig. § 247.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 210*)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—NATURAL RISKS OF EMPLOYMENT.

If a railway employé on a train working with a ditching machine placed himself in a position on a car such that, when the ditching machine started, he was jarred and threw his hand onto a snatch block of the machine, receiving injuries from a running cable, he could not recover, as the motion of the machine properly operated was one of the risks he assumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 554-556; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 240*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SELECTING DANGEROUS POSITION.

If a railway employé working on a car with a ditching machine was injured while occupying a dangerous position on the car, when there were other positions he could have occupied on the car which were safe, and a man of ordinary prudence would not have selected the position he occupied, he was negligent, and could not recover for the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 751-756; Dec. Dig. § 240.*]

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action by a railway employé on a work train for injuries from the alleged starting of the train without signal, a charge that plaintiff alleges that he was injured by defendant moving its train without giving him notice by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle, which it was its duty to do, was not objectionable as charging that it was defendant's duty to give plaintiff a signal by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle.

Appeal from Superior Court, Person County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Personal injury action by Charles Redman, by his next friend, against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff sues for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by defendant's negligence. The plaintiff testified that at the time he sustained the injury he was employed by defendant on one of its trains, engaged in cleaning out ditches with a ditching machine, to which a dipper was attached. He said it was his duty to hook the chain on dipping machine. The machine set on a flat car. It is run by a hoisting engine, which sets on the car next to the locomotive, which runs behind the cars, on which the dipper and the hoisting machine sets. The dipper sets on the foremost car from locomotive and the hoisting engine on the one next to the locomotive. A cable runs from the hoisting engine to the dipping machine. The overseer gives the signal, and the dipper is let down into the ditch. It is worked by cables. The dipper takes up the dirt, and places it on the flat car in front. His duty was to hook up the machine, and the hoister runs the machine back towards locomotive, so as to make room for the next pile of dirt. He was two or three cars from the hoisting engine at the time he was hurt. When dipping dirt, he hooked up the machine every two or three minutes. He was required to be at the hooking chain. When signal was given, he unhooked chain. Locomotive stopped while machine was being hooked. Train would move while dipper was being filled. He could not tell when the engine moved except by the whistle or bell ringing. Cable, on hoisting machine and dipper, would begin to move after dipper had filled and ready to unload on car. He was sitting on side of flat car, waiting for signal to be given to hook up the chain and snatch block. The dipper was coming up from ditch with dirt. No signal was given to fix chain. The locomotive moved forward and threw him over, and he caught at something, and caught the chain, which drew his hand into snatch block and injured him. No signal was given him that train was going to move. It was a sudden movement of the car. He was not looking for it. It was a harder movement than any he had experienced since he went to work. The custom had been to work the hoisting machine only when cars were not moving. If he had not thrown his hand on the chain, his head would have gone on it. At the time he was injured he was sitting down. He did his work while standing up. He could not perform his duty sitting down. He was sitting where he could get up and perform duty on signal. He was sitting on side of car. No one told him to sit there. His feet were hanging down. When dipper got on car, it was his duty to hook it up, but it was not necessary, at this time, to hook it up. He was waiting for them to give him the signal. He had his back to the chain which caught his hand. The cable was running. He knew it was running. He knew if he put his hand in it he would be hurt. The evidence on the part of defendant tended to show that plaintiff should not have been sitting down at the time of the injury, that his duty required him to stand up, and that the men in charge of the locomotive did not know that he was sitting. The defendant's witnesses also denied that the engine moved when plaintiff was injured. Plaintiff, being recalled, said that he was sitting so that he could get up, turn, and attend to his business; that, if he had been sitting three feet further away, which he could have done, he would not have been hurt. He sat at the place of his own accord. At the conclusion of the evidence defendant moved for judgment of nonsuit, which was denied. Defendant excepted. The usual issues directed to defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence were submitted to the jury. Defendant submitted a number of prayers for special instructions, several of which directed the jury to return a verdict for defendant. Others presented questions of law applicable to certain phases of the evidence. His honor declined to give them as drawn, and defendant excepted. The instructions given, to which exceptions were taken, are set out in the opinion. There was a verdict for the plaintiff upon both issues, and his damages assessed on the third issue. Motion for new trial denied. Defendant excepted. Judgment upon the verdict. Appeal.

Guthrie & Guthrie, for appellant. L. M. Carlton, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts as above). The negligence alleged and found by the jury was in moving the train suddenly and without giving the usual signals. The plaintiff says that when the dipper was filled, ready to be unloaded—that is, drawn over the car to deposit the mud upon it—the train did not move; that it was in motion when the dipper was filling with mud from the ditch on the roadside; that he was sitting on the side of the car, waiting for the signal to hook the chain, which would have required him to stand up. The sudden motion of the train, without signal or warning, caused him to throw his hand back, and it was thereby thrust, or thrown, into the snatch block and injured. His honor instructed the jury in this aspect of the testimony that if they found that plaintiff's post of duty was on the car where the snatch block or hoisting chain was suspended; that by the rules of the company or by custom a signal should be given before the train moved and that plaintiff was on the car, where his duty required him to be, waiting for the dipper to come over and on the car to be hooked by him; and that the engineer, without notice or signal, negligently caused the train to move or jerk at a time when it was not necessary to do so, and because of the sudden movement of the train plaintiff was jarred and about to fall and lose his balance and threw out his hand to catch, and his hand came in contact with the chain or snatch block and was injured, and the sudden negligent moving of the train was the proximate cause of the injury—they should answer the first issue “Yea.” To this instruction defendant excepted. In the light of the conflicting evidence, the question of the alleged sudden moving of the train, as testified to by plaintiff, was properly submitted to the jury. If, as alleged by him, the movement was unusual and not when the position of the dipper was such as to make it necessary and proper, certainly some warning or signal should have been given, so that employes on the cars liable to be injured should be warned and given an opportunity to avoid injury. It is a matter of common knowledge and everyday experience that a sudden movement of a train of cars is calculated to throw persons standing on them down and subject them to serious injury. The duty to give warning of unusual and unexpected movement to employes whose duty it is to be on the cars is manifest. This has been too frequently and uniformly held by this court to require the citation of authority. Defendant insists that plaintiff cannot avail himself of this principle because he was not at his post of duty, but had voluntarily placed himself in a position of obvious danger.

It is true, as contended by defendant, that the duty imposed upon the engineer to give the signal is for the protection of the employes who are on duty and at the place assigned to them. He is not required to look out for those who leaving the post or place assigned to them have voluntarily or in violation of their duty assumed a more dangerous position. In Howard v. Railroad, 132 N. C. 709, 44 S. E. 401, the plaintiff employe, riding in a shanty car, in violation of the rules of the company and without any necessity, sat on the steps of the car, and was injured by striking his foot against a pile of wood on the side of the track. We held that he could not recover. His proper place was in the car where seats had been provided and the rules of the company required him to be. It is elementary that it is negligence for a passenger to ride on the platform of a moving train, when seats have been provided, and there is room for him to be seated inside the car. Wagner v. Railroad, 147 N. C. 315, 61 S. E. 171. In the case before us the plaintiff was required to stand up only when he was hooking the chain. We see nothing to justify the conclusion that, while the dipper was gathering the mud and placing it upon the car, he was under any obligation to stand up. If he was at his post to hook the chain when signaled, he performed his full duty. It was necessary for him to remain on the car, so that, when he was called upon, he could promptly hook the chain. This was done every two or three minutes. There is no suggestion that, by sitting on the side of the car in the manner described, he was out of the line of his duty. It is the duty of a conductor on a passenger train to pass through the cars to take up the tickets and look after his train; but it would not be contended that if while “on his run” he sat down, and was injured by the negligent management of the engine by the engineer, he could not recover because he was not “standing up” or passing through the cars. He is none the less on duty when sitting down than when passing through his cars. So, with the plaintiff, his place was on the car, near to the chain and snatch block. If he negligently sat so near the edge of the car that, by the usual movement of the train, he fell off, his negligence would be the proximate cause of the injury and he could not recover for an injury sustained thereby.

This view of the case was put before the jury by his honor, who told them that if he was sitting down as he testified, and by the motion of the ditching machine he was jarred and threw his hand onto the snatch block, and was thereby injured, he could not recover. This was obviously correct because the motion of the ditching machine, when properly operated, was one of the risks which plaintiff assumed when he took the employment. But the sudden, unusual, and unnecessary movement of the train, without signal, was negligent, and the employe never assumes the risk of an injury sustained by defendant's negligence. It may well be that the engineer did not know that the plaintiff was sitting down near the snatch block, or that by suddenly and without warning moving the train he would cause him to sustain the injury. This is not the test of liability for negligent conduct. He did know that employes were on the flat cars operating the ditching machine, that, while the dipper was being drawn onto the car for the purpose of placing the dirt or mud, the engine should not move, certainly not do so, without giving warning. He further knew that it was hazardous to men at work on the cars to suddenly, and without warning, move the train. To do so was negligence, and his employer, the defendant, is liable for such injury as was the proximate result of such negligence. Human life and limb is of too much value in the estimation of the law to permit it to be sacrificed or destroyed by negligent handling of such powerful agencies without warning and signals to those to whom the common employer owes the duty of giving warning. The defendant's witnesses deny that the train was moved, but the issue has been settled against them by the verdict. We find no error in his honor's charge upon the first issue.

The defendant contends that as a matter of law upon his own evidence plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The learned counsel stresses upon our attention plaintiff's statement that the engine started the car, and he threw his hand back and struck the chain; that he knew the cable was running; that he knew, if he put his hand in it, he would be hurt. Of course, if plaintiff had put his hand in the snatch block or on the cable, knowing the danger, his negligent act would have been the proximate cause of his injury, and he could not recover. This is manifest. He says that, as the train moved suddenly, he lost his balance, and threw his hand back, and struck the chain; that, if he had not done this, he would have fallen, and his head would have struck it. His honor submitted the testimony upon the second issue under the following instructions. After explaining to them the duty of the employer to select a safe place in which to perform his work, when two are open to him, he said: "If you should find the facts in this case to be that the plaintiff selected a dangerous place in which to wait until the dipper should be placed on the car, and by him unhooked, in accordance with his duty, when there were other places or positions on the cars that were safe, and you further find that a man of ordinary prudence would not have selected a position such as that occupied by the plaintiff at the time of the injury, then, and under these circumstances, if you find such was the condition and facts, the plaintiff would be guilty of contributory negligence, you should answer the second issue, 'Yes.'" This was correct. We notice an exception to the following language used by his honor: "The plaintiff alleges that he was injured by the defendant moving its train of cars without giving him notice or signal by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle, which it was its duty to do." In their brief the learned counsel assume that in using this language his honor instructed the jury that it was the duty of defendant to give plaintiff signal by ringing the bell or blowing the whistle. We do not so interpret his honor. He was stating the plaintiff's contentions. When he came to instruct the jury, he explained to them that the duty to give a signal was dependent upon the rules of the company or the custom. We have carefully examined the record and the briefs of counsel, and find no error. There were no exceptions to the instruction upon the measure of damages.

No error.

2. SLAVES (§ 25*)—MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE.

Under the act of February, 1879 (Laws 1879, p. 136, c. 73), legitimatizing the children of colored parents born before January 1, 1868, of persons living together as husband and wife, etc., the common-law rule that, except in actions for criminal conversation, reputation, cohabitation, and the declarations of the parties are competent evidence that the marriage relation subsisted between them, applies in proving that the quasi marriage relation referred to in the statute existed between slaves.

Appeal from Superior Court, Davidson County; Long, Judge.

Action by Bynum Spaugh and others against A. J. Hartman and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. New trial.

Civil action to recover land, tried in the superior court of Davidson county, November term, 1908. The case was made to turn upon the finding of the jury upon this issue, submitted by consent: "Are the plaintiffs the heirs of Wesley Delap and entitled to the possession of the lands described in the complaint? Ans. No." The plaintiffs moved for a new trial, assigning errors. Motion denied. Plaintiffs excepted and appealed from the judgment rendered.

Walser & Walser and McCrary & McCrary, for appellants. Emery E. Raper, for appellees.

BROWN, J. The land in controversy was devised by Alex Delap to James Wesley Delap, colored, who had been his slave. Upon the death of the testator the said devisee entered into possession and remained there until he died intestate in 1906. The defendants then entered upon the lands and have remained there since, claiming as heirs of Alex Delap. The plaintiffs claim the lands as the children of Calvin Delap, who, it is alleged, was the son of Wesley Delap and his "slave wife," Martha Spaugh. Calvin was born of said Martha about 1853, and it is contended that Wesley Delap was his father, acknowledged the paternity, and that at the time the child was born was living with its mother in the relation of husband and wife, and that in consequence thereof such issue became legitimate and capable of inheriting from either parent under Acts 1879, p. 136, c. 73, now rule 13, "descents" (Revisal 1905, § 1558). There was much evidence introduced by plaintiffs tending to establish the affirmative of the issue.

These questions were put by plaintiffs' counsel to witness Manuel Spaugh and excluded by the court, to which ruling the plaintiffs excepted: "State what the general reputation as to who Martha Spaug's husband was, and who Wesley Delap's wife was relative to slave relations? Did or did not Martha and Wesley live together as man and wife as was custom amongst slaves at and before the time of the begetting and birth of Calvin Spaug?" The act of February, 1879, adds to the canons of descent by legitimatizing the children of colored parents born at any time before the 1st day of January, 1868, of persons living together as husband and wife, and confers upon such children all the rights of heirs at law or next of kin with respect to the estate of such parents or either of them. Its efficacy depends upon two essential facts to be established—a cohabitation subsisting at the birth of the child and the paternity of the person from whom the property claimed is derived. The cohabitation meant by the statute is not casual sexual intercourse, but an exclusive cohabitation such as is usually signified by the words "living together as man and wife." Branch v. Walker, 102 N. C. 85, 8 S. E. 896. While the marriage of slaves was not recognized as a legal bond, it is well known that in numberless instances the marriage relation was assumed by them, and to all intents and purposes, except in law, they became man and wife, and the appellation of husband and wife was used in reference to the parties to such unions by their owners and their associates. By the common law it is held to be a general rule of universal application in civil cases, except in actions for criminal conversation, that reputation, cohabitation, the declarations, and conduct of the parties are competent evidence to prove that the marriage relation subsisted between them. Archer v. Hathcock, 51 N. C. 421; Jones v. Reddick, 79 N. C. 291; Weaver v. Cryer, 12 N. C. 337. We are of opinion that the same rule of evidence should apply in proving that the quasi marriage relation referred to in the statute existed between slaves. It is not the legality of such a relation that is an issue in this case, but only the fact that such a relation was assumed by the putative grandparents of the plaintiffs.

The syllabus in the case of Nelson v. Hunter (upon a rehearing) 144 N. C. 763, 56 S. E. 506, would appear to sanction the ruling of his honor; but an examination of the case will disclose nothing inconsistent with our present ruling. 140 N. C. 599, 53 S. E. 439. The facts of that case were that a marriage ceremony was performed during the War between Solomon Nelson and Jackie Cook, and the evidence tended strongly to prove that the relation thus assumed continued to exist until after the act of March 10, 1866 (Pub. Laws 1866, p. 99, c. 40), had legalized it, and that the plaintiff Nelson claimed the property of his mother Jackie as her only legitimate child, the product of that union. For the purpose of showing that the relation of Solomon with Jackie was not exclusive, and not that of husband and wife, it was sought to be proven by general reputation that Solomon some time in 1867 abandoned Jackie, and lived with a female of color named Viley, in Beaufort county, with whom he had lived prior to the War. The court held that the general reputation that Viley was Solomon's wife before the War and her declarations claiming him as her husband were valueless and incompetent, saying in reference thereto: "If Solomon resumed his cohabitation with Viley after the passage of the act of March 10, 1866, it could have no effect upon the legitimacy of his and Jackie's children. If his relations with Jackie continued long enough to have become legalized by the act, his conduct after that could not render the offspring of that union illegitimate." 140 N. C. 601, 53 S. E. 439. There was no purpose in that case to prove a slave marriage between Solomon and Viley nor was there any issue of their cohabitation. Neither is the case of Erwin v. Bailey, 123 N. C. 632, 31 S. E. 844, authority for the defendant's contention. It was there held that general reputation that the plaintiff was not the child of Caesar Swinton was properly excluded, with which ruling we fully agree. It was an attempt to prove illegitimacy by general reputation.

We think his honor erred in excluding the evidence.

STATE v. COX.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 14, 1909.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 721½, 730*)—IMPROPER ARGUMENT—FAILURE OF WIFE TO TESTIFY—ACTION OF COURT.

Under Revisal 1905, § 1634, making accused's wife competent to testify for him, but providing that her failure to do so shall not prejudice the defense, it was improper for the solicitor in his argument to comment on accused's failure to corroborate his testimony by her, and for the judge, on accused objecting, to state that the wife could not testify against accused, that she could testify in his behalf only, and that the jury could not consider what she knew, or did not know, and to instruct that it was not for the state to examine the wife against accused, but that he could use her as a witness, whereas the court should have instructed that the jury could not consider accused's failure to use her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Randolph County; Long, Judge.

Simeon Cox was convicted of an offense, and he appeals. Reversed.

Morehead & Sapp, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The state called the wife of the defendant, who was present under subpoena, and tendered her to the defendant. The court ruled that the state could not examine her as a witness; that she was a competent witness only for the defendant. The solicitor in his argument to the jury commented on the failure of the defendant to corroborate his own testimony by his wife. On objection made his honor stated that "the wife was not competent, and would not be allowed to bear witness against the husband, that her testimony would be competent only in behalf of her husband, and that, as the wife was not permitted to testify against her husband and had not done so, the jury could not consider what she knew or did not know." And in his charge the court told the jury "it was not for the state to examine the wife of the defendant as a witness against her husband, but it was competent for the defendant to use her as a witness." Revisal 1905, § 1634, provides: "The husband or wife of the defendant, in all criminal actions or proceedings shall be a competent witness for the defendant, but the failure of such witness to be examined shall not be used to the prejudice of the defense." The tender of the wife by the state, and the remarks of the solicitor, sharply called attention to the failure of the defense to examine the defendant's wife. Objection was made, but the court, instead of telling the jury that they should not let that fact prejudice the defendant, on both occasions rather accentuated the matter by telling the jury that the state could not use the wife of the defendant as a witness, but that he could. The effect, though unintentional on the part of his honor, was to throw the fault of the wife not being a witness upon the defendant, since he could have put her on, and the state could not. There was no caution that such failure to use the wife as a witness should not be considered by the jury. Yet the tender, and the remarks of counsel, being called to the judge's attention, called for such caution, and his failing to give it was prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Granville County; E. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Anne A. Davis against B. F. Frazier. Judgment dismissing the action, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

There have been temporary restraining orders issued and served in the cause, and pending the action certain cross-ties have been seized, and are now held under process of claim and delivery, issued in the same at plaintiff's instance. These cross-ties are claimed by one John Bullock, who has been allowed to interplead for the purpose, and who alleges that he bought and paid for the ties, and owned same at the time of action instituted. On the hearing, and as determinative of the controversy, issues were framed for submission to the jury as follows:

"(1) Did the defendant unlawfully enter upon the land of plaintiff and cut and remove therefrom a lot of cross-ties and hickory timber, as alleged in the complaint? Answer.

"(2) What damages, if any, has the plaintiff sustained? Answer.

"(3) Is the plaintiff the owner of, and entitled to the possession of, the cross-ties described in the affidavit filed in the claim and delivery proceedings in this action? Answer."

At the close of plaintiff's testimony, on motion, the action was dismissed as on judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff excepted and appealed.

A. A. Hicks and B. S. Royster, for appellant. V. S. Bryant, Aycock & Winston, and T. Lanier, for appellee. Graham & Devin, for interpleader.

HOKE, J. (after stating the facts as above). The evidence showed that, on May 31, 1905, the plaintiff, by written deed, had conveyed to Heidlebaugh and Le Fever all the standing timber on three certain tracts of land in Granville county, fully described, "which now measures, or shall measure during the term of years hereafter set out, as much as ten inches in diameter at the butt," etc. "To have and to hold said timber unto the said Heidelbaugh and Le Fever, and their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, subject to the following conditions and agreements: (1) That the parties of the second part may enter on said land, etc., and cut and remove said timber in such manner, and at such place and places as they may deem necessary, and may construct and operate all such mills and other devices in cutting and preparing such timber for market; roads, tramroads, railroads, stables, shanties, and other buildings over and upon such land as may be deemed necessary for cutting and removing said timber, and may have full power and authority to remove from said land, at any time, all machinery, buildings, etc., placed upon the land for said purpose." "(3) And the said parties of the second part, and their heirs and assigns, have the right to enter upon and begin to cut and remove the said timber at any time they may desire, and all the timber not so cut and removed within five years from May 26, 1905, shall revert to and become the property of the party of the first part, and her heirs and assigns. (4) And it is expressly agreed and understood that the said parties of the second part shall not have the right to cut over the lands hereinafter described a second time for timber, and that the said Mrs. Anne A. Davis shall have the right to take up the wood and cut any trees for her own use after the same have been cut over by the parties of the second part, and the parties of the second part agree not to injure the wire fences now upon said land."

There was evidence tending to show that the grantees entered the land under this deed, placed their mills, built shanties, and constructed the necessary roads for the purpose, and, having cut over all the land included in the contract, removed their mills, machinery, etc., except the shanties, which they sold, and that, after this was done, the defendant, claiming the right to do so, had entered on the land, and cut the timber and ties, and committed the spoil and injury for which the plaintiff now seeks redress. On this question, Dr. I. H. Davis, among other things, testified as follows: "Am son of Mrs. A. A. Davis, plaintiff. Heidelbaugh and Le Fever cut over all the land described in the deed or contract, and then took up their mills, machinery, etc., and moved everything off the land, except some shanties, which they sold. They moved away from the land in August or September, 1907, and went to Virginia, I think. They cut over all the land described in the deed or contract. Mr. Frazier, the defendant, had hands cutting timber on the lands in October, 1907; and, acting under instructions from my mother, I ordered them to stop, and I also notified Frazier personally to stop, but he paid no attention to such notice, and this suit was brought in March, 1908, and a restraining order was served on the defendant." It does not clearly appear from the testimony that the defendant entered as assignee under this deed, but, assuming this to be true, we are of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to have her cause submitted to a jury, and there was error in dismissing the same as on judgment of nonsuit. According to our decisions the deed in question conveyed to the grantees, Heidelbaugh and La Fever, a fee simple in the timber of the specified dimensions, determinable as to all timber not cut and removed from the land within five years, and subject to the further provision "that the land should not be cut over for timber a second time." If the evidence of I. H. Davis, above set out, and other of like tenor, should be accepted by the jury, and it should be established that the land described in the deed had been once entirely cut over, or that a distinct and definite portion of the land had been once cut over, then the right of the grantees, or persons claiming under them, to cut and remove timber, as to all or the stated portion of said land, by the express provision of the contract, would cease and determine, and any further cutting would amount to an actionable wrong. And, if this land had been entirely cut over once, within the meaning of the term as contained in the contract, the result indicated would not be affected by the fact that here and there through the different tracts trees could be found which were within the specified dimensions. If, however, there should be distinct and definite portions of the land which had not been cut over at all, as to such portions we are of opinion that the rights granted under the contract will continue until they are cut over once, or the right to cut expires by the limitation as to time.

It is contended for the defendant that the stipulation contained in section 4, to the effect that the land should not be cut over a second time, is in direct conflict with the former parts of the instrument, and entirely repugnant to the estate which is thereby expressly conveyed, and should therefore be rejected; but we do not think this a correct interpretation of the contract in question. It is an undoubted principle that a "subsequent clause, irreconcilable with a former clause, and repugnant to the general purpose and intent of the contract, will be set aside." This was expressly held in Jones v. Casualty Company, 140 N. C. 262, 52 S. E. 578, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 982, 111 Am. St. Rep. 843, and there are many decisions with us to like effect; but, as indicated in the case referred to, and the authorities cited in its support, this principle is in subordination to another position that the intent of the parties as embodied in the entire instrument is the end to be attained, and that each and every part of the contract must be given effect if this can be done by any fair or reasonable interpretation; and it is only after subjecting the instrument to this controlling principle of construction that a subsequent clause may be rejected as repugnant and irreconcilable. Jones v. Casualty Co., supra; Lawson on Contracts, §§ 388, 389; Bishop on Contracts, §§ 386, 387.

In Jones v. Casualty Co. the doctrine is thus stated: "Another principle applicable to the case before us, and equally well established, is that while clauses in a contract apparently repugnant must be reconciled if it can be done by any reasonable construction, yet a proviso which is utterly repugnant to the body of the contract and irreconcilable with it will be rejected; likewise a subsequent clause, irreconcilable with a former clause, and repugnant to the general purpose and intent of the contract, will be set aside." And in Lawson on Contracts, supra, it is said: "The third main rule is that that construction will be given which will best effectuate the intention of the parties to be collected from the whole of the agreement; and, to ascertain the intention, regard must be had to the nature of the instrument, the condition of the parties executing it, and the objects which they had in view. * * * Courts will examine the whole of the contract, and so construe each part with the others that all of them may, if possible, have some effect; for it is to be presumed that each part was inserted for a purpose, and has its office to perform. So, where two clauses are inconsistent, they should be construed so as to give effect to the intention of the parties as gathered from the whole instrument. So every word will, if possible, be made to operate, if by law it may, according to the intention of the parties." And in Bishop on Contracts the author says (section 386): "After interpretation has exhausted itself in harmonizing the several clauses and words, if there is a residue which cannot be reconciled, the repugnancy must be got rid of by rejecting what will free the writing from it." And in section 387: "If the main body of the writing is followed by a proviso wholly repugnant thereto, it must necessarily be rejected, because otherwise the entire contract will be rendered null. But where it can be construed to qualify the main provisions, so that all may stand together; it will be retained." A proper application of the doctrine correctly stated in these authorities will show that there is no irreconcilable conflict in the provisions of this contract, but that each and every part of it can be given effect. The instrument conveys to the grantees a base or qualified fee in the timber, determinable as to all timber not cut and removed within the time specified—i. e., five years—and then provides that the cutting may commence at any time within the five years the grantees may desire, and that the land embraced in the contract shall not be cut over a second time. This last stipulation does not at all nullify the grant, but only establishes a method or condition by which the right or interest granted may be made available; and there is no reason, as stated, why this provision, made a substantial part of the contract by express agreement of the parties, should not be given effect. The insertion of this provision was no doubt caused by the suggestion indicated in Hardison v. Lumber Co., 136 N. C. 175, 48 S. E. 588, where it is said in substance that, if the parties desired protection against a "second cutting, they should have so contracted."

It is further urged for defendant that the fourth clause of the contract, being a condition subsequent working a forfeiture of the estate, should be strictly construed. If it be conceded that the clause in question is a condition subsequent, the position contended for by defendant is well recognized, but it is only a rule of interpretation, and does not obtain when the meaning of the contract is so plain that no construction is permissible. This is clearly illustrated and upheld in the case to which we were referred by counsel. Epperson v. Epperson (Va.) 62 S. E. 844. In that case the court held as follows: "While courts regard with disfavor conditions and defeasances which are calculated to prevent or defeat the absolute vesting of titles, they will not hesitate to give effect to the intention of the parties when the condition or defeasance is clear and explicit."

We have purposely refrained from definite expression as to the right to certain cross-ties, and their seizure by process of claim and delivery sworn out in this action. The cause having been dismissed as on judgment of nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's testimony, the evidence which makes for the right and claim of the interpleader to these ties has not been disclosed, and we have considered it well to withhold our opinion until the facts concerning them shall be more fully ascertained and presented.

For the reasons heretofore stated, this order of nonsuit will be set aside, and the cause restored to the docket.

LASSITER v. SEABOARD AIR LINE RY.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 14, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 149*)—OBLIGATION OF MASTER—CARE REQUIRED.

A road master directing the unloading of iron rails from flat cars must use ordinary care to see that the rails can be handled with safety in the manner directed by him.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 97*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

Where the method pursued in doing work in the manner directed by the employer's superintendent was not unusual, unusual results could not be reasonably anticipated, and the employer was not responsible therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 163; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 97*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

An employé was injured while unloading iron rails from a flat car. The rails were loaded in the usual way. The employé and co-employé unloaded the rails by first lifting one end of them over the standard and letting them fall to the ground, and then by lifting the other end in the same way. While a rail was so removed, it bounded back and injured the employé. There was nothing to show that the end lifted over the standard would not, as other rails had done, similarly situated and handled, fall to the ground. The method pursued was shown to be safe. Held, that the injury was the result of unavoidable accident, relieving the employer from liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Chatham County; Webb, Judge.

Action by W. G. Lassiter against the Seaboard Air Line Railway. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Action for personal injury alleged to have been sustained by reason of defendant's negligence. The evidence tended to show that plaintiff was, by direction of defendant's superintendent or road master, engaged, with other employes, in unloading iron rails from a flat car, that the rails were laid upon the car in the usual way, and that upon either side of the car "fish bars" or "angle plates," about 18 inches long, were used as standards. They were put in the "stirrups" or "cuffs" on the side of the car for the purpose of holding the standards. Some of the rails had been taken up from the cross-ties and were being used to build a siding. The "fish bars" were suitable for standards and "constantly used for that purpose." The rails were loaded in the usual way. There were several cars of rails. In unloading the cars other than the one on which plaintiff was injured, the standards, or "fish bars," were removed, and the rails thrown upon the ground. When the hands undertook to unload the car upon which the plaintiff was injured, it was found that the rails pressed against the standards, so that they could not be removed. The plaintiff and other hands were directed to unload by raising one end of the rail, lifting it over the standard, and letting it fall to the ground, and then lifting the other end over in the same manner, or, as plaintiff says, the order was, "Pick up the end of the iron and throw it off." He says that, as he did so, "it bounded some way or other and dashed back to the car." In reply to the question, "When you picked up the end of the rail to toss it over, it caught at the other end and flew back, is that the way you described it? A. It bounded and flew back. * * * I was not thinking about it. I was just trying to carry out orders. I thought it would go to the ground." Mr. Cain, the section master, a witness for plaintiff, says that Capt. Tussey, the road master, ordered the hands to throw the rails off. "He said he could not get the standards out until after he got the rails from around the standards. They were piled against the standards." This witness said the car was loaded in the usual way, that the fish bars made good standards, were constantly used for that purpose, that he had unloaded rails in that way before, had often seen it done, and they had thrown out two or three rails before the plaintiff was injured. The rail struck plaintiff's leg, as it "bounded back," and inflicted the injury for which he sues.

The foregoing is the substance of the evidence, on behalf of the plaintiff, in regard to the way in which he received the injury. He alleges that defendant was negligent in several respects. His honor instructed the jury that there was no evidence that the car was not properly loaded, or that there was not a sufficient number of hands for that purpose. The defendant requested his honor to instruct the jury: "From all of the evidence in this case, the cause of the injury was an accident—and that they will answer the first issue, 'No.'" This was refused, and defendant excepted. His honor instructed the jury that if they found that, as the plaintiff picked up the rail to toss it off the car, the other end of the rail was caught, or hung, and if they should further find that Cain or Tussey knew that the rail was caught, or hung, or that they could have known it by observation or ordinary care that it was caught, and failed to do so, and that after knowing it was caught at the end and it was tossed over and rebounded, and by reason of the fact that it was caught before it was picked, or after it was picked up and hurt plaintiff, they would answer the first issue, "Yea." Defendant excepted. There was a verdict for plaintiff. Judgment and appeal.

Murray Allen and Hayes & Bynum, for appellant. Long & Long, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the facts as above). The defendant lodged several exceptions to his honor's refusal to give special instructions and to the instructions given; but error is assigned only for the refusal to nonsuit and, what is equivalent, to instruct the jury that the injury sustained by plaintiff was the result of an accident. The uncontradicted evidence is that the rails were loaded in the usual way, and that the "fish bars" were suitable and usually used for standards. His honor instructed the jury that there was no evidence that the cars were not properly loaded, or that there were not a sufficient number of hands to assist in unloading. It is evident that plaintiff and Mr. Cain, who helped him, were able and did lift one end of the rail over the standard. It does not appear that the fact that the standards were not removed was the proximate cause of the injury. We do not find any suggestion in the evidence that the method of handling the rails was unusual or dangerous, provided a sufficient number of hands were furnished to lift them over the standard. His honor eliminated every suggestion of negligence other than the question whether Tussey, who gave the order, and Cain, who assisted the plaintiff in executing it, saw, or could have seen by the exercise of ordinary care, that the rail was hung. We see no ground for exception to the measure of duty imposed upon them. It was undoubtedly the duty of the person giving the order to unload the rails to use ordinary care to see that they could be handled with safety, in the manner directed by him. There is no evidence, or suggestion, that either of them did in fact see that the rail was "hung," nor does it very clearly appear how it was "hung." We are unable to find any evidence that there was anything in the position of the rail to suggest to them that the end lifted over the standard would not, as others had done similarly situated and handled, fall to the ground. All of the witnesses concur in saying that the rails were loaded in the usual way. Two or three had been unloaded without accident. The method pursued in unloading was not unusual. Therefore unusual results could not be reasonably anticipated. We are unable to find any suggestion, in the evidence, explaining why the end of the rail, when lifted over the standard, rebounded. We, of course, know that there was some obstruction to the anticipated action of the other end of the rail which should, and, but for some obstruction, would, have moved upwards as the end next plaintiff went to the ground. The plaintiff, in answer to the question what caused it to spring back, said: "I suppose it got caught at the other end, or some way. It got down so quick. It bounded in some way and flew back and struck me." He further says: "I could not say how it was done. It came back with pretty smart force, very quickly."

In Keck v. Tel. & Tel. Co., 131 N. C. 277, 42 S. E. 610, where it appeared that there was nothing unusual in the conditions under which the work was done—no lack of hands, and "no mishap or danger anticipated"—the injury was held to be the result of an accident, which is "an event from an unknown cause or an unusual and unexpected event from a known cause; chance; casualty." Crutchfield v. Railroad, 76 N. C. 322. In Martin v. Highland Park Mfg. Co., 128 N.

C. 264, 38 S. E. 876, 83 Am. St. Rep. 671, it is said: "Injuries resulting from events taking place without one's foresight or expectation, or an event which proceeds from an unknown cause or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and therefore not expected, must be borne by the unfortunate sufferer." In Bryan v. Railroad, 128 N. C. 387, 38 S. E. 914, Douglas, J., said: "The employer is not responsible for an accident simply because it happens, but only when he has contributed to it by some act or omission of duty."

In this case a new trial was ordered, with the suggestion that a nonsuit should have been granted. Alexander v. Mfg. Co., 132 N. C. 423, 43 S. E. 1008; Frazier v. Wilkes, 132 N. C. 437, 43 S. E. 1004. While we regret the painful injury which the plaintiff sustained, we are unable to see how, by reasonable human foresight, or precaution, the eccentric course of the rail could have been anticipated and therefore prevented. We cannot think that it was negligent to pursue a course which none of the witnesses suggest was either unusual or hazardous. Mr. Tussey says: That he had been at that kind of work 14 years. That he had ample force. "It is always customary to take hold of the rail and throw one end off to prevent accident. Some men will throw quicker than others and let the rail fall down, and for this reason we have adopted the plan to throw one end off at the time. It makes it much safer than trying to throw the entire rail off. It was the method adopted by all of the roads that I have worked for in unloading rails." W. C. Wooten, who was section foreman and present when the accident occurred, says of the method of unloading: "It is safer one end at a time. If you try to pick up both at the same time, sometimes the rail will turn and catch your fingers." This is not contradicted and is consistent with plaintiff's evidence. We think that his honor should have granted the motion for nonsuit. Upon the whole of the evidence, the plaintiff's injury was the result of an unforeseen and unavoidable accident.

There is error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alamance County; B. B. Jones, Judge.

Action by Jacob Cook against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

King & Kimball, for appellant. Morehead & Sapp, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the negligent failure of the defendant to deliver a telegram. The plaintiff filed his complaint August 2, 1906, and the defendant filed its answer, which contained a general denial of the allegations of the complaint, on September 15, 1906. At a special term of the superior court held in July, 1907, it appeared from the minutes the cause was continued by consent on July 16, 1907, but the court finds as a fact that counsel were not present at the time, and that the defendant's counsel did not know of the entry until September term, 1908. On July 23, 1907, during the second week of the special term, the court made an order allowing the defendant to amend its answer by averring that the plaintiff had not presented his claim within 60 days after the message was filed with the company, which by the terms of the contract between it and the plaintiff exonerates the defendant from liability for the alleged act of negligence. The amendment to the answer was filed on August 6, 1907. The plaintiff first learned at September term, 1907, that the order for the amendment had been made, and that the amended answer had been filed, but did not move at that term to strike out the order or the amendment of the answer, but did move at March term, 1908, to strike out the amendment. The motion was continued from time to time and heard at September term, 1908, when the judge, then presiding, ordered that the amendment be stricken out. Defendant excepted and appealed.

In Gwinn v. Parker, 119 N. C. 19, 25 S. E. 705, it appeared that the plaintiff had filed his complaint, and judgment by default for want of an answer was entered. During the same term, the court set aside the judgment and allowed the defendant to answer. This court, holding that there was no error, declared it to be the settled rule that any order or decree is, during the term, in fieri, and the court, during the (same) term, can vacate or modify it, and that the court has the discretion to enlarge the time for filing pleadings. To the same effect is Halyburton v. Carson, 80 N. C. 16, in which Ashe, J., says: "It is familiar learning that all the proceedings of a court of record are in fieri—under the absolute control of the judge, subject to be amended, modified, or annulled at any time before the expiration of the term in which they are had or done." Faircloth v. Isler, 76 N. C. 49; Dick v. Dickson, 63 N. C. 488; Sneed v. Lee, 14 N. C. 364. In Penny v. Smith, 61 N. C. 35, Pearson, C. J., for the court, said: "The motion to dismiss the appeal, upon the ground that the county court had no power to amend the petition after dismissing it and granting an appeal to the superior court, was put on the ground that the court was functus officio in respect to the case, and had no further control over it. In this the counsel for the defendant is mistaken. The proceedings of the court are in fieri until the expiration of the term, and, until then, the record remains under the control of the court. It may strike out the judgment, and enter a different one; it may amend the pleadings, and do any other act necessary to effect the purposes of justice—and this as well after, as before, what purports to be a final judgment has been entered. In other words, the court has the whole term during which to consider of its action, and any entry made on a former day does not affect its power on a subsequent day. It is every day's practice in the superior courts to allow the writ to be amended, by entering a larger sum, or, in ejectment, to extend the time of the demise, and these amendments are usually applied for and allowed, after judgment has been entered, and an appeal taken." But we need not and do not rest our decision upon the ground stated in the cases cited, for it appears in this case sufficiently by the findings of fact that the order continuing the case by consent was entered by mistake. That is the substantial meaning and effect of the findings. It follows, of course, that the court had the power and the discretion to allow an amendment of the answer and permit the defendant to set out, as defensive matter, the terms of the contract between the parties.

It is unnecessary to consider the other reasons assigned by the defendant's counsel for reversing the order of the court.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Scotland County; Long, Judge.

Action by Farrior Jones, by next friend, against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Action for damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of an assault committed upon him by defendant's agent while acting in the scope of his employment. The plaintiff testified that he attempted to climb upon defendant's box car attached to a moving freight train, catching hold of the iron bars, for the purpose of stealing a ride; that a flagman on top of the car told plaintiff to come up to him, when he, plaintiff, started to run, had gone about eight feet from the car when the flagman shot him, shot him twice, inflicting the injury from which he suffered, etc. Plaintiff was at the time of the shooting 16 years of age. This was the entire evidence in regard to the transaction. There was evidence regarding the extent of the injury. Defendant moved the court for judgment of nonsuit. Motion denied. Exception. His honor submitted the following issues to the jury:

"(1) Was the plaintiff injured by the reckless and wanton acts of the defendant's agent as alleged in the complaint?

"(2) If the plaintiff was injured by the reckless and wanton acts of the defendant's agent, as alleged in the complaint, was such agent at the time acting in the line of his duty, scope of his employment, and furtherance of the business of defendant company?

"(3) What damage, if any, is plaintiff entitled to recover?"

The jury answered the first issue "Yes," the second "No," and the third "$200." Defendant moved for judgment upon the verdict. Motion denied. Defendant excepted. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant excepted, assigned errors, and appealed.

John D. Shaw and Murray Allen, for appellant. Jonathan Peele and J. A. Lockhart, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. Passing the question raised by defendant's exception to his honor's refusal to grant the motion for judgment of nonsuit, and assuming, for the purpose of disposing of this appeal, that the question whether the flagman when he shot plaintiff was acting in the scope of his employment or the line of his duty was properly submitted to the jury, the defendant is entitled either to a judgment upon the verdict or to a new trial. While the members of the court are not agreed in regard to the correctness of his honor's ruling upon the motion for judgment of nonsuit, a majority of them are of the opinion that defendant was entitled to have its motion for judgment upon the verdict allowed. Whatever differences of opinion may have existed in the past, the decided weight of judicial opinion concurs that for torts committed by the servant while on duty and acting within the scope of his employment, or line of his duty, proximately injurious to another, the master is liable. The fact that the tort was committed recklessly, wantonly, or willfully, if within the scope of the employment, does not exonerate the master. The view which has after most careful consideration been adopted by both English and American courts is thus stated by Sir Frederick Pollock, probably the most accurate writer on the subject now living: "A master may be liable for the willful and deliberate wrongs committed by the servant, provided they be done on the master's account and for his purposes." For an interesting and exhaustive discussion of this subject, see 2 Beaven on Neg. book IV, p. 554. This limitation is both scientific and practical. Certainly no one will seriously contend that a master is an insurer of his servant's conduct in respect to torts committed by him while in his employment without regard to the pivotal question whether such conduct had any relation to or was in the scope of the employment. To maintain that he is, it must follow that almost unlimited control should be given the master over the servant, to the end that he may protect himself against such unlimited liability. The law must be both reasonable and practical; that is, it must commend itself to the sense of justice of the average man, and be capable of practical application to the manifold relations of our modern, industrial, social, and domestic life. It is manifest that judicial thought upon the subject since the decision of McManus v. Crickett, 1 East, 106, has been affected by the introduction of the industrial corporation into the field of litigation, and the measure and standard of liability of the master for the torts of the servant has been enlarged and extended to meet the changed conditions of employment of servants by these impersonal agencies. Liability has been fixed upon corporations for torts of its servants, which, if applied to natural persons, engaged in mercantile, mechanical, and agricultural employments, and especially to those employing domestic servants would shock the reason, produce startling consequences and be restricted by legislation. Mr. Beaven, speaking of the development of the doctrine of liability of the employer for the torts of his employé, says: "From this limited beginning its scope has become so almost universal in modern law that Jessell, M. R., thus comments on it: 'It is clear that on principle a man is liable for a man's tortious act if he expressly directs him to do it, or if he employs that other person as his agent, and the act complained of is within the scope of the agent's authority. I agree that the court ought to be very careful how it extends the doctrine of respondeat superior. It has been carried in our law very far indeed. I think quite far enough.'" Smith v. Keal, 9 Q. B. D. 351. However this may be, and whether the law is at present upon a permanent and satisfactory basis, it is manifest that for the torts of the servant the master's liability is limited to those committed within the scope of the employment in furtherance of his business, for, as said in McManus v. Crickett, supra, "no master is chargeable with the acts of his servant, but when he acts in the execution of the authority given him." The same thought is clearly expressed by Mr. Justice Walker in Daniels v. Railroad, 136 N. C. 530, 48 S. E. 818, 67 L. R. A. 455: "When a servant quits sight of the object for which he is employed, and, without having in view his master's orders, pursues that which his own malice suggests, he no longer acts in pursuance of the authority given him, and his master will not be answerable for his acts." The subject has been so recently discussed by all of the members of this court and all of our own and many other authorities cited in Stewart v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 47, 59 S. E. 545, that no good results would come from a repetition of what was there written. While the writer of this opinion upon the verdict of the jury in that case dissented from some of the views expressed in the prevailing opinion, he does not understand that the decision in that case brings into question the principle that liability of the master for the torts of the servant is limited to those done in the scope of the employment. The principle upon which the opinion of Mr. Justice Brown was concurred in by the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Hoke was that, when the master placed in the control of his servant a dangerous instrumentality for the purpose of carrying on his business, the law imposed upon him the duty of prevision and precaution. This view was very strongly stated in the concurring opinion of Mr. Justice Hoke. While the writer differed from the justices in the application of the principle to the instrumentality used in that case, he concedes that the principle is sustained both by reason and authority, and regards the question as settled in the future cases coming before the court by that decision.

Applying the principle to the record in this appeal, we find that his honor, without objection by plaintiff, submitted two issues—the first directed to the allegation that plaintiff was injured by the reckless and wanton conduct of defendant's agent; and second, whether at the time the assault was committed the agent was acting in the line of his duty, etc. It is true that the first issue concluded with the words, "As alleged in the complaint." When we refer to the complaint, we find that plaintiff sets out the transaction in detail and in several aspects. We think that, read in the light of his honor's instruction and the submission of the second issue, the finding by the jury upon the first issue referred to the manner in which the assault was committed; that is, recklessly and wantonly. In stating the contentions of the parties his honor calls attention to the testimony of the plaintiff and the contention of defendant that plaintiff was shot "at some other time and place, and was not shot by any agent of the defendant company." He concludes this part of the charge by saying that the burden is upon plaintiff to satisfy the jury that "what he says about it is true." His honor then defines a wanton, reckless act, saying: "You will notice that this issue presents to you the question as to whether this was a wanton act, and I undertake to tell you what in the eye of the law a wanton act is. If under the instructions I have given you, gentlemen, if your answer should be 'No,' it will not be necessary for you to answer the second and third issues." We quote the charge to show that the only question presented to the jury upon the first issue was whether the flagman shot plaintiff in a reckless and wanton manner. His honor recognized the fact that plaintiff must not only establish the allegation that defendant's servant assaulted him, but must go further, and show that the wanton, reckless assault was committed by the employé while acting in the scope of his employment and line of duty. The second issue was therefore consistent with the finding upon the first, and necessary to establish a complete cause of action. While the plaintiff's evidence was uncontradicted, it was the province of the jury to draw the inference whether the employé was acting in the scope of the employment. "The inquiry as to the scope of the servant's employment being for the jury (unless the act is manifestly out of the course of the servant's employment where a nonsuit is proper), the reported cases turn in nearly every instance either on the validity of the finding or on the question whether there is evidence for the jury." Beaven, Neg. 584. The question involved in the second issue might have been tried and determined on the first if his honor had seen proper to do so. This was done in Pierce's Case, 124 N. C. 83, 32 S. E. 399, 44 L. R. A. 316, where the court charged the jury that, if they found that the injury was inflicted by the servant in the course of his employment, to find the issue for the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not except to the submission of the second issue to the jury, or the instruction of the court. The question is, therefore, not presented whether as a matter of law his honor should have held that the servant was acting in the full scope of his employment. We have been unfortunate if we have not been able to make ourselves understood in this case. We do not hold nor is there any word in the opinion to justify the suggestion to the contrary that corporations or natural persons are privileged to shoot people. No such question is raised by any exception in the record. Nor was it suggested upon the argument. We simply hold that, when without objection or exception an issue is found by the jury, that the defendant servant was not acting within the scope of the employment when he committed the assault, the employer is not liable. This is elementary, and the courts "without variableness or shadow of turning" have uniformly so held.

In Palmer v. Railroad, 131 N. C. 250, 42 S. E. 604, the opinion concludes with the words: "The employé must have been acting at the time within the scope of his employment on the defendant's car." The jury, not the court, found that in this case he was not so acting. We are unable to perceive how we can in the face of this finding without a single exception by the plaintiff do otherwise. No motion was made to set the verdict aside. This disposition of the appeal renders it unnecessary to consider the charge in regard to the character and measure of damages which could be awarded. The judgment must be reversed, with direction to enter judgment that defendant go without day, etc.

Reversed.

BROWN, J. (concurring). I concur in the opinion written for the court by Mr. Justice CONNOR, which to my mind is conclusive that the defendant company is not liable for the unwarranted and unauthorized act of its brakeman in shooting at the plaintiff. There is not a scintilla of evidence in the record that the brakeman shot at the plaintiff in an endeavor either to keep plaintiff off the train or to put him off after he was on. Upon all the evidence the act of the brakeman was neither authorized by the defendant or done in the discharge of the brakeman's duty to it. It was plainly a reckless, "devil may care," act, for the consequences of which the person who did it should be punished, and not his innocent employer who could not prevent it and did not ratify it.

In the Stewart Case in my opinion the company is held liable upon a well-defined ground, supported by most respectable authority, to the effect that a steam locomotive is such a dangerous instrumentality that the company is liable for the manner in which the engineer selected by the company uses it when running it in the company's business. That principle is not involved in the case.

I do not understand, nor do I think any one else seriously believes, that railway or other corporations claim for their employes the privileges of the ancient nobility of France to shoot down innocent persons at will or to commit other lawless acts. I have so much respect for the great mass of railway employes that I do not think they merit any such severe censure. My experience has convinced me that they are very generally a most faithful, law-abiding, as well as highly respected, class of our industrial population. But now and then, as in all other callings, however great or however humble, some reckless individual will be found. When his lawless act is done in the discharge of his duty to his master, or when it is authorized or ratified by him, then the master is justly held to be liable for the damage inflicted, however innocent the master may be. But, when such act was not done in furtherance of the master's business, and was neither authorized nor ratified by him, but was the wanton, reckless, personal act of the servant which the master could neither foresee nor prevent and does not ratify, then it is neither law nor justice to hold the master responsible, and this applies to corporate as well as individual employers of labor.

Such has been the law of this and our mother country from time immemorial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The plaintiff was attempting to climb up on the defendant's box car to steal a ride. A flagman on top discovering him told him to "come on up" to him. Whether the menacing tone or the fact that he was discovered, or as is probable, the flourish of a pistol, intimidated the plaintiff, he started to run, and when about eight feet from the car the flagman shot the plaintiff, striking him twice. This was one continuous act. The flagman was in discharge of his duty in discovering the plaintiff, and could not put off that character and without change of position assume another while the plaintiff was running eight feet, which a calculation shows was less than half a second. He could not be an employé of the railroad when he frightened the man and cease to be an employé and fire two accurate shots within the half second, or $\frac{1}{120}$ part of a minute while the badly frightened man was running eight feet. As the flagman fired and struck the fleeing man twice before he could run eight feet, the pistol must have been drawn and presented before the plaintiff turned to fly. The remark of the flagman "Come up here" must have been accompanied by the presented pistol which caused the precipitate retreat of the plaintiff. The act of the flagman was continuous and the shooting was so quick—two shots that were hits before the scared man could move more than eight feet—that it cannot be divided. But, independent of that, the flagman was at his post in the exercise of his employment, and for his conduct the defendant is responsible. Hayes v. Railroad Co., 141 N. C. 195, 53 S. E. 847. This court has held again and again that a railroad is liable for the conduct of its agents, whether negligent or willful and wanton, when the act is done in the course of their employment. In Jackson v. Telegraph Co., 139 N. C. 347, 51 S. E. 1015, 70 L. R. A. 788, it was held that the corporation must answer for the servant's wrongful act "if committed in the scope and course of the servant's employment," and that he is in such scope and course of employment if he "is at the time about his master's business." If this were not so, the corporation would never be liable, for it does not hire its employés to do negligent acts or commit wanton and willful wrongs.

The company was held liable when its station agent got into a difficulty with an ex-passenger over the delivery of a trunk and killed him, though he was certainly not employed to kill passengers (Daniel v. Railroad, 117 N. C. 592, 23 S. E. 327, 4 L. R. A. [N. S.] 485); nor was the conductor employed to kiss a female passenger, but he was on duty, and the company was held liable in Strother v. Railroad, 123 N. C. 197, 31 S. E. 386; nor was the fireman employed to throw a chunk of coal to frighten a boy who was stealing a ride on the tender, but the company paid for the resultant injury (Pierce v. Railroad, 124 N. C. 84, 32 S. E. 399, 44 L. R. A. 316); nor were the employés authorized to throw stones at a tramp stealing a ride, in fact, the duties of some did not involve that of making the tramp get off, but the company was held liable (Cook v. Southern Ry. Co., 128 N. C. 333, 38 S. E. 925). The fact that here the employé used a pistol instead of stones, and that a half second after the man had gotten off and was eight feet away, is an aggravation and not a defense. In Stewart v. Lumber Co., 146 N. C. 47, 59 S. E. 545, the company was held liable for the wanton conduct of employés as to one neither a passenger nor a trespasser by blowing the whistle and hollering to frighten plaintiff's horse who was injured in the resultant run-away. The question in that case which divided the majority of the court, whether the plaintiff could recover punitive damages or actual damages, does not now arise, but four of the court agreed that the action could be maintained, as had been done on a similar state of facts in Brendle v. Railroad, 125 N. C. 474, 34 S. E. 634; Hussey v. Railroad, 98 N. C. 84, 8 S. E. 923, 2 Am. St. Rep. 312. The company was held liable for torts of its agents, even when ultra vires. Gruber v. Railroad, 92 N. C. 1; White v. Railroad, 115 N. C. 636, 20 S. E. 191, 44 Am. St. Rep. 489; Waters v. Lumber Co., 115 N. C. 652, 20 S. E. 718. In the unanimous opinion of the court in Foot v. Railroad, 142 N. C. 52, 54 S. E. 843, the railroad was held liable for the willful and wanton misconduct of its employé, citing Brendle v. Railroad, 125 N. C. 474, 34 S. E. 634.

There are many other cases to same effect in this and the other states. It is difficult to see how the company is liable if the employé throws stones or coal at a trespasser, or frightens him, by cursing, into jumping off (Hayes v. Railroad Co. 141 N. C. 195, 53 S. E. 847), but is not liable if lead is used, nor how it is responsible to one off the right of way for injuries resulting from frightening his horse by shouts and blowing the whistle, and not liable for shooting one on the right of way, and not eight feet from the car. The liability of a farmer, merchant, or other citizen in the performance of his inherent right to do business for the conduct of his agents is necessarily not as broad as that of these great corporations, which are given artificial existence and great special privileges, on the ground not only that they shall be used for the public benefit, but on the implied agreement that they shall not be used to the public detriment. Using vast physical and pecuniary power, they must be liable for its misuse, and employing great numbers of men they alone can control them and are responsible for their discipline. They are liable for negligence of a fellow servant and for public regulation of their charges and conduct. If an employé on a rapidly moving train throws rocks or fires into a crowd, he could rarely be identified or found able to respond in damages. If he killed a citizen's horse or cow by shooting from the top of a train, the company would be responsible. Why not when he shoots a man? Jaggard on Torts, § 86, thus correctly sums up the result of the authorities: "The master is liable for the conduct of his servant within the course of his employment, not only where responsibility would attach under the test of scope of his employment, but also where the conduct is not intended to be for the master's benefit, but for the servant's malicious, capricious, or other private purpose, and whenever a duty rests on the master to avoid doing harm to the third persons and the servant violates that duty in the course of his employment." Under the reign of privilege in France one of the privileged class was seen to shoot a workman from the top of a building for the pleasure of seeing him tumble to the ground. He was not held to account, but the incident aided to topple over the French monarchy to its death. Corporations cannot claim such privileges for its officers or employés. If employés on a moving train can fire at cattle or at people along its track at will without any responsibility on the part of the company because the act is willful and wanton, then the company is using its vast privileges not upon terms of liability for good behavior to the public, but upon the narrow ground that, like a private business, it is only responsible for the conduct that it authorizes. It was wrong for the plaintiff to attempt to steal a ride; but the penalty for such offense is not execution by shooting. Upon the finding on the first and third issues, the court properly rendered judgment. The finding on the second issue very clearly was meant not to negative the finding on the first issue that the shooting was "reckless and wanton and as alleged in the complaint," but merely to negative that it was "in furtherance of the business" of the defendant. The second issue was immaterial and irrelevant, and should be disregarded.

SMITH v. ALPHIN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 7, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 758*)—BRIEFS—EXCEPTIONS—FAILURE TO SET OUT.

Under Supreme Court rule 34 (53 S. E. 1x), requiring the briefs to contain the several grounds of exception, exceptions not set out in the brief are abandoned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3093; Dec. Dig. § 753.*]

2. SALES (§ 40*)—MISREPRESENTATION.

That the seller did not inform the buyer that certain powders for use with a fumigating apparatus, the patent for which was the subject of the sale, contained sulphur, the use of which as a fruit preservative was forbidden by statute, did not constitute deceit or misrepresentation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 79-83; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

3. SALES (§ 50*)—MISREPRESENTATION—WAIVER.

The buyer cannot rely on alleged deceit by the seller in failing to inform him that powders used with an apparatus sold for preserving fruit contained sulphur, the use of which was prohibited by law, where the buyer afterward, with full knowledge of the facts, made a second trade with the seller with reference to the article.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1068*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—PREJUDICIAL EFFECT.

Any error in instructing, in an action for breach of warranty in the sale of preservative powders, that the important question was: "Did defendant warrant that the powders * * * would preserve fruit at a nominal cost?" etc., on the ground that the falsity of the warranty was the important question, was immaterial, where the jury answered the question in the negative.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4225; Dec. Dig. § 1068.*]

5. SALES (§ 262*)—WARRANTIES—RELIANCE BY BUYER.

To constitute a warranty, the buyer must have relied upon the statement with reasonable ground to do so, and a test of whether language was a warranty is whether it purported to state a fact upon which it could be fairly presumed the seller expected the buyer to rely, and upon which the buyer ordinarily would rely.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 262.*]

6. FOOD (§ 26*)—CONTRACTS—LEGALITY OF CONSIDERATION.

One selling a powder for use with an apparatus for preserving fruit, which contains sulphur, could not recover the purchase price, where the use of sulphur for that purpose was prohibited by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Food, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

7. FOOD (§ 1*)—REGULATION—STATUTORY PROVISION.

The Legislature had the constitutional power to enact Pure Food Law (Laws 1905, p. 340, c. 306) § 3, declaring the use of sulphur, etc., deleterious and dangerous to health when used in human food, and making its use illegal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Food, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

8. FOOD (§ 26*)—REMEDIES OF BUYER—RECOVERY OF PRICE.

Though Pure Food Law (Laws 1905, p. 340, c. 306) § 3, declares the use of sulphur, etc., deleterious and dangerous when added to human food, and makes its use illegal, the buyer could not recover back the price of an apparatus for preserving fruit because powders used therewith contained sulphur if the use of sulphur for that purpose was not in fact deleterious, so as to render the apparatus worthless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Food, Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

9. FOOD (§ 26*)—CONTRACTS—REMEDIES OF BUYER—RECOVERY OF PRICE.

The pure food law (Laws 1899, p. 216, c. 86), as amended by Laws 1905, p. 339, c. 306 (Revisal, § 3970a, subsec. 6), declaring sulphur, etc., deleterious and dangerous when used in food, has reference to the adulteration of food kept for sale, section 8969 in the same subchapter prohibiting the manufacture or sale of any article of food which is adulterated within the meaning of this subchapter; and hence, in an action for breach of warranty and deceit in not informing a buyer that powders used with an apparatus sold for preserving fruit contained sulphur to enable the buyer to recover the price, the pure food law would be inapplicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Food, Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

10. FOOD (§ 26*)—REMEDIES OF BUYER—RECOVERY OF PRICE.

Under Pure Food Law (Laws 1899, p. 219, c. 86) § 8 (Revisal, § 3972), authorizing the board of agriculture to cause all compounds or blended products to be properly branded, etc., and from time to time fix the limits of variability in any article of food, etc., but providing that, when standards have been fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, they shall be accepted as the standards of this state, if sulphur fumes were approved by the United States authorities as a means of preserving fruit, the pure food law would not give a right of action for breach of warranty or deceit in not informing the buyer that powders used with an apparatus sold for preserving fruit contained sulphur, even if it were otherwise applicable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Food, Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Wayne County; Neal, Judge.

Action by J. E. Smith against G. E. Alphin. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The plaintiff alleged two causes of action; i. e., false warranty in the sale of certain letters patent for an improved fumigating apparatus, which in connection with certain sanitary powders "would preserve all fruits and vegetables at a nominal cost"; and also for deceit and false representation in the sale thereof, the said powders being alleged by plaintiff to be hurtful, their use contrary to law, and valueless. The answer was a full denial. Verdict for defendant and appeal by plaintiff.

Aycock & Winston, M. T. Dickinson, and F. A. Daniels, for appellant. J. D. Langston and W. C. Munroe, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. Exceptions 1, 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, and 12 are abandoned, not being set out in appellant's brief. Rule 34 (53 S. E. ix).

Exception 2 was for refusal to submit issues as to the second cause of action—for deceit and misrepresentation. But there was no evidence to justify the submission of those issues. The plaintiff relies upon his evidence that the defendant did not divulge the nature of the powders—charcoal and sulphur—until after he had paid, and that the state law forbade the use of sulphur. Laws 1905, p. 340, c. 306, § 8. If this last applied to this case, this might have been a defense if the defendant had brought suit for the purchase money (Vinegar Co. v. Hawn, 149 N. C. 255, 63 S. E. 78); but it does not establish deceit or misrepresentation. Besides, as subsequently, with full knowledge, the plaintiff made a second trade with the defendant, he cannot now rely upon this allegation. Smith v. Newberry, 140 N. C. 385, 53 S. E. 234.

Exception 3 was that the judge told the jury that the second issue—"Did the defendant warrant that the said powders, when used in connection with said apparatus, would preserve fruits and vegetables at nominal cost, so that they would at all times be as fresh, palatable, and wholesome as when picked from the trees or gathered from the garden"—was the crucial one. The jury answered this issue "No." Therefore the plaintiff's contention that the third issue, "Was the warranty false?" was the crucial one, becomes immaterial.

The court charged: "One of the decisive tests whether the language used is a mere expression of opinion or a warranty is whether it purported to state a fact upon which it may be fairly presumed the seller expected the buyer to rely, and upon which the buyer would ordinarily rely." The plaintiff's seventh exception was to this paragraph of the charge and the eighth was to the following instruction: "In addition to this, in order to constitute a warranty, the plaintiff must have relied on it, and must have reasonably relied upon it." We cannot sustain these exceptions. Baum v. Stevens, 24 N. C. 411; Beaseley v. Surles, 140 N. C. 605, 53 S. E. 360.

Exception 11: The food chemist, Mr. Alphen, testified substantially that it was against the statutes of North Carolina for one to sell a preparation containing sulphur to be used in the preservation of fruit. Counsel for the plaintiff commented upon this evidence; but the court charged the jury that the act in question had nothing to do with the case. The plaintiff contends that it had much to do with the case, for, if the preparation was outlawed by the state, it was worthless, that the person using it would be guilty of a misdemeanor, and the contract between plaintiff and defendant would be not only contra bonos mores, but a violation of a plain statute, and therefore there would be no consideration whatever to support the contract, and the contract would be inoperative and void, that this contract was solvable only in North Carolina, and it was useless and worthless in said state, and no valid cause of action can grow out of a breach thereof—citing Pure Food Law (chapter 306, p. 340, Laws 1905) § 8; Leathers v. Tobacco Co., 144 N. C. 343, 57 S. E. 11, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 349. It is true that the defendant could not recover the purchase price if the use of sulphur for that purpose was forbidden, but it does not necessarily follow that the article would be deleterious or worthless, and that the plaintiff could therefore recover back the money paid. The Legislature had the constitutional right to enact the statute, but its judgment as to the laws of chemistry may be incorrect and the article not deleterious. If so, while the seller could not recover the purchase price, the buyer cannot recover it back. The pure food law (chapter 86, p. 216, Laws 1899; chapter 306, p. 339, Laws 1905; Revisal 1905, § 3970a (6)) manifestly has reference to the adulteration of foods kept for sale (Revisal 1905, § 3969), and therefore, if for no other reason, does not apply to this controversy, and the judge instead of the witness, was right. Section 8, c. 89, p. 219, Laws 1899, now Revisal 1905, § 3972, is as follows: "But when standards have been or may be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States they shall be accepted by the board of agriculture and published as the standards for North Carolina." It is asserted in defendant's brief that at the time this contract was made preserving by sulphur fumes was approved by the agricultural department of the United States, and that a circular has been issued by it approving of such preservatives. If so, then for this additional reason the pure food law had nothing to do with this case.

No error.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 222*)—ADMISSIONS—DECLARATION IN DISPARAGEMENT OF TITLE.

In an action to recover land claimed by defendants through adverse possession, testimony of a witness as to a conversation with one of the defendants while the defendant was living on the land concerning a letter to plaintiffs was properly admitted, in so far as it did not relate to the contents of the letter, to prove a declaration by the defendant in acknowledgment of plaintiffs' title, and in disparagement of her own.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—FAILURE TO RAISE POINT IN LOWER COURT.

Where the objection that evidence introduced which was competent as against one defendant was not so as against the others was not raised by a request that the court restrict it, and no such ground of objection is stated in the statement of case, the question cannot be considered on appeal under Supreme Court Rule 27, 140 N. C. 662 (53 S. E. viii), providing that it will not be ground of exception that evidence competent for some purposes, but not for all, is admitted generally, unless appellant ask at the time of admission that its purpose be restricted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1274; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 21*)—EVIDENCE OF AGENCY—TESTIMONY OF AGENT.

Testimony of a person that he was the agent of others, and as such had charge of land, paid taxes, and collected rents, was competent to prove the agency; it not being proof of agency by declarations of the alleged agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 39; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action to recover land claimed by defendants through adverse possession, where the court correctly charged as to what would constitute adverse possession by defendants such as to defeat plaintiffs' recovery, and that, if a third person cut timber on the land without the knowledge or acquiescence of defendants, it would not affect their claim, but that it would be otherwise if he was recognized by defendants as acting for plaintiffs, it was not error to refuse a charge that possession of the land for the continuous period of 20 years raises a presumption that the person in possession had a title therefor, and the fact that a third person cut timber from the land without defendants' knowledge would not be such a possession as to defeat their title by adverse possession, and rebut the presumption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Randolph County; Long, Judge.

Action by Charlotte L. Hill and others against Kirby Bean and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The special instruction asked by defendants was as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that possession of the land for the continuous period of 20 years raises a presumption that the party in possession has a title therefor, and the fact that the witness Thayer cut timber from the land in controversy without the knowledge of the defendant would not be such a possession as to defeat the title of the defendants by adverse possession and rebut the said presumption."

J. G. Brittain and Elijah Moffitt, for appellants. Hammer & Kelly and J. A. Spence, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to recover two contiguous tracts of land containing about 168 acres. Title was admitted to be out of the state, and the plaintiffs own the land unless the defendants have acquired title thereto by adverse possession. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants' possession was not adverse, but they held the same by permission of the plaintiffs. In order to show that the defendants were merely tenants of the plaintiffs, the latter introduced as a witness Scott Smoke, who testified as to a conversation between him and Emily Bean, one of the defendants, while she was living on the land, concerning a letter to the plaintiffs. The court excluded the testimony so far as it related to the contents of the letter, but admitted it as tending to prove a declaration by Emily Bean in acknowledgment of the plaintiffs' title and in disparagement of her own. For this purpose, it was clearly competent, and the testimony was properly restricted to that purpose. Yates v. Yates, 76 N. C. 142; Suaffner v. Gaynor, 117 N. C. 24, 23 S. E. 154; Ratliff

v. Ratliff, 131 N. C. 428, 42 S. E. 887, 63 L. R. A. 963. The testimony of A. D. Hamilton, which was objected to by the defendants, was substantially to the same effect as that of Scott Smoke, except that it related to a declaration of Richard Bean in disparagement of his title, and tended to show that Bean was in possession, not claiming in his own right, but in subordination to the plaintiffs' title. This kind of evidence has always been held to be competent as will appear by reference to Shaffer v. Gaynor, supra, and the cases therein cited. The testimony of the witness Scott Smoke was competent against Emily Bean, and, if the defendants intended to raise the question that it was not so against the other defendants, they should have requested the judge to restrict it, but no such ground of objection is stated in the case. See Rule 27, 140 N. C. 662 (53 S. E. viii). The same may be said of the testimony of the witness A. D. Hamilton. It was competent for Mr. Bradshaw to testify that he was the agent of Francis A. C. Hill and others, and as such had charge of the land, paid the taxes, and collected the rents. This is not a case of proving an agency by the declaration of the alleged agent, but by the testimony of the agent under oath.

We do not see any error in the refusal of the court to give the instruction requested by the defendants. The judge correctly charged the jury as to what would constitute such adverse possession of the land by the defendants as to defeat the plaintiffs' recovery. He told the jury that, if Thayer's acts in cutting the timber were committed without the knowledge or acquiescence of the defendants, they would not affect their claim or impair their rights, but it would be otherwise if he was recognized by the defendants as acting for and in behalf of the plaintiffs. This instruction was as favorable to the defendants as they had any reason to expect.

The jury found in response to the issues that the plaintiffs are the owners of the land in controversy and awarded damages. Upon this verdict judgment was entered for the plaintiffs, and defendants appealed. We find no error, after a most careful examination, in the rulings or judgment of the court.

No error.

CAMPBELL v. CRONLY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. April 14, 1909.)

1. SUBMISSION OF CONTROVERSY (§ 1*)—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

A submission of controversy without action on agreed facts, where a contract to sell land has been made, and a dispute arises as to the title of the vendors, will be entertained as a bill for specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Submission of Controversy, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 175*)—DEFECTIVE TITLE—ABATEMENT IN PRICE.

Where vendors are unable to convey a fee, as they have contracted, the vendee may, unless it will be inequitable, take such interest as they can convey, and have a reasonable deduction from the contract price.

3. SUBMISSION OF CONTROVERSY (§ 3*)—INTERESTS IN LAND.

Under Laws 1893, p. 87, c. 6 (Revisal 1905, § 1589), providing that an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him for the purpose of determining such adverse claim, there may be a submission of controversy without action on agreed facts to determine the interest of parties in land under a deed of trust.

4. TRUSTS (§ 140*)—SURVIVORSHIP—SHIFTING USE.

Under a deed to F. in trust, to hold for the use of L., A., and E. in fee, "and to the survivors of them," on the death of L., by way of a shifting use, the beneficial interest in the entire property vested in A. and E. in fee, and this without right of survivorship as between A. and E.

Clark, C. J., dissenting. Brown, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from Superior Court; New Hanover County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Submission of controversy between Annie H. Campbell, as plaintiff, and Eliza W. Cronly and others, as defendants. From the judgment, both sides appealed. Affirmed.

See, also, 61 S. E. 1134.

This is a controversy submitted without action for the purpose of quieting title to real estate pursuant to section 1589 of the Revisal of 1905. The agreed facts are: On May 20, 1869, H. C. Brock conveyed to Wm. B. Flanner the land in controversy, being a lot in the city of Wilmington, upon certain trusts fully set forth in the deed which was duly admitted to probate and registration. On the 2d day of March, 1895, certain persons entitled to beneficial interest in said property instituted an action in the superior court of New Hanover county against certain other persons likewise interested and the heirs at law of the trustee who had died, for the purpose of having certain corrections made in said deed, all of which will fully appear by reference to the record in said cause, made a part of the case agreed. Pursuant to the prayer of the plaintiffs, judgment was rendered by said court correcting said deed by inserting words "of inheritance" therein which had been inadvertently omitted by the draughtsman. The deed, as corrected by said judgment vested the title to said real estate in the said W. B. Flanner in fee upon the following trusts: To hold for the use of Emily B. London, her heirs and assigns, wife of Mauger London, and Annie H. London, her heirs and assigns, and Eliza W. London, her heirs and assigns, children of the said Mauger London, and the survivors of them: Provided, however, that, if the said Annie H. London or Eliza W. London shall die leaving issue, then to the use of such surviving issue, who shall take the same per stirpes, and not per capita; and provided, further, that if the said Annie H. or Eliza W. should die without issue, leaving the said Emily B. surviving, then to the use of the said Emily B. and such survivors, and if the said Annie H. and Eliza W. should die, leaving the said Emily B. surviving, then to the use of the said Emily B. during her life, and, if she should die leaving issue, then to the use of such issue and their heirs, and if the said Emily B. should die, leaving the said Annie H. or Eliza W. surviving, then to the use of such survivors, and, in case of the death of the said Emily B., Annie H., and Eliza W. without issue, then to the surviving children of the said M. London and their issue, if any such said children be living, to take per stirpes, and not per capita. Mauger London, who is mentioned in the said deed, died intestate on the 10th day of May, 1894. He left him surviving his wife, Emily B. London, and by a former marriage his child, Annie H. London. Emily B. London, who was the second wife of Mauger London, and who is mentioned as one of the beneficiaries under the aforesaid deed, died on the 6th day of June, 1897, leaving her surviving Eliza W. Cronly, her only child and sole heir at law. On the 16th day of March, 1903, all of the heirs of Mauger London executed their deed to Annie H. Campbell and Eliza W. Cronly, conveying any and all such right, title, and interest which they had in said real estate. Said deed was duly proven and recorded. Annie H. London married Archibald R. Campbell. The only child by this union was James Douglas Campbell, now living. Eliza W. London married Joseph M. Cronly, and is now a widow. By her marriage she has had three children, to wit, Jean Murphy, Robert Dixon, and Margaret Cronly, all of whom are minors, but in this proceeding are represented by Geo. H. Howell, their duly appointed guardian ad litem. The said Annie H. Campbell and Eliza W.

Cronly, claiming that, as tenants in common, they are the owners in fee of the said property, agreed to sell the same for the sum of $12,000 to the defendant John London, but he is advised that the said parties are not seised in fee of the said property, and have only a life estate therein, and that, upon the determination of the life estate, the property descends to their issue, and he declines to purchase the property until it is determined whether the said parties have a life estate or fee simple in said property; but, if it is adjudged that they have a right to convey, he stands ready and is able to comply with his contract of purchase. Eliza W. Cronly contends that she has an undivided two-thirds interest in the property; that the deed of trust from Brock to Flanner vested a fee simple in Emily B. London, her mother, Annie H. Campbell, and herself, each having an undivided one-third interest therein; that by the death of Emily B. London, her mother, she, the said Eliza W. Cronly, inherited as her sole heir the undivided interest vested in the said Emily B. London, and that by reason thereof, and her own one-third interest in her own right, she is vested with an undivided two-thirds interest in the fee in said property. Annie H. Campbell contends that, by the deed of trust from Brock to Flanner, the property vested in Emily B. London, Eliza W. London, and herself, and, upon the death of the said Emily B. London, by survivorship the fee vested in Annie H. Campbell and Eliza W. London in equal parts, and therefore she contends that she has an undivided one-half interest therein. The minor defendants, Jean Murphy Cronly, Robert Dixon Cronly, and Margaret Cronly, by their guardian ad litem, Geo. H. Howell, make no contention in regard to the title to said premises, but will abide the judgment of the court upon the facts here agreed as to any rights, future or contingent, they might have under the deed of Brock to Flanner, trustee.

His honor was of the opinion upon the foregoing case agreed that the plaintiff Mrs. Annie H. Campbell and the defendant Mrs. Eliza W. Cronly were the owners in the proportion of one-half each of the real estate in controversy; that, upon the death of each, their interest will pass to their "heirs at law, such heirs to take per stirpes"; that they could not convey the land in fee simple to the purchaser. Judgment was rendered accordingly. Plaintiff Mrs. Campbell and defendant Mrs. Cronly assigned error, and appealed.

Emple & Emple, for plaintiff. Moares & Ruark, for defendants.

CONNOR, J. When this cause was before us on appeal at the last term, the purchaser of the land was not a party. We remanded the case to the end that further parties be made which has been done. The first question which confronts us is whether, in the present condition of the record we can take jurisdiction and decide the several questions presented in regard to the title to the locus in quo. This court has frequently entertained and decided controversies wherein parties have entered into a contract to sell land, and the purchaser has refused to comply because of doubts entertained in regard to the title. We have treated such suits as bills by the vendor against the vendee for specific performance. It is well settled by uniform decisions of this and other courts of equitable jurisdiction that the purchaser will not be required to take a doubtful title. It therefore became necessary to inquire into the vendor's title, which was sometimes done, by a reference to the clerk and master or a referee selected for that purpose. Bispham, Eq. § 378; Gentry v. Hamilton, 38 N. C. 376. While the vendee will not be required to pay the contract price and take a doubtful or imperfect title, he may, if he so elect and it be not inequitable, have a decree for such part of the land or such interest as the vendor can convey, with a deduction from the contract price. Mr. Bispham thus states the equitable doctrine: "It may sometimes happen that defects exist which render the property less valuable than the contract price; but which nevertheless may not be of so vital a character as to induce the purchaser entirely to throw up his bargain. In such a case the equity of specific performance with compensation comes into play for the benefit of the vendee." Equity, 390. It is said in the note to Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 265, L. C. Eq. vol. 11, part 11, 15: "It may be laid down as a general rule, subject, however, to some exception, that a purchaser may, if he chooses, compel a vendor who has contracted to convey a larger interest in an estate than he has to convey to him such interest as he is entitled to with compensation." Lord Eldon in Mortlock v. Buller, 10 Ves. 315, says: "For the purpose of this jurisdiction, the person contracting under these circumstances is bound by the assertion in his contract, and, if the vendee choose to take such as he can have, he has a right to that and to an abatement, and the court will not hear the objection by the vendor that the purchaser cannot have the whole." Jacobs v. Locke, 37 N. C. 286. In such cases it becomes necessary for the court to inquire into the state of the title of the vendor, to the end that it may mould its decree as to do complete equity to all of the parties. So in this appeal, if the vendee so desires, he may, unless it would be inequitable, acquire under his contract of purchase at a reasonable deduction from the contract price such interest, if any, as either of the vendors have a right to convey.

There is, however, another ground upon which a majority of the court are of the opinion that we have and are compelled to take jurisdiction and decide the controversy in regard to the disputed title. It is well settled that prior to St. 1893, p. 37, c. 6 (Revisal 1905, § 1589), the jurisdiction of courts of equity to entertain bills to remove cloud from title or to quiet title was restricted within well-defined limits. Busbee v. Macy, 85 N. C. 329; Busbee v. Lewis, 85 N. C. 332. In the opinions in these cases by Ruffin, J., this court adhered to the decisions in this and other states, many of which he cited and commented upon. Pearson v. Boyden, 86 N. C. 585, and cases cited. The Legislature at the session of 1893 enacted a statute for the purpose of enlarging the power of the courts to entertain suits to quiet titles where the conditions were such that a possessory action could not be brought. Of course, if the plaintiff had a complete remedy by means of a civil action, there was no necessity for resorting to the statutory remedy. Pearson v. Boyden, supra. The material part of the statute is in the following words: "An action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him for the purpose of determining such adverse claim." Prof. Pomeroy (4 Eq. § 1396), after discussing the jurisdiction of courts of equity prior to the passage of this and similar statutes in other states, says: "The action has been greatly extended by statute and in many states is the ordinary mode of trying disputed titles." He gives in a note a list of the states in which the statutes have been enacted. He further says: "In almost every instance the statutes, either by express terms or through broad and general language, allow the action to be maintained by persons having equitable titles. In other words, a plaintiff need not have a legal title. * * * The statute is an enabling act, and the action may be brought against one or more claimants without regard to the interest or title—legal or equitable—which he or the plaintiff may have." The California statute is in the same words as ours. Chief Justice Field in Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 259, says: "It is unnecessary for the plaintiff to delay seeking the equitable interposition of the court until he has been disturbed in his possession by the institution of a suit against him, and until judgment has been passed in such suit in his favor. It is sufficient if, whilst in the possession of the property, a party out of possession claims an estate or interest adverse to him. He can immediately upon knowledge of the assertion of such claim require the nature and character of the adverse estate or interest to be produced, exposed, and judicially determined, and the question of title be thus forever quieted. It does not follow from the fact that the suit is brought in equity that the determination of questions purely of a legal character in relation to the title will necessarily be withdrawn from the ordinary cognizance of a court of law. The court sitting in equity may direct whenever in its judgment it may become proper an issue to be framed upon the pleadings and submitted to the jury * * * There is no difficulty in so conducting a suit under the statute as to fully protect the legal rights of the parties, and at the same time to secure the beneficial results afforded by a court of equity in bills of peace, which is repose from further litigation. Indeed, the remedy under the statute is eminently simple, direct, and efficacious for this purpose." The Nebraska statute, being practically in the same language, was discussed by the same eminent jurist while a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States in Holland v. Challen, 110 U. S. 15, 3 Sup. Ct. 495, 28 L. Ed. 52, when he said: "Any person claiming title to real estate, whether in or out of possession, may maintain the suit against one who claims an adverse estate in it for the purpose of determining such estate and quieting the title. It is certainly for the interest of the state that this jurisdiction of the court should be maintained, and that causes of apprehended litigation respecting real property necessarily affecting its use and enjoyment should be removed; for, so long as they remain, they will prevent improvement and consequent benefit to the public. It is a matter of everyday observation that many lots of land in our cities remain unimproved because of conflicting claims to them. * * * It is manifestly to the interests of the community that conflicting claims to property thus situated should be settled so that it may be subject to use and improvement. To meet cases of this character statutes like the one in Nebraska have been passed by several states, and they accomplish a most useful purpose." It was held that the federal courts would enforce the statutes when they had jurisdiction by reason of diverse citizenship. In Parrish v. Ferris, 67 U. S. 606, 17 L. Ed. 817, the Ohio statute was enforced. See, also, Fry v. Summers, 4 Idaho, 424, 39 Pac. 1118, where the statute was in the same language as ours. In Walton v. Perkins, 33 Minn. 357, 23 N. W. 527, Mitchell, J., says: "This statute is intended to afford an easy and expeditious mode of determining all conflicting claims to land, whether derived from a common source or from different and independent sources." In Adler v. Sullivan, 115 Ala. 582, 22 South. 87, Harrolson, J., says: "The statute is an extension of the remedy in equity theretofore existing for the removal of clouds on title." Discussing the equitable remedy prior to the statute, he says: "This statute goes in advance of that remedy, and, in addition, allows any person in peaceable possession of lands claiming to own the same, whose title thereto or any part thereof is denied or disputed, or where any other person claims or is claimed or is reputed to own the same, or any interest therein, or to hold any lien or incumbrance thereon, and no suit shall be pending to enforce or test the validity of such title, claim, or incumbrance, to bring and maintain a suit in equity to settle the title to said lands, and clear up all doubts and disputes concerning the same." In Holmes v. Chester, 26 N. J. Eq. 79, the Chancellor, discussing a similar statute, says: "It is highly remedial and beneficial. It should therefore be construed liberally. It is a statute of repose. It deprives the defendant of no right. His claim may be tried at law if he desires it." So Beasley, C. J., in Jersey City v. Lembeck, 31 N. J. Eq. 255, says: "The inequity that was designed to be remedied grew out of the situation of a person in the possession of land as owner in which land another person claimed an interest which he would not enforce, and the hardship was that the person so in possession could not force his adversary to sue and thus put the claim to the test." Albro v. Dayton, 50 N. J. Eq. 574, 25 Atl. 937. This court in Daniels v. Baxter, 120 N. C. 14, 26 S. E. 635, held that it was not necessary that plaintiff should be in possession of the property to maintain his action. In Rumbo v. Manufacturing Co., 129 N. C. 9, 39 S. E. 581, it was held that, when the alleged cloud upon the title was found to be invalid, the court should not dismiss the action, but should adjudge such invalidity, and remove the cloud. The present Chief Justice said: "It was because the Legislature thought the equitable doctrines (as laid down in Busbee's Case) inconvenient or unjust that the act (1893) was passed." Beck v. Meroney, 135 N. C. 532, 47 S. E. 613; McLamb v. McPhail, 126 N. C. 218, 35 S. E. 426. The statute provides that, if the defendant disclaims title, the cost is adjudged against the plaintiff. The wisdom of enlarging the power of the court to deal with the subject is manifest. It is highly important to private right and public interest that titles shall be rendered secure and certain. As said by Judge Field, it is a matter of common observation that in almost every town or city are lots either without any improvement, or such as have been erected in the past falling into decay, the growth and development of the town impeded by some obscure, uncertain cloud upon, or question in regard to, the title. In many cases, without the aid of the statute, it is impossible to bring the claimants before the court, and have them assert and "try out" their claim. It sometimes happens that obscure contingent limitations imposed upon titles operate to impoverish an entire generation, when, upon a careful judicial examination, the title may be cleared up, rights adjudged, and property unfettered, bringing it either into market or enabling the owners to improve and receive an income from it. It is this evil which the Legislature has sought to remedy by providing a simple, inexpensive, and efficient procedure which the courts, by reason of precedents from which they were unwilling to break away, were unable to afford. The unanimity with which the judges have recognized the wisdom of the legislation giving it a liberal construction has made it effective.

This brings us to a consideration of the assignments of error made by both plaintiff and defendants to his honor's judgment. The conveyance by Mr. London to Flanner, trustee, vests the legal title in him in fee with a declaration of the use to Mrs. London, his wife, and Annie H. and Eliza W., his daughters, in fee "and to the survivors of them." Whatever difficulty we would have found in giving effect to these last words in a common-law conveyance, operating by livery of seisin, is obviated in a deed operating under the statute of uses in which the intention of the grantor may be effectuated. "It is a maxim of the common law that no estate can be limited upon a fee simple; or, in other words, an estate in fee simple cannot be made to cease as to one, and take effect, by way of limitation, upon a contingent event, in another person. It is clearly settled that limitations of that kind may take effect by way of use." Coke, Lit. 271 (note), cited by Mr. Justice Ashe in Smith v. Brisson, 90 N. C. 284, where the authorities are collected. In Rowland v. Rowland, 93 N. C. 215, the conveyance was to two children of the grantor in fee as tenants in common; "and upon the death of either one then to the survivor and his or her heirs forever." Ashe, J., said: "Its effect was to transfer the use to the two donees in fee, and, upon the death of Ophelia, to shift the use of her moiety to John and his heirs. By a shifting use a fee may be limited after a fee." After an interesting discussion of the subject, the learned justice says: "Our opinion is a defeasible fee in common was given to Ophelia and John, and, upon the death of Ophelia, the absolute fee vested in John as survivor, because such was the manifest intention of the donor, and because that construction is not in violation of any principle of law or rule of construction." Mordecai's Lectures, 871. This authority is conclusive to the effect that by way of a shifting use the beneficial interest in the entire property upon the death of Mrs. London vested in Annie H. and Eliza W. London in fee. Did it vest in them absolutely, or did the right of survivorship attach, carrying the equitable title or use to the last survivor? It will be observed that the grantor uses the words "and to the survivors of them." If controlling effect is given the word "survivors," the language of the deed is complied with upon the death of Mrs. London, and the daughters take the entire estate absolutely. In Hilliard v. Kearney, 45 N. C. 221, Pearson, J., discusses the question of successive survivorships at much length. There the property was given to five daughters with a proviso that, if either of them died without issue, "her part to be equally divided between her other sisters." It was held that upon the death of the first sister without issue the shares of the survivors became absolute. He invokes the rule that, when the language of the maker of the instrument leaves his intention in doubt, that construction will be adopted which will make the estate "absolute and indefeasible." It is said in Cox v. Hogg, 17 N. C. 121, that in ascertaining whether a succession of survivorships is created the court will examine other parts of the will. In Fortescue v. Satterthwaite, 23 N. C. 566, the limitation was made to depend upon the death of either of the first takers without children, when the property passed to "the children then living." These words were held to create a succession of survivorships. We have examined the cases in our reports, and, as said by Judge Battle in Biddle v. Hoyt, 54 N. C. 159, it is difficult to extract any satisfactory principle from them. In Galloway v. Carter, 100 N. C. 111, 5 S. E. 4, the limitation was dependent upon "any or either" of the children dying without issue, etc. These words, together with others of like import, were held to create a succession of survivorships. In view of the use of the word "survivors" and the fact that the grantor attaches a limitation to the issue of his daughters, if either of them should die leaving issue, we conclude that, upon the death of Mrs. London, the entire use or interest vested in the daughters in fee.

This would dispose of the appeal, but for the words which follow: "Provided, however, that if the said Annie H. or Eliza W. London shall die leaving issue, then to the use of such surviving issue who shall take the same per stirpes and not per capita." These words would create in the daughters a determinable fee, and, upon the death of either, the use would shift and vest in the "surviving issue" unless the superadded words "they to take per stirpes and not per capita" denotes that the grantor used the word "issue" as synonymous with "heirs," and, by directing the title in the same channel as it would be carried by the canons of descent, make the children and grandchildren of his daughters take by descent, and not by purchase. We think that it was the intention of Mr. London to settle the property, in the event which has happened, the death of his wife, upon his daughters with a limitation to their children and the children of such of them as should predecease their parents, and that he used the words that they should take "per stirpes and not per capita" to remove any doubt in respect to the interests which they would take. Having given it to the daughters in fee, he certainly could not have intended to attach a limitation for their issue, which was ineffectual, and left the estate in the same plight as it was by the language first used. He intended that the word "issue" should include grandchildren of his daughters whose parents had predeceased them, with the provision that such grandchildren should take by representation; that is, the shares or interest which their deceased parent would have taken if surviving. When language is used having a clearly defined legal significance, there is no room for construction to ascertain the intent. It must be given its legal meaning and effect. This is illustrated by what is said in Leathers v. Gray, 101 N. C. 162, 7 S. E. 657, 9 Am. St. Rep. 30, in which Merrimon, J., says: "The real intention must have effect, but the real intention recognized and enforced by the law is that expressed in the will, and this is to be ascertained by a legal interpretation of the language employed to express it"; or, as the learned Justice says in the same case: "He must express his intention in words appropriate and sufficient to express his real meaning, and, if he employs technical legal words, the technical meaning must prevail, unless the same shall be qualified or modified by superadded words in the will." When, however, the words of limitation are of doubtful meaning, or their usual meaning, as used, is rendered doubtful by superadded words, and we are compelled to resort to construction, they must, if possible, be given such construction as will effectuate the intention of the maker of the deed or will. The word "issue" has been construed to include grandchildren when it was manifest that it was so intended; just as the word "heirs" has been restricted to children when words are superadded showing such intention. Mills v. Thorne, 95 N. C. 362. If by this deed the limitation had been to the children of Annie H. and Eliza W. and the children of such as should die before their ancestor, such children to take the share of their parent by representation, it is clear that the rule in Shelley's Case would not have operated to vest in the daughters the fee. If, by construction, we give the words used by Mr. London the same meaning, the same result would follow. The other limitations are eliminated by the death of Mrs. London, leaving Annie H. and Eliza W. living and the deed from the children of Mr. London to Mrs. Campbell and Mrs. Cronly.

We conclude, therefore, that his honor correctly held that the plaintiff, Mrs. Campbell, and the defendant Mrs. Cronly cannot convey to the purchaser a good and indefeasible title to the locus in quo. The conveyance by James Douglas Campbell to his mother vests in her his interest, but, if he should die leaving issue before his mother, such issue would take as a purchaser under the limitation in the deed.

The judgment must be affirmed.

WALKER, J., did not sit.

BROWN, J. I concur in the opinion written by Mr. Justice CONNOR in this case so far as it passes upon the title to the property contracted to be sold by Annie H. Campbell and Eliza W. Cronly, and holding that they cannot make to the purchaser London a good and indefeasible title in fee.

At a former term we remanded the cause to the end that the purchaser be made a party, which has been done. Having then treated the matter as a bona fide controversy submitted without action under our Code to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase land, and our order having been complied with, I see no reason now why the controversy should not be determined. We have heretofore treated such controversies submitted without action upon agreed facts, where bona fide, as bills in equity by the vendor against the vendee for specific performance. I do not agree, however, that the act of 1893 (Laws 1893, p. 37, c. 6), referred to in the opinion, will permit any kind of a dispute about the title to land to be brought before the courts under the guise of a "controversy submitted without action" simply to obtain the opinion of the court upon an abstract proposition or a moot point in a matter where no present relief can be had or no final judicial process issued. As there is nothing in the record which impeaches the bona fide character of this controversy between vendors and vendee, I concur that the judgment of the superior court should be affirmed.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). In the case on appeal it is stated: "This action is brought by the plaintiff against the defendants to determine the rights and liabilities of the several parties hereto in a certain lot of land, located in the city of Wilmington, New Hanover county, of this state. It is agreed by the parties hereto that the facts upon which the controversy depends may be submitted to the court as in an action without controversy, and judgment may be entered thereon, subject to the right of either party to appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court." The proceeding proves on examination to be two interrogatories submitted to the court to ascertain its opinion as to what are the respective interests of two persons in a certain lot, without any real litigation, and there is nothing that the judgment of the court can act upon. Accordingly the judgment of the court below is merely an opinion, or legal advice, as to the respective rights or interests of the parties in the property. Had the property been sold by order of court for partition, the question now asked us might have been presented upon appeal from the judgment distributing the proceeds, and it might come up in other ways in a real litigation. But, as now presented, it is simply a "moot" point, and the court is asked to give its opinion as a matter of advice or legal information. The court is asked to pass its opinion upon an abstract proposition in a matter in which it cannot adjudge or direct that the parties themselves or the officers of the law shall take any action. This is not a matter of which the courts will take jurisdiction. McKethan v. Ray, 71 N. C. 165; Board of Education v. Kenan, 112 N. C. 569, 17 S. E. 485. It is the function of counsel, not of the courts, to advise parties as to their rights and answer interrogatories as to the law as herein propounded. A case exactly "on all fours" is Heptinstall v. Newsome, 146 N. C. 503, 60 S. E. 416, in which Brown, J., speaking for a unanimous court, says: "The advisory jurisdiction of courts of equity is primarily confined to trusts and trustees, which includes executors, as far as their rights, powers, and duties under the will are concerned." And then, after citing authorities, sums up: "This is not an action brought by the plaintiff against some person claiming an estate or interest in the tract devised to him, but is evidently a proceeding brought in the interest of the several devisees of parcels of land to settle and determine all their respective rights arising under the will in present and in futuro, in which the executors, as such, have no interest. The appeal and the actions are dismissed."

It would add immensely to the volume of business in the courts if any two or more parties could at will propound interrogatories to the courts as to matters about which they are in doubt. "Submission of a controversy without action" was intended only to dispense with summons and pleadings, where there is a real controversy in which the court can render judgment as in any other action. It was not intended to devolve upon the courts the duty of answering legal questions without any judgment to put the opinion into effect. The two interrogatories submitted to the court are solely as to what are the respective interests of Mrs. Campbell and Mrs. Cronly in the land whether each owns one-third or one-half interest therein, and present only a moot point. Especially is this so, since the court holds that they cannot convey it.

Courts decide legal propositions, not as advisory counsel, but only when necessary in determining the relief to be adjudged.

WILLIAMS v. NEWTON et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. ACTION (§ 60*)—SEPARATING CAUSES OF ACTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

While a widow cannot take both dower and a distributive share of her husband's estate, under the express provisions of Civ. Code 1902, § 2386, she cannot be put to her election until she has had full opportunity to be advised as to what her interests require her to do, and where under the will, if valid, there would be no distributive share which she could elect to take, and she sued to set aside the will, she could not be put to her election until the suit was decided; and, having set up causes of action both for dower and for a distributive share, the court, upon sustaining a demurrer to the complaint as setting up two inconsistent causes of action, acted within its discretion in ordering the causes separated and docketed as distinct actions, under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 193, providing that upon sustaining such a demurrer the court may in its discretion order the action divided, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 703; *Dec. Dig. § 60]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 47*)—DISMISSING ONE OF TWO CAUSES OF ACTION—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where an action for dower was improperly joined with an action to set aside decedent's will, since the action for dower could not be tried until the action to set aside the will was decided, when plaintiff would be required to elect whether she would claim a distributive share or dower, the court acted within its discretion in refusing to dismiss the cause of action for dower, since otherwise limitation might bar the claim before termination of the litigation over the will.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by Mary B. Williams against R. C. Newton, as trustee and executor of Frank Williams, and others. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and the causes of action set up therein separated, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Newton & Owens, for appellants. Livingston & Muller, for respondent.

WOODS, J. Mary B. Williams, claiming to be the widow of Frank Williams, deceased, brought this action against the executor of his will and Frank Quick and William Williams, stating in her complaint two causes of action. As a first cause of action she alleges her right to dower as the widow of Frank Williams in certain real estate, of which he was seised in his lifetime and during his coverture with her. As a second cause of action she alleges that Frank Williams undertook by his will to devise all of his property to Charles S. McCall, as trustee for the use of the defendant Frank Quick, a bastard child of the testator, with contingent remainder to the defendant William Williams, a brother of the testator. The relief asked is (1) that the will be adjudged null and void as to the plaintiff, in so far as it purports to be a devise and bequest of more than one-fourth of the estate of testator to his bastard son, and that the plaintiff's interest in the estate be set apart to her in severalty; (2) that the executor account for the personal property that came into his hands; (3) that dower be set off to plaintiff in the real estate, if the court should refuse to set aside the will; (4) that the will be construed, and the rights of the plaintiff established; and (5) for such other and further relief as may be just. The defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that a cause of action for dower and a cause of action for a distributive share of the testator's estate could not be united in the same complaint. The circuit judge decided the demurrer in this language: "It is very doubtful whether or not the two causes of action set up in this cause of action are inconsistent (no regard being had to the prayer for judgment, which ought not to be considered in construing the pleading); but, as the plaintiff's counsel seems willing that the demurrer may take the course provided by section 193 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, I will so direct. It is therefore ordered that the demurrer is sustained, and it is further ordered that the two causes of action set up in the complaint be, and the same are hereby, divided into two separate and distinct actions and be docketed accordingly."

Section 193, Code Civ. Proc., provides that, if a demurrer be sustained for the reason that several causes of action have been improperly united, "the court may in its discretion and upon such terms as may be just order the action to be divided into as many actions as may be necessary to the proper determination of the causes therein mentioned." We do not think that defendant's objections to the order are valid. It is true that the plaintiff cannot take, as the widow of Frank Williams, both dower and a distributive share of his estate (Civ. Code 1902, § 2386); but it is also true that she cannot be put to her election until she has had full opportunity to be advised as to the condition of the property and her legal rights. In Pinckney v. Pinckney, 2 Rich. Eq. 241, it was held that the widow was not to be required to make her election until the state of the property had been ascertained in the litigation then pending. In Hall v. Hall, 2 McCord's Eq. 269, Chancellor De Saussure says the widow is not bound to make her election until the affairs of the estate are so far wound up as to enable her to have a clear perception of what her interests require her to do. Here the testator undertook to dispose of all his property by will, and if the will be valid, then there would be no distributive share which the plaintiff could elect to take. The knowledge of the condition of the estate, necessary to enable the plaintiff to have a clear perception of the election that her interest requires, cannot be obtained until the court determines whether or not the will is valid. Hence until that adjudication the plaintiff cannot be put to her election.

The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to dismiss the cause of action for dower, because, if the action for dower be dismissed, the statute of limitations might bar the claim of dower before the litigation as to the will should end. The plaintiff is entitled to maintain her cause of action to set aside the will and for dower at the same time, but the cause of action for dower cannot be tried until the action to set aside the will is decided. After that decision the plaintiff must elect whether she will claim a distributive share of the estate of Frank Williams, or prosecute her action for dower.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

THOMAS v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

CARRIERS (§ 52*)—SHIPMENT OF GOODS—BILL OF LADING—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The recitals in a bill of lading, issued by a carrier on the actual receipt of goods, that a specified number of packages were delivered for carriage are conclusive on the carrier, as between it and the consignee or transferee of the bill of lading, who has incurred loss or liability in reliance on the correctness of such recitals.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 152-157; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by Frank E. Thomas against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. A. Willcox and Mark Reynolds, for appellant. L. D. Jennings, for respondent.

JONES, J. In this case the circuit court affirmed the judgment of a magistrate court awarding to plaintiff $27, the value of 1 ton of cotton seed meal alleged to have been lost out of a shipment of 30 tons of cotton seed meal over defendant's line, the judgment also including $50 penalty, under an act of February, 1903, for not adjusting and paying the claim within the time required by law. On January 10, 1907, at Columbia, S. C., the defendant issued to the South Carolina Cotton Oil Company its bill of lading, reciting that it had received from the South Carolina Cotton Oil Company 600 sacks of meal in apparent good order, to be delivered in like good order to plaintiff, at Wedgefield, S. C. The defendant received the car containing the shipment from the shipper at Columbia under the shipper's seal, and without counting the sacks. The car reached Wedgefield on January 12, 1907, and on Monday, the 14th, was turned over to the plaintiff, after the defendant's agent at Wedgefield had broken the seal and delivered 10 sacks to one whom he believed was authorized to receive it by the consignee. The consignee testified that he had not authorized the delivery to such person. When the consignee took charge of the car, according to the evidence submitted in his behalf, there were only 569 sacks of cotton seed meal therein, which, with the 10 sacks delivered by defendant's agent, made 579 sacks, or 21 sacks less than the amount called for in the bill of lading. Plaintiff filed a claim with defendant for 20 sacks shortage, amounting to $27, and, defendant failing to pay within 40 days, plaintiff brought suit for recovery of that sum and the penalty.

The magistrate charged the jury that, "as between the common carrier and the shipper, the bill of lading is not conclusive as to the quantity of goods received, and parol testimony may be introduced to show that a less quantity has been received, but it cannot prevent the party who is to receive the goods from recovering what he loses from the common carrier," and declined to charge that the bill of lading was merely prima facie evidence as to the quantity of goods received; the issue being between the consignee for value and the carrier. When the jury came back for further instructions, the magistrate, in answer to an inquiry from the jury, instructed them: "If the plaintiff, Thomas, proves that he lost the meal, then I charge you that the railroad company is responsible for the loss." In view of the frank admission of counsel and the circumstances this last language of the magistrate is to be construed as meaning only to make the defendant responsible for the shortage between the quantity named in the bill of lading and the quantity delivered to the consignee.

The real question raised by the exceptions is whether a bill of lading, issued by a carrier to the shipper, and transferred to the consignee for value, is as between the consignee and the carrier conclusive evidence as to the receipt by the carrier of the quantity of goods therein mentioned, or is it only prima facie evidence thereof? A bill of lading is regarded as having a twofold character—as a receipt for goods delivered, and as a contract for their shipment. In so far as it may be treated as a mere receipt it is generally held that as between the original parties it is not conclusive, but is only prima facie evidence of the truth of its recitals, and may be varied or contradicted by parol. Whether as between the carrier and the consignee or transferee, not original parties thereto, the recital as to the receipt of goods is conclusive is a matter of considerable controversy. There is much authority in other jurisdictions for the view that, when no goods have in fact been delivered for shipment, a bill of lading issued by the carrier's station agent is not conclusive evidence of the receipt of the goods, even in the hands of a bona fide consignee or purchaser for value, whether the bill of lading was issued by mistake or collusively with the shipper. Such seems to be the law in England (Grant v. Norway, 70 E. O. L. 665), and is the rule of the Supreme Court of the United States (Pollard v. Vinton, 105 U. S. 7, 26 L. Ed. 998; Friedlander

v. Texas, etc., R. R. Co., 130 U. S. 416, 9 Sup. Ct. 570, 32 L. Ed. 991). This doctrine is adopted in several states. Fellows v. Steamer Powell, 16 La. Ann. 316, 79 Am. Dec. 581; B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Wilkens, 44 Md. 11, 22 Am. Rep. 26; Williams, Black & Co. v. Wilmington, etc., R. R. Co., 93 N. C. 42, 58 Am. Rep. 450; National Bank of Commerce v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 44 Minn. 224, 48 N. W. 342, 560, 9 L. R. A. 263, 20 Am. St. Rep. 566. The reasons for this view rest mainly on the ground that it is not within the real or apparent authority of the carrier's agent to issue a bill of lading for goods not received, and that, a bill of lading not being itself negotiable, the holder can take no better right nor higher equity thereunder than the consignor or shipper.

The contrary view is taken in other states with strong show of reason. Bank of Batavia v. New York, etc., R. R. Co., 106 N. Y. 195, 12 N. E. 433, 60 Am. Rep. 440; Sioux City & Pacific R. R. Co. v. First National Bank of Fremont, 10 Neb. 556, 7 N. W. 311, 35 Am. Rep. 488; Brooke v. New York, etc., R. R. Co., 108 Pa. 529, 1 Atl. 206, 56 Am. Rep. 235, reported in note to 53 Am. Rep. 453; American National Bank v. Georgia R. R. Co., 96 Ga. 665, 23 S. E. 893, 51 Am. St. Rep. 155. The reasons for this view are mainly that the question is not one of negotiability of the instrument, but one of estoppel in pais; that the carrier has clothed the agent with apparent authority to issue a bill of lading; that, the agent having done so with full knowledge or full opportunity to know what, if any, goods are tendered for shipment, the principal should be estopped to deny the truth of the recitals as to goods covered thereby; that it is better to cast the loss upon the carrier whose agent made the false representation than upon an innocent holder of the bill of lading who relied upon the representation; that while not strictly negotiable, a bill of lading is quasi negotiable, symbolizing the property described therein, and that title thereto passes by its transfer or delivery; and that it is in the highest degree important to the large commerce known by the carrier to be built upon the transfer of bills of lading that there should be confidence in their recitals.

Whatever may be the true view as to the effect of a bill of lading when no goods were delivered to the carrier, we think that in a case like this, when goods were delivered, and the question is one merely of shortage in the number of packages in an admitted shipment, the representation of the defendant's bill of lading that a specific number of packages was received without any qualification is conclusive upon the carrier, as between the carrier and the consignee or transferee of the bill of lading who has incurred loss or liability in reliance upon the correctness of the representation. It cannot be said that the issuance of the bill of lading was not within the scope of the authority of defendant's agent. In was the duty of defendant's agent to check the number of separate packages received for shipment; and, if the agent chose to accept the shipper's count as his own, the loss should fall upon the carrier who gave the agent authority to issue the bill of lading rather than upon the innocent consignee or transferee who relied upon the recitals therein. Note to Chandler v. Sprague, 38 Am. Dec. 414. This latter view is supported by our own cases. In Benjamin v. Sinclair, 1 Bailey, 174, the court held, in an action by the master of a vessel against a consignee for freight, that the recital in a bill of lading that the goods were shipped "in good order and well conditioned" could not be contradicted by testimony showing that externally the goods were not in good order; there being no evidence of fraud or imposition. The representation as to the external condition of the goods shipped is not in principle different from a representation as to the number of packages shipped. In Sanford v. Railway, 79 S. C. 523, 61 S. E. 74, a case involving a claim for statutory penalty of $5 per day for delay in shipment, the court held that, when a carrier issues a bill of lading for a car of freight, it cannot be heard to say that it did not have possession of the car at the time of issuing the bill of lading, although it alleged that the car was not received by it until about 20 days after the date of the bill of lading.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

GRIFFITH et al. v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 447*)—KILLING STOCK—LIABILITY.

In an action against a railroad company for killing stock on the track during a dense fog, an instruction that the jury must decide what was due care in running a train under the conditions, including the presence of a dense fog, emphasized the necessity of caution in running trains in dense fog, and was not prejudicial to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1642; Dec. Dig. § 447.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 406*)—KILLING STOCK—LIABILITY.

Where the stock law is in force, a railroad is not required to use the same care and caution as in localities where such law is not in force.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1400, 1401; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 441*)—KILLING STOCK—ACCIDENTS—PRESUMPTIONS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

That a railroad company killed stock on the track raises a presumption of negligence against the company, and where it, denying negligence and assuming the burden of proving due care, offers evidence overcoming the burden placed on it by the presumption, the jury cannot rest their verdict on the presumption alone, but must rest their verdict on the preponderance of the entire evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1575; Dec. Dig. § 441.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Charleston County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by John W. Griffith and another, copartners, under the firm name of "J. W. Griffith & Bro.," against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

St. Julien Grimke and Legare, Holman & Baker, for appellants. T. M. Mordecai, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The plaintiffs, who were contractors engaged in the construction of the Charleston & Summerville Railroad, used in their work 34 mules, which at night were kept in one inclosure. On the night of April 24, 1906, the mules broke one of the bars of the inclosure, and 4 of them strayed on defendant's railroad track, where they were killed between 5 and 6 o'clock in the morning by a passenger train. This action was brought to recover damages for the loss. The defenses set up were: First, that defendant's agents in charge of the train exercised due care in the running of it, but a dense fog made it impossible for them to see the mules, and that the accident was unavoidable on their part; and, second, that the loss of the mules was the result of plaintiffs' contributory negligence in keeping the mules in a small and insecure inclosure. On the trial of the issues thus made, the jury found a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiffs appeal, assigning several errors in the charge to the jury.

There is no foundation for the exception alleging error on the part of the circuit judge in assuming that the train was running in a fog. The charge on this subject went no further than a statement that the General Assembly had not laid down by statute a rule as to any rate of speed or other precautions that a railroad company should take to avoid accidents while in a fog, and that the jury must decide what would be due care in running a train under all the conditions, such as the presence of darkness or fog. The charge on this subject was rather favorable to the plaintiff than otherwise, for it emphasized the necessity of caution by the defendant of running in darkness or fog.

The second exception alleges error in the instruction: "That where the stock law is in force the defendant is not required to use the same care and caution as in localities where such law is not in force." The law which requires the fencing of live stock was in force at the place where the mules were killed. In Harley v. Eutawville R. R. Co., 81 S. C. 151, 9 S. E. 782, where the same conditions existed, the court held the defendant was entitled to have an instruction in the precise words here used by the circuit judge. The case is reaffirmed, rather than overruled, by the subsequent case of Davis v. F. C. & P. R. R. Co., 47 S. C. 390, 25 S. E. 224.

The last two exceptions complain of the following instruction: "The jury is instructed that, notwithstanding the presumption of negligence which arises from the fact that the stock has been killed by the railroad company, where all the facts are in evidence, including the fact that the stock law was in force at the place in question, they must find a verdict from the preponderance of the evidence as a whole, and cannot find a verdict against the defendant simply because of the presumption of negligence." The defendant contends that by this instruction the jury were misled as to which party had the burden of proof, and might have inferred from it that the burden of proof rested on the plaintiffs. In opening this charge the circuit judge had said: "Now the law is, as you have heard stated here, that when a man proves that he owns live stock, and that it was killed upon the track of a railroad company, the law raises the presumption of negligence as against the railroad company, and says that, nothing further appearing than that, and there is no showing to the contrary, no explanation on the part of the railroad company, then the man is entitled to recovery, but the law goes on and says that where the railroad company comes in and denies that there was any negligence on its part and explains the killing and overcomes the burden of negligence thrown upon it, explains it satisfactorily to the jury that the killing was unavoidable, and was caused through no negligence on their part, then the presumption is removed, and the party cannot recover because, as you see, his right to recovery is based upon the negligence of the railroad company, and if it is shown that there has been no negligence on the part of the railroad company, he cannot recover." When these instructions are considered together, the meaning seems obvious that the fact of killing live stock on the track raises a presumption of negligence against a railroad company; but when the railroad company, denying negligence, and assuming the burden of proving due care, offers evidence which tends to overcome the burden placed on it by the presumption of negligence, then the jury cannot rest their verdict on the presumption alone, but must consider not only the presumption, but all the evidence on the subject, and rest their verdict on the preponderance of the entire evidence. This was nothing more than an instruction that the presumption from the fact of killing live stock by a railroad train is not controlling and conclusive against the railroad company, where it offers evidence tending to overcome the presumption. That this is a correct statement of the law will not be doubted, and we think the jury could not have understood the charge to mean anything else.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

HASTEN et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 92*)—PROCEDURE IN CIVIL CASES—PLEADING—TIME FOR FILING ANSWER.

In an action in a magistrate's court to recover $3 and interest and a penalty of $50, the only paper served on defendant was one signed by the magistrate and issued "to any lawful constable," stating plaintiffs' cause of action generally and requiring the constable to summon the defendant to appear at the magistrate's office on a date specified. Defendant appeared on the return day and moved that the complaint be made more specific, which motion was overruled on the ground that only a summons had been served on defendant and that the complaint was not filed. Immediately thereafter plaintiffs' counsel filed a complaint, and defendant announced itself ready for trial under the original complaint, but that, if plaintiffs demanded trial under the new complaint, defendant asked for the statutory period of 20 days before going to trial, which motion was overruled. Held, that the magistrate, having decided that the original paper was not a complaint and overruled defendant's motion to make it more definite, should have granted defendant 20 days before going to trial after filing the complaint, under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 88, subd. 16, providing that "when 25 or more dollars is demanded the complaint shall be served on the defendant not less than 20 days."

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 79*)—PROCEDURE IN CIVIL CASES—NECESSITY OF SUMMONS.

There is nowhere in the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 an express requirement for a summons in a civil action in a magistrate's court, except in section 71, which refers exclusively to actions of claim and delivery; section 148, requiring civil actions in courts of record to be commenced by service of a summons, not applying to actions in a magistrate's court, as it is not a court of record.

Lewis & Hollis, for appellants. Spencers & Dunlap, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The above title is the same in 15 different suits instituted in a magistrate's court for the recovery of damages for furniture lost and injured in the course of transportation and a statutory penalty of $50. The plaintiff recovered judgments in the magistrate's court on each of the claims, aggregating in all $75.15, and for the statutory penalty in each case, aggregating in all $750. On appeal the circuit court set aside the judgments of the magistrate and ordered new trials. The legal questions in all the cases are the same, and one case will be discussed as decisive of all.

In the case to be considered, the action was commenced by the service on March 6, 1908, of a paper of which the following is a copy: "By T. C. Beckham, Esquire, Magistrate—To Any Lawful Constable: Complaint having been made to me by J. W. Hasten and J. O. Hallams, partners in trade doing business at Rock Hill, S. C., under the firm name of Hasten Furniture Company, against Southern Railway Company, a common carrier of freight and passengers in and through the county of York, and a corporation duly created by law for said purpose, that the said defendant is indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of $3.00, with interest from October 24, 1907, besides the sum of $50 penalty arising out of the following facts, to wit: That the defendant negligently broke and damaged and lost part of a certain lot of furniture while in transit from Nashville, Tenn., to Rock Hill, S. C., to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $3.00. That said plaintiffs duly filed a claim for said amount with the agent of defendant at destination on October 24, 1907. That said defendant has failed and neglected to adjust and pay said loss and damage to this date—you are therefore required to summon the said defendant to be and appear before me at my office at Rock Hill, S. C., at twelve o'clock m. on the 31st day of March, 1908, to answer said complaint, or judgment will be given against said defendant by default. Witness my hand and seal this March 5, A. D. 1908. T. C. Beckham, Magistrate. [Seal.]" When the case was called for trial on the return day, March 31, 1908, defendant's counsel moved before the magistrate "that the complaint as served on the defendant on the 6th of March, 1908, be made more definite and certain, in that it alleges 'that the defendant company negligently broke and damaged and lost part of a certain lot of furniture,' etc., and ask that the court require the plaintiffs to allege the articles broken, damaged, and lost." The motion was refused without consideration of its merits; the magistrate giving his reason in these words: "It appearing to the court that only a summons has been served on the defendant, and that the complaint is not yet filed, defendant's motion is premature and is overruled." As soon as the motion was refused, plaintiffs' counsel filed with the magistrate a complaint, setting out in detail the delivery at Nashville, Tenn., to the defendant railroad company of a lot of heaters to be carried to the plaintiffs at Rock Hill, S. C., the breaking off of the legs of two of the heaters in transit, to the damage of the plaintiffs, $3, the filing of the claim with the defendant's agent at Rock Hill, and the refusal of the defendant to pay and adjust the claim within 90 days, and the liability of the defendant for the statutory penalty of $50. The record contains this statement of the proceedings which followed: "Thereupon the defendant, through counsel, made the following statement and motion in each of the 15 cases: Defendant appears and is ready for trial under complaint of March 6, 1908, but if plaintiffs demand trial under new complaint we ask the statutory period of 20 days under section 88, subd. 16, Code Civ. Proc. 1902. This motion was denied by the magistrate for the following reasons: The magistrate holds that only a summons has been served on defendant, and their complaint (plaintiffs') is now reduced to writing on day of trial. The motion is therefore overruled. Counsel for defendant, having stated that they appeared for the purpose of making the foregoing motions, and for no other purpose, then withdrew from the hearing of the cases, which proceeded to trial upon the complaints hereinbefore referred to and then filed for the first time, and resulted in judgment being rendered for the plaintiffs in all 15 cases for the amounts asked for, with interest and costs."

The concrete question presented by the exceptions is whether the defendant was entitled as a matter of right to 20 days within which to answer the complaint filed on March 31, 1908. The magistrate distinctly held that the paper served on March 6, 1908, was not a complaint, but merely a summons, and on that ground refused to require the plaintiff to make it more definite and certain as a complaint. This holding of the magistrate was binding on all parties to the cause until reversed by an appellate tribunal. The defendant could not justly be held bound by the adjudication that the first paper was only a summons and not a complaint, and have his motion to make it more definite and certain refused on that ground without consideration of its merits; and at the same time be required to answer it within 20 days of its service, as if it were a complaint. Under the holding of the magistrate, the only complaint before the court was a paper filed on March 31, 1908. Subdivision 16 of section 88 of Code of Civil Procedure provides: "When twenty-five or more dollars is demanded the complaint shall be served on the defendant not less than twenty days." It follows that the defendant was entitled to the 20 days from March 31, 1908, demanded by its counsel, within which to answer the complaint filed on that day.

The error of the magistrate was no doubt due to the obscurity of title 5, part 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to courts of magistrates with respect to the summons and complaint in these courts. While there is an implication in subdivision 8 of section 88 and in section 156 of Code of Procedure that all actions must be commenced in a magistrate's court by the issuance of a summons, yet there is nowhere in the Code of Procedure an express requirement for a summons, except in section 71, which refers exclusively to actions of claim and delivery; and the distinctions between a summons and a complaint in a magistrate's court is not well marked. It is true that section 148, tit. 5, pt. 2, of the Code of Procedure requires that civil actions in the courts of record of this state shall be commenced by service of a summons; but the provision is limited to courts of record, and the magistrate court has been held not to be a court of record. State v. Weeks, 14 S. C. 400.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

JONES et al. v. McCREARY LAND & INVESTMENT CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 14, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 869*)—CAUSES OF ACTION—ELECTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 186a, providing that a plaintiff shall not be required to state separately two or more wrongs relied on, or to elect on which he will proceed, but he shall be entitled to submit his whole case to the jury, a complaint, in an action by a tenant against his landlord for unlawful distress for rent, because no rent was due, and because the distress was excessive, shows a single act, giving rise to different elements of damages, and it is error to require him to elect on which cause he will proceed.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 274*)—WRONGFUL DISTRESS FOR RENT—DAMAGES—"ALL DAMAGES."

Civ. Code 1902, § 2434, providing that a landlord making excessive distress shall be liable for "all damages" sustained by the tenant, authorizes the recovery of punitive and compensatory damages for an excessive distress.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court, of Richland County.

Action by Clara Jones and husband against the McCreary Land & Investment Company and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

P. A. McMaster and D. W. Robinson, for appellants. Melton & Belser, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for damages. The allegations of the complaint material to the questions involved are as follows: "That heretofore, on the 2d day of July, A. D. 1904, plaintiff Clara Jones rented from defendant a dwelling house situated in the city of Columbia, for which she agreed to pay as rental therefor $7 per month, or $3.50 every two weeks. That subsequent thereto said plaintiff Clara Jones paid the said rental regularly, according to her contract, to defendant McCreary Land & Investment Company, the principal owner of said company, sometimes paying the same to defendant G. T. Pressley, and sometimes to other employees of McCreary Land & Investment Company. That on the 20th day of March, 1906, the defendants herein unlawfully, willfully, wantonly, and in reckless disregard of the rights of plaintiff Clara Jones issued a distress warrant against all her goods and chattels, for the purpose of collecting the sum of $1.75, which was illegally and wrongfully claimed to be due as rent in arrears for said dwelling house on March 17, 1906, and unlawfully, wrongfully, wantonly, and in reckless disregard of the plaintiff's rights caused the said distress warrant to be levied upon the following goods and chattels of the plaintiff Clara Jones, to wit, 2 rugs, 1 square, 1 trunk, 1 washstand and contents, 1 dresser and contents, 1 bedstead, 3 rocking chairs, 6 straight chairs, 1 bowl and pitcher, 1 table, 1 lamp, 1 clock, 2 pairs of pillows, 2 mattresses, 1 counterpane, 1 pair of rubber boots. That all of said property mentioned in paragraph 5 above was taken under said distress warrant by one J. A. H. Geiger, acting for the defendants, from the possession of Clara Jones on the 20th day of March, and was detained under said distress proceedings until March 21, 1906, at which time the said goods were replevied by plaintiff Clara Jones at a cost to her of $6.75 for rent in arrears, distress, and storage charges. That there was nothing in fact due by said plaintiff for rent at the time said distress and levy was made. That the said distress so made by defendants was unreasonable and grossly excessive, in that the goods so distrained were reasonably worth $78. That at the time said distress was made by the defendants as above mentioned it was a cold, rough day, and said goods were taken in the evening of March 20th, and plaintiffs were compelled to go to another house to obtain lodging during the night of the 20th and 21st in order to obtain a place to sleep, and were put to great inconvenience and annoyance and considerable expense, as shown above, by the unlawful, wrongful, willful, and wanton acts and disregard of their obligations on the part of the defendants."

His honor, the presiding judge, made the following order: "On the call of this cause on the calendar for trial defendants' attorneys moved before me to require the plaintiffs to elect upon which of the causes of action mingled in the complaint they would rely; that is to say, whether upon (1) the alleged cause of action for trespass based upon no rent being due, or upon (2) the alleged causes of action for an excessive distress. Being of the opinion that two causes of action as above stated were alleged and mingled together in the complaint, and that the said causes of action were inconsistent and could not stand together, I so held, and accordingly required the plaintiffs to elect. Thereupon the plaintiffs elected to rely upon the alleged cause of action for excessive distress. It is therefore ordered that the above-stated action stand upon the docket of this court for trial upon the cause of action for excessive distress alleged in the complaint therein." This is made the first ground of the exceptions. Section 186a of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902 is as follows: "In all actions ex delicto in which vindictive, punitive or exemplary damages are named in the complaint, it shall be proper for the party to recover his actual damages sustained, and no party shall be required to make any separate statement in the complaint in such action, nor shall any party be required to elect whether he will go to trial for actual or other damages, but shall be entitled to submit his whole case to the jury under the instructions of the court. In all cases where two or more acts of negligence or other wrongs are set forth in the complaint as causing or contributing to injuries for which suit is brought, the party plaintiff in such suit shall not be required to state such several acts separately, nor shall such party be required to elect upon which he will proceed to trial, but shall be entitled to submit his whole case to the jury under the instructions of the court and to recover such damages as he has sustained, whether such damages arose from one or another or all of such acts or wrongs alleged in the complaint." The allegations of the complaint show that a single act gave rise to the different elements of damages, and that the case comes within the provisions of the section of the Code just mentioned. His honor, the presiding judge, therefore, erred in requiring the plaintiff to elect upon which cause of action he would proceed.

The next question that will be considered is whether punitive damages can be recovered for an excessive distress for rent. Section 2434 of the Civil Code of 1902 is as follows: "Every distress for rent shall be reasonable and not too great, and any lessor or landlord who makes unreasonable and excessive distress shall be liable for all damages sustained by the tenant whose goods are distrained by reason of such excessive distress. Such damages may be recovered by action in any court of competent jurisdiction." The word "all" preceding the word "damages" is comprehensive enough to include punitive, as well as compensatory, damages.

The last question made by the appellants is that punitive damages cannot be recovered in an action for the detention of personal property. This, however, is not an action for the detention of personal property.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

FARRELL v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 13, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DELAY IN TRANSPORTATION—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

In an action against a carrier for the statutory penalty for delay in the transportation of goods, plaintiff alleged that he had consigned to him from a specified city in the state certain goods designated on the bill of lading, and that notice was given the carrier that prompt shipment was desired to his place of business in H., within the state aforesaid, "that about three weeks elapsed after the shipment before the goods aforesaid were located by the plaintiff, when it was discovered that the said goods had been negligently taken by the defendant to Holly Hill, Berkeley county, S. C., another station on defendant's said line of railroad, and in violation of the provisions of an act of the South Carolina Legislature of 1904 (24 St. at Large, at page 671), and allowed the said goods to remain at the said station for the time and period aforesaid, wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant company for the sum of $90 penalty as provided for in the act of the Legislature of South Carolina of 1904, at page 671, and for the costs of this action." Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 88, provides that pleadings in a magistrate court need not be in any particular form, but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. Held, that the complaint sufficiently shows that plaintiff is suing for the per diem penalty for delay in the transportation of freight as provided in 24 St. at Large, p. 671.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 190*)—APPEAL—REVERSAL—NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In an action against a carrier commenced before a magistrate for the penalty authorized by 24 St. at Large, p. 671, for delay in transportation of freight, it is within the discretion of the circuit court on appeal to grant a new trial, where, in view of the whole testimony, the court is uncertain whether the case-made falls within the statute rather than render judgment for defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 730, 734; Dec. Dig. § 190.*]

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 241*)—EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS—OPERATION OF RAILROADS—PENALTY FOR DELAY.

24 St. at Large, p. 671, authorizing the collection of a penalty from a railroad company for delay in the transportation of goods, does not violate the equality clause of the federal Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 700; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

4. COMMERCE (§ 13*)—POWER TO REGULATE—STATE COMMERCE.

The question whether 24 St. at Large, p. 671, authorizing the collection of a penalty for the delay by a carrier in the transportation of freight between two points within the state, violates the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution, does not arise in an action to recover the penalty for delay in the transportation of goods between two points within the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Commerce, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

5. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 190*)—APPEAL—REVERSAL—ORDER SUBSTITUTING PARTIES.

It is not error in the circuit court in ordering a new trial in an action appealed from a magistrate's court to refuse to require the substitution of the trustee in bankruptcy of plaintiff for plaintiff in the action, where the circuit court held that, on the new trial, the trustees in bankruptcy should move the magistrate to be joined or substituted as plaintiff, and that the action should be continued by the trustee on behalf of the creditors of the bankrupt.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dorchester County; R. W. Memminger, Judge.

Action by C. L. Farrell against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Legare Walker, for appellant. E. J. Dennis, for respondent.

JONES, J. In this action a magistrate court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendant for $90 as penalty for delay in the transportation of freight under the act of March 25, 1904 (24 St. at Large, pp. 671, 672). On the appeal of defendant the circuit court, Judge Memminger, reversed the judgment of the magistrate, and remanded the case for a new trial. The defendant now appeals to this court upon numerous exceptions to the rulings of the circuit court and his failure to dismiss the action.

1. It is contended that the demurrer to the complaint for insufficiency should have been sustained. The complaint, after stating that defendant is a corporation under the laws of Virginia and is a common carrier owning and operating the railroad known as the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad, having its line and agents in Dorchester county, further alleged:

"Third. That on or about the 6th day of March, 1907, the plaintiff purchased and had consigned to him from the city of Charleston, in the county of Charleston, and the state aforesaid, 110 sacks of kainit, as designated upon the bill of lading, etc., the words 'Prompt shipment required' also appearing upon the said bill of lading, notice having been given that prompt shipment was desired and required to his place of business in the town of Harleyville, county of Dorchester and state aforesaid.

"Fourth. That about three weeks elapsed after the shipment before the said goods as aforesaid were located by the plaintiff, at which time it was discovered that the said goods had been negligently and carelessly taken by the defendant, its agents and servants, to Holly Hill, Berkeley county, S. C., another station on defendant's said line of railroad, and in utter disregard of the rights, etc., of the plaintiff, and in violation of the provisions of the Acts of the South Carolina Legislature of 1904, at page 671, and allowed the said goods to remain at the said station for the time and period aforesaid.

"Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant company for the sum of ninety ($90) dollars penalty as provided for in the Acts of the Legislature of South Carolina of 1904, at page 671, and for the costs of this action."

It is charged that the complaint did not state a cause of action for failure to allege (a) that the shipment ever reached its destination and the date of its arrival; (b) the distance from the shipping point to destination; (c) the value of the shipment.

With respect to pleadings in a magistrate court, it is expressly provided in section 88, Code Proc. 1902, that "pleadings are not required to be in any particular form, but must be such as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." The complaint measures up to this requirement, as it plainly shows that plaintiff is suing for the per diem penalty for delay in the transportation of freight as provided in the act of March 25, 1904. Riggs v. Wilson, 30 S. C. 175, 8 S. E. 848.

2. Appellant contends under several exceptions that the circuit court should have sustained its exceptions to the refusal of the magistrate to grant a nonsuit and should have rendered judgment of dismissal in favor of defendant because there was a total lack of testimony to show a delay in transportation penalized by the statute, but that, on the contrary, plaintiff's own testimony showed a failure to deliver freight, or a lost shipment, not within the meaning of the statute, as declared in Macon v. Southern Railway, 81 S. C. 167, 62 S. E. 6, which held that the act (24 St. at Large, p. 671) does not apply to loss of freight. In reference to this matter, Judge Memminger held as follows: "Upon those grounds of the appeal which raise the question that the act under which the penalty was sought and recovered applies only to delayed shipments, and not to shipments which were never delivered at all, being inclined to the opinion that those grounds are well taken, but being unwilling to decide so important a question, except upon a clear state of facts found as to whether or not the shipment in this case was only delayed or never received at all; and, the evidence here being somewhat doubtful on the point, I prefer sending the case back to the magistrate, in order that the testimony may be more definite and complete in that particular. So far as the testimony is reported here, the weight of it is that the shipment has never been delivered; but plaintiff's attorney insisted at the hearing that, as a matter of fact, it was delivered and received by the plaintiff after it was located at Holly Hill, but more than 18 days after it should have arrived at Harleyville, the true point of destination, and plaintiff does say at one place in his testimony that he was 'kept out' of the shipment for 18 days, implying that he received it after that time, and it seems probable that he would have received it after it was located. This would make a typical case of delay under the statute; but, if it be true, as the weight of the testimony, as reported, shows, that he never has received the shipment, it would be a case of lost shipment, and defendant's position as to the construction of the statute applying only to delayed, and not to lost, shipments, if sustained, would prevail. As before stated, I would be inclined to sustain defendant's position hereupon, but do not wish to have the cause go off on this point and sustain the appeal and reverse the magistrate's judgment on this ground, when it may be a fact that plaintiff did get the shipment and the case is not one where this question of the construction of the statute could obtain. It is this sort of thing which brings the administration of the law into disrepute; and as the matter is susceptible of definite ascertainment, I shall direct a new trial, and not render final judgment either way."

While the argument of appellant's counsel is very forceful on this point, we think it was within the discretion of Judge Memminger to grant a new trial instead of rendering final judgment for defendant, if he, in view of the whole testimony, was uncertain whether or not the case-made fell within the statute. To the extent that the court reversed the judgment of the magistrate the action was in favor of appellant and the granting of a new trial need not work injustice, as plaintiff will have to make out a case within the statutes before he can recover.

8. The penalty statute (24 St. at Large, p. 671) does not violate the equality clause of the federal Constitution. Sanford v. Seaboard Air Line Railway, 79 S. C. 519, 61 S. E. 74; McCutcheon v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., 81 S. C. 71, 61 S. E. 1108. Whether it violates the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution does not properly arise as the shipment in question was not interstate. McCutcheon v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co., supra.

4. Error is assigned because the circuit court did not require the substitution of the trustee in bankruptcy of plaintiff alleged to have been adjudged a bankrupt after the rendition of the judgment by the magistrate. Judge Memminger held that, upon the new trial to be had herein, the trustees in bankruptcy should move the magistrate to be joined or substituted as plaintiff, and that the action should be continued by the said trustee on behalf of the creditors of said bankrupt. We see in this no ground for reversal. The foregoing views practically dispose of all the exceptions not withdrawn.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

MAHONEY v. SOUTHERN RY., CAROLINA DIVISION.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 46*)—CONTINUITY OF POSSESSION OF LANDLORD.

A landlord's possession is not interrupted by his tenant's quitting the premises, if the landlord takes possession within a reasonable time, or puts in another tenant as soon as one can be procured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 243; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—EXTENT OF POSSESSION—INSTRUCTIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. 1902, § 102, provides that whenever the occupant enters into possession of premises under claim of title, founded upon a written instrument or decree, and there has been a continued occupation of the premises or some part thereof for 10 years, the premises so included are held adversely, except that where the premises consist of a tract divided into lots the possession of one lot shall not be possession of any other lot. Section 103 provides that, to constitute adverse possession under a written instrument or decree, land shall be considered as possessed and occupied where, though not inclosed, it has been used to supply fuel or fencing timber, for husbandry or the ordinary use of the occupant, or where a known farm or a single lot has been partly improved, the portion unimproved, according to the custom of the locality, shall be considered as occupied for the same time as the part improved. Held, that possession of any part under a written instrument or decree will be possession of the whole, so that a request to modify an instruction, in an action for damages for appropriating plaintiff's land, that "in making out a title by adverse possession there must be continuity in point of locality, for possession of a part of a tract of land cannot be joined to possession of another part so as to make up the period," by adding thereto that the instruction is true when the claimant holds color of title as well as when he is claiming without color of title, was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 1*)—LIMITATIONS APPLICABLE TO PARTICULAR ACTIONS—RECOVERY OF REAL PROPERTY.

The statute of limitations is a statute of repose, and the provision which relieves one in possession of real property under a deed or judgment of the risk which pertains to the loss of links in the chain of title is intended to give additional security to those who hold under paper title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 307*)—REMEDIES OF OWNER OF PROPERTY—INSTRUCTIONS—SUPPORT IN EVIDENCE.

Act Dec. 19, 1838 (8 St. at Large, p. 484), granted to a railroad company such lots and parts of lots in the town of Columbia as belong to the state and may be required for constructing and keeping up the road, depositories and other buildings and works of the company, not to exceed 12 acres. In an action by a property owner for damages against the railroad to property inclosed by the railroad company, part of which was used for its tracks, defendant requested a charge that, if the jury believed that plaintiff was the owner of the land, then he was entitled to recover the value of the land actually taken and occupied by the tracks and other improvements of the railroad company and such damage as said improvements may have caused to the adjoining land, and that the fact that defendant inclosed all of the land belonging to plaintiff with a fence would not entitle plaintiff to recover for the unoccupied portion of the land inclosed, but only for the damage thereto. The court gave the requested instruction, but modified it by stating that the proposition of law was correct if defendant inclosed the land merely for the purpose of asserting title to it and not for the purpose of appropriating the land inclosed for railroad uses. Held, that in view of defendant's assertion of its right to inclose the land in question under Act Dec. 19, 1838, and the testimony of defendant's counsel that he had advised defendant to inclose the lot, and that it was actually inclosed "for the purpose of asserting positive possession and ownership in the open and vacant lands and was intended and so directed to be, not the taking of property under the right of condemnation but assertion of their title to the land as individual proprietors," the instruction as modified was correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Dec. Dig. § 307.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 370*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—COPY OF ORIGINAL PLAT—AUTHENTICATION.

There is no error in excluding a notation on a blue print copy of an original plat of ground, where there was no evidence of the date of the writing, or by whom it was made, or that it was on the original plat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 370.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Richland County; Geo. E. Prince, Judge.

Action by James Mahoney against the Southern Railway, Carolina Division. Judgment for plaintiff, and a new trial was denied provided plaintiff remitted a part of the recovery, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Abney & Muller, for appellant. Nelson & Nelson and Melton & Belser, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This appeal involves the right of the plaintiff to hold a judgment recovered on a complaint claiming damages for the "taking, appropriation, and injury" by the defendant of a portion of a block of land in the city of Columbia, bounded by Wheat, Assembly, Rice, and Gates streets, claimed by the plaintiff to be his property. The defendant being in possession, the plaintiff relied on adverse possession under color of title, explaining his failure to trace his title back to the state or to a common source by proving the destruction of all the records of Richland county by fire in 1865 at the burning of Columbia by Sherman's army. He proved color of title by introducing a deed of conveyance to himself from the sheriff of Richland county, dated December 14, 1871, made to him as the highest bidder at a judicial sale ordered by the court of common pleas for the partition of the lands of Gabriel R. Starling. The main issue as to plaintiff's title was on his claim of continuous adverse possession of the land in dispute for a full period of 10 years after his purchase in December, 1871, and before the defendant's adverse entry in 1896 or 1900. The entire block covered an area of four acres. At the time of plaintiff's purchase in 1871, there were already two railroad tracks running across the block, to which were attached rights of way. The right of the defendant to these tracks and rights of way was conceded by the plaintiff. The claim is for the damages resulting from the taking of all the remainder of the block, or at least of portions of the remainder. There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff rented part of the block to successive tenants for cultivation or pasturage every year for 10 consecutive years, after November 25, 1873, when the statutory period was changed from 20 to 10 years.

The defendant, contending that the possession must be regarded broken by the interval of time between the departure of the tenant cultivating for one year and the entry of the tenant for the next year, excepts to this instruction of the circuit court: "I charge you that where the adverse occupant of land leaves it temporarily, with the intention of returning, his possession continues during such occasional absence, and so if the tenant quits the premises the landlord is to be regarded as still in possession if by taking possession himself, or putting in another tenant as soon as one can be procured, within a reasonable time, he gives evidence that he does not intend to abandon the land. An interval of two or three months, or from the harvesting of cultivated crops in the fall to the resumption of cultivation in the spring, does not of itself amount to abandonment or a break in the continuity of possession." Discussion of the numerous authorities cited in the arguments from other jurisdictions is unnecessary, as the point has been expressly decided in this state. Chancellor Johnston, in Wilson v. McLenaghan, McMul. Eq. 35, thus states the principle: "Where the occupant of land leaves it for a time, animo revertendi, his possession continues during such occasional absence; and so, I apprehend, if a tenant quits the premises, the landlord is to be regarded as still in possession, if by taking possession within a reasonable time, or putting in another tenant as soon as one can be procured, he gives evidence that he does not intend to abandon the land. Here the tenant went out when the crop was gathered, and the landlord went in at that season of the year when planting operations usually begin. Possession is matter of fact, and therefore of evidence; and here was no greater evidence of abandoning possession than would exist where a planter withdraws his hands from one plantation to another, during the winter, and returns them in the spring—a thing that often occurs, without the slightest suspicion that the possession has been relinquished."

At defendant's request this instruction was given: "In making out a title by adverse possession, there must be continuity in point of locality, for possession of part of a tract of land cannot be joined to possession of another part so as to make up the period." The defendant excepts because the circuit judge refused to charge, as requested, that this proposition is true when the claimant holds color of title, as well as when he is claiming without color of title. The point is difficult, and strong argument has been made on both sides. The respondent's counsel have cited, in favor of the ruling of the circuit judge: Cunningham v. Frandtzen and Others, 26 Tex. 34; Chandler v. Rushing, 38 Tex. 596; Roberson et al. v. Downing Co., 126 Ga. 176, 54 S. E. 1020; Johnson v. Thomas, 23 App. D. C. 141; Ewing v. Burnet, 11 Pet. 53, 9 L. Ed. 624; 1 Cyc. 986; Tyler on Ejectment & Adverse Enjoyment, 911. While against it the appellant's counsel have cited: Hole v. Rittenhouse, 25 Pa. 493; Messer v. Regnitter, 32 Iowa, 312; 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. pp. 834, 835, 865; Sedgwick & Waite on Trial of Title to Land, § 770; Buswell on Limitations & Adverse Possession, § 251; Wood on Limitation of Actions, § 267. They also cite Stanley v. Shoolbred, 25 S. C. 181, but, on examination of the opinion in that case, it will be found that the point was not decided. Perhaps something may be said against the convenience and justice of the rule laid down in the charge, as well as in its favor. Authority and reason, however, are valuable only in so far as they aid in ascertaining the meaning of our statute which purports to cover the subject. When the statute is carefully examined, it seems to decide the question. Section 102 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1902, provides: "Whenever it shall appear that the occupant or those under whom he claims, entered into possession of the premises under claim of title, exclusive of any other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance of the premises in question, or upon the decree or judgment of a competent court, and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the premises included in such instrument, decree or judgment, or of some part of such premises under such claim for ten years, the premises so included shall be deemed to have been held adversely; except that where the premises so included consist of a tract divided into lots, the possession of one lot shall not be deemed a possession of any other lot of the same tract."

Taking this section alone, there is ground to doubt whether the continuous occupation "of some part of the premises" means a certain definite part of the land or any of several parts that the holder may happen to occupy at different times. The meaning of this section, however, seems clearer when read in connection with the following provision incorporated in the Code as section 103, and manifestly intended to explain and define the adverse possession mentioned in section 102: "For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by a person claiming a title founded upon a written instrument or a judgment or decree, land shall be deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases: (1) Where it has been usually cultivated or improved. (2) Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure. (3) Where although not inclosed, it has been used for the supply of fuel or of fencing timber, for the purpose of husbandry or the ordinary use of the occupant. (4) Where a known farm or a single lot has been partly improved, the portion of such farm or lot which may have been left not cleared or not inclosed, according to the usual course and custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved and cultivated."

Taking two sections together, the statute seems to contemplate that land included in a written instrument or a judgment or decree shall be regarded as an entirety—a single thing; and, while there must be continuity of possession of the land, the possession of any part will be in contemplation of law possession of the whole. When the land as a tract has been used for the purposes of husbandry or any of the other purposes mentioned in the statute, though the use be not of the whole land or continuously of any particular part, the use will be regarded an adverse possession of the entire tract covered by the written instrument, judgment, or decree. This seems to be a reasonable interpretation of the words of the statute; but, when consideration is given to its practical application it seems obvious the statute could not have contemplated the result which a different meaning would impart. The statute of limitations is a statute of repose, and that portion of it which makes a distinction between a mere naked possession and possession under a deed or judgment or decree is intended to give additional security to those who hold under paper title by relieving them after 10 years' possession of the hazard of the loss of links in the chain of title. This design of the statute would be unreasonably restricted, if one who enters upon a distinct tract of land under a deed or decree of the court purporting to invest him with a title to that entire tract by metes and bounds should be required to cultivate or otherwise actively use the same portion of the land every year for the full period of ten years, thus losing the benefit of the statute if he should see fit to divide the land, cultivating one half, and leaving the other half fallow in alternate years. We conclude there was no error in the instruction of the circuit judge on this point.

The fifth request to charge was as follows: "If the jury is satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff is the owner of the said square, then he is entitled to recover, but in no event can he recover any more than the value of the land actually taken and actually occupied by the tracks, embankments, and other improvements of the said South Carolina & Georgia Railroad Company and its successors, the Southern Railway, Carolina Division, the defendant, at the time it was so taken, with such damage, if any, as the construction of such improvements may have caused to his adjoining land. And the fact that the defendant, in the assertion of its claim to be the owner of the whole square, inclosed the same, or the unoccupied and vacant portion thereof, with a fence, if they find such fact from the evidence, will not entitle the plaintiff to recover for the whole square, or the unoccupied and vacant portion thereof, even if he has established his title thereto, but only for the part actually taken and occupied by tracks, embankments, and other improvements for railroad purposes and for the damage, if any, to the residue." The circuit judge gave the request to the jury as being a sound legal proposition, if the defendant inclosed the land merely for the purpose of asserting title to it, and not for the purpose of appropriating the land inclosed for railroad uses. The defendant's counsel insist the request should have been given to the jury without modification, contending that there was positive and direct evidence that the defendant inclosed the land merely for the purpose of asserting title, and that there was no evidence of an intention to appropriate it to railroad purposes. It is true there was no declaration of any witness on the subject, except that of Mr. Abney, who testified that, when the contention between the plaintiff and defendant with regard to the land was brought to his attention, he, as counsel for the defendant, advised that the lot be inclosed, and that it was actually inclosed "for the purpose of asserting positive possession and ownership in the open and vacant lands, and was intended and so directed to be, not the taking of property under the right of condemnation, but assertion of their title to the land as individual proprietors." There is, of course, no doubt that Mr. Abney stated correctly his connection with the matter and his view of the purpose of fencing the land; but it is to be observed that the request under discussion was asked as a guide to the jury in case they found the plaintiff had established his title by adverse possession against the defendant; and further, that the defendant in asserting title by the inclosure and otherwise rested its claim on the statute of December 19, 1838 (8 St. at Large, p. 484), granting to the Louisville, Cincinnati & Charleston Railroad Company "such lots and parts of lots in the town of Columbia as belong to the state, and may be required for the purpose of constructing and keeping up the road depositories and other buildings and works" of that company, "provided that * * * the grounds required for the depositories and other works shall not exceed twelve acres." The assertion by the railroad company of its right to inclose and hold the land under this act was an assertion of its intention to use the land under the act "for the purpose of constructing and keeping up the said depositories and other buildings and works," and the evidence offered of this assertion was some evidence that the purpose was not only to assert title to the property, but to inclose the land and appropriate it for railroad purposes. The objection to the charge on this point therefore was not well founded.

Defendant's counsel did not argue the exception alleging error in excluding from the consideration of the jury the words "conceded as belonging to S. S. R. R. by city 1899," written over the representation of the land in dispute on a blue print which the defendant produced as a copy of an original plat made by its own engineer. Manifestly there is no foundation for the exception, for there was no evidence of the date of the writing or by whom it was made, or even that it was on the original plat.

On motion for a new trial, the circuit judge ordered a new trial nisi, providing for a reduction of the verdict from $8,863.32 to $5,680 on the same conditions as were considered by this court in Hall v. N. W. R. R. Co., 81 S. C. 522, 62 S. E. 848. Upon that authority it is adjudged that there shall be a new trial unless the plaintiff shall within 30 days from the filing of the remittitur from this court remit on the record the difference between $8,863.32 and $5,680.

Upon such entry being so made, it is adjudged that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

HOLLIS v. STATE BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1900.)

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS (§ 5*)—REGISTRATION—AUTHORITY OF BOARD.

Under section 9 of "An act to regulate the practice of medicine in South Carolina, to provide for a State Board of Medical Examiners, and to define their duties and powers," approved February 27, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 516), providing that "the board shall be empowered, without examination, to indorse upon receipt of the license fee of five dollars the licenses issued by other state boards having an equal standard," provided that other state boards extend to the licenses of this state the same courtesy, the board is not bound to indorse or recognize licenses from other states, but the matter is left to their discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Physicians and Surgeons, Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Mandamus by Oliver C. Hollis against the State Board of Medical Examiners. Writ refused.

Blease & Dominick, for petitioner.

WOODS, J. The petitioner asks that the court by its writ of mandamus require the State Board of Medical Examiners to issue to him a license to practice medicine. The application rests on the allegations that the petitioner had stood the examinations required by the boards of medical examiners of the states of Georgia and Virginia, and had received from each of those boards a license to practice as a physician; that he presented these licenses to the board of medical examiners of this state, tendering at the same time the statutory fee of $5, and demanded a license to practice medicine in this state, but the license was refused; that at the time of the demand, the board of medical examiners of this state recognized licenses granted by the boards of examiners of the states of Georgia and Virginia under a reciprocal arrangement existing by virtue of the following section of an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice of medicine in South Carolina, to provide for a State Board of Medical Examiners, and to define their duties and powers," approved 27th February, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 512):

"Sec. 9. The board shall be empowered without examination to indorse, upon receipt of the license fee of five dollars, the licenses issued by other state boards having an equal standard: Provided, said other state board accord to the licenses of the South Carolina state board the same courtesy; and said other state board licenses, when indorsed, shall entitle the holder to registry in this state, and to all the rights and privileges thereby granted."

The statute does not require the board of medical examiners of this state to indorse or recognize licenses from other states, but merely empowers them to do so on the conditions mentioned in the statute. The matter was one placed by the statute entirely within the discretion of the board. The case of State ex rel. Mauldin v. Matthews, 81 S. C. 414, 62 S. E. 695, is relied on by the petitioner; but that case in its facts is the opposite of this. There the mandamus was issued against the board of pharmaceutical examiners, because the petitioner was a graduate of a reputable college of pharmacy, and the statute there under consideration provides: "No examination shall be required in case the applicant is a regular graduate in pharmacy from any reputable college; but such applicant shall be entitled to a license upon furnishing evidence of his graduation satisfactory to the said board and upon payment of the fee of five dollars." In that case the discretion to refuse a license to the graduate of a reputable college of pharmacy was expressly denied to the board, while in this case the statute contemplates that the granting or refusing of the license in this state to an applicant holding a license from the board of examiners of another state shall be entirely within the discretion of the board of medical examiners of South Carolina.

The petition for mandamus is refused.

TENHET v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 15, 1900.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 213*)—COMPROMISE OF PENDING LITIGATION—ADMISSIBILITY.

A proposition to pay a claim made with a view of compromising a pending litigation is inadmissible in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 745; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 213*) — ACTION FOR LOSS OF FREIGHT.

In an action against a carrier for loss of freight, the testimony of the shipper that pending the suit the carrier's freight claim agent had stated that the claim had been ordered paid, and that the shipper should go home and get his money, was not objectionable as proving a compromise pending litigation, but was evidence of the carrier's liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 746; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 241*)—ADMISSIONS OF AGENT—EFFECT.

Admissions of an agent made during the agency and within its scope as to a matter then depending are binding on the principal.

4. CARRIERS (§ 136*)—ACTION FOR LOSS OF GOODS—EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

5. CARRIERS (§ 20*) — NONDELIVERY OF FREIGHT—PENALTY.

Where it appeared that the shipper had presented his claim in January, and that in August following the carrier's freight claim agent had stated that the claim had been ordered paid several days before, the liability of the carrier for the penalty for failing to adjust the claim within a specified time imposed by Act Feb. 23, 1903, 24 St. at Large, p. 81, was for the jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; S. W. G. Shipp, Judge.

Action by J. N. Tenhet against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Montgomery & Lide, for appellant. Jas. W. Johnson, for respondent.

JONES, J. The circuit court affirmed the judgment of the magistrate court in this action for damages for the alleged loss of one case of cigars valued at $23.50 while in the possession of defendant carrier, and for the $50 penalty under Act Feb. 23, 1903, 24 St. at Large, p. 81.

Appellant contends for a reversal on the ground that there was no testimony that the goods were lost while in the possession of the defendant. The complaint alleged that the goods had been delivered to the defendant, and was lost while in its possession. The plaintiff failed to offer any evidence on the subject unless it be inferable from the following testimony of the plaintiff: "I bought these cigars in Charlotte, and ordered them shipped to me in Marion. I never received them. I filed a claim for them with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company with the agent of said road at Marion, S. C. Mr. Hand was the agent. The claim was handed to him January 16, 1907. He gave me a receipt which I now introduce in evidence [marked 'Exhibit B']. Mr. Hand was and now is agent at Marion railroad station. A. H. Shepard is freight claim agent of the A. C. L. Railroad Company. He passes upon claims, and either orders them paid or rejects them. I was in Mr. Shepard's office two weeks ago, on or about August 5th inst. He and I had a talk about the claim sued on. He called Mr. Barnes, one of his clerks, who produced a paper, and said to Mr. Shepard, in my presence: 'This claim has been ordered paid several days.' Mr. Shepard then said to me: 'Go home, and get your money.' Some days later I saw Mr. Hand. He said the claim had been ordered paid. I had no other claim against the company at that time. No part of it has ever been paid." Cross-examination: "After I heard that the claim had been ordered paid, I never applied for the money. I think the goods were delivered to the Southern Railway Company at Charlotte, N. C. Mr. Shepard and Mr. Hand never said that the Coast Line Railroad Company had received the goods. I don't know of my own knowledge that any railroad received the goods. There is the bill of lading." This bill of lading was not admitted in evidence.

At the time of the alleged admissions the suit was pending in the circuit court. If this proposition to pay the claim of $23.50 was made with a view to compromise the pending litigation, it was inadmissible, and should have no probative force, as it is the policy of the law to encourage compromises. Chandler v. Geraty, 10 S. C. 308; Frick & Co. v. Wilson, 36 S. C. 69, 15 S. E. 331; Gibbes v. McCraw, 45 S. C. 184, 22 S. E. 790; Robertson v. Blair & Co., 56 S. C. 104, 34 S. E. 11, 76 Am. St. Rep. 543; Norris v. Insurance Co., 57 S. C. 361, 35 S. E. 572. But it does not appear with certainty that this was a proposition made in the spirit and confidence of negotiation for a compromise, and we cannot assume so. It seems rather to be a statement of a fact that the claim as made had been ordered to be paid, and a direction to the claimant to go and get his money. If it was within the duty of Mr. Shepard to adjust freight claims and communicate with the claimant with reference thereto, his report of the claim as one ordered to be paid was some evidence to be submitted to the jury that the conditions for liability existed. The rule of law is that the admissions of an agent bind the principal if made during the agency and within its scope as to a matter then depending. Melnhard v. Youngblood, 41 S. C. 325, 19 S. E. 675; Ragsdale v. Southern Railway, 72 S. C. 124, 51 S. E. 540; Crawford v. Railway, 56 S. C. 144, 34 S. E. 80; Stroud v. Railway, 79 S. C. 452, 60 S. E. 968. See, also, Lipscombs v. South Bound R. R. Co., 65 S. C. 156, 43 S. E. 388; Southern Ry. v. Howell, 79 S. C. 288, 60 S. E. 677. Whether this particular matter was within the scope of the agent's employment at the time of the admission was a question for the jury. If plaintiff was entitled to go to the jury on the matter discussed, it was not improper upon the testimony to submit to them also the question as to the penalty.

The judgment of the circuit court was affirmed.

BULLOCK v. CHARLESTON & W. C. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 133*)—LOSS OF FREIGHT—ACTION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action against a carrier for loss of freight alleged to have been consigned to "A. G. B.," the bill of lading issued to "W. R. B." is properly received in evidence on it appearing that the goods had been ordered and paid for by "A. G. B.," and that the seller had always addressed him as "W. R. B."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 583; Dec. Dig. § 133.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 98*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY OF FREIGHT—OBLIGATIONS AND RIGHTS OF CONSIGNEE.

Though a carrier delays the delivery of freight for four months, the consignee must accept them when tendered and rely on his right to recover for negligent delay, notwithstanding Act Feb. 23, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81), making a carrier liable for loss of or damage to goods and a penalty for failure to adjust the claim therefor within a time limited.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 396; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—NEGLECT IN DELIVERY OF FREIGHT—LIABILITY.

At common law the measure of the carrier's liability for negligent delay in the transportation of goods is the depreciation in market value thereof at the time and place they should have been delivered and the market value according to their condition at the time and place of actual delivery or tender, together with any reasonable loss proximately caused by such delay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 457; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 20*)—INJURIES TO FREIGHT—STATUTORY LIABILITY.

Under Act Feb. 23, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81), making a carrier liable for loss of or damage to freight, together with penalty for failure to adjust the claim therefor within a prescribed time, a claim may be filed for loss after the lapse of a reasonable time for the arrival of the goods, and recovery may be had for any loss or damage to goods; but no recovery of the penalty can be had unless there is a recovery for the full amount of damage claimed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Abbeville County; R. W. Memmenger, Judge.

Action by A. G. Bullock against the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wm. P. Greene, for appellant. Gary & Perryman, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was commenced in a magistrate's court for the recovery of the value of two dozen steel traps, alleged to have been lost while in the possession of the defendant company, and also the recovery of the statutory penalty of $50 under the act of February 23, 1903 (24 St. at Large, p. 81). The judgment of the magistrate for the full amount and penalty was affirmed by the circuit court, overruling defendant's exceptions. These exceptions are renewed in this court.

The bill of lading introduced in evidence was issued to W. R. Bullock, and defendant objected to its introduction upon the ground that the complaint was for loss of a consignment to "A. G. Bullock." The plaintiff testified that he had ordered the goods in question shipped to him and paid for them, and that J. P. Jennings, partner of Gambrell Hardware Co., always addressed him as "W. R. Bullock." This was sufficient evidence of identification of plaintiff as the consignee to permit introduction of the bill of lading, without referring to the testimony of defendant's agent as to his tender of the goods to plaintiff.

It appears that the claim was filed with defendant's agent on February 28, 1907, for the value of two dozen steel traps as lost. The goods arrived at their destination and were tendered to plaintiff not later than June 15, 1907, but he declined on the ground that he had gone out of business. This action was begun August 15, 1907. There was no testimony that the goods had been damaged. One witness testified: "Traps worth same in June as in April. Only difference would be interest on money for one year." The magistrate charged the jury that, if 60 days expired after the filing of the claim before defendant notified plaintiff of the arrival of the goods, they should find for the plaintiff the amount claimed, $7.25, and penalty, $50, for failure to deliver the goods, provided the defendant had been negligent in tracing the goods within the time allowed by law. This charge was erroneous. Notwithstanding the delay, it was the duty of the plaintiff to accept the goods when tendered and rely upon his right to recover of the carrier damages for negligent delay in transportation. Nettles v. Railroad, 7 Rich. Law, 190, 62 Am. Dec. 409; Moody v. Railway Co., 79 S. C. 300, 60 S. E. 711; Cousar Mercantile Co. v. Southern Railway Co. (manuscript decision) 64 S. E. —. In the last-cited case the tender was made before the expiration of the time allowed for adjustment of the claim. In this case the tender was made after the expiration of such time, but before action was brought. We do not construe the statute as abrogating the rule of law declared in the cases cited. The goods, though delayed in transportation, still belonged to the plaintiff, and he could not abandon them and throw upon the carrier liability as for their total loss or destruction. The measure of the carrier's liability at common law for negligent delay in the transportation of goods is the depreciation in market value of the goods at the time and place they should have been delivered and the market value, according to their condition, at the time and place of actual delivery or tender, together with any reasonable loss or expense proximately caused by such delay. McKerall v. Railroad, 76 S. C. 341, 56 S. E. 965. The liability under the statute is "for loss of or damage to" the goods, together with penalty for failure to adjust or pay the claim therefor within the prescribed time. The claim may be filed for loss after the lapse of a reasonable time for the arrival of the goods, and in an action under the statute recovery may be had for any loss of or damage to goods that may be shown; but no recovery of the penalty can be had unless there be a recovery for the full amount of loss of or damage to goods claimed. There being no evidence of such loss or damage to the extent of $7.25, the amount of the claim as filed, it was error to instruct the jury that recovery should be had for such sum and the penalty if the defendant had been negligent in tracing the goods.

The judgment of the circuit court and of the magistrate's court is reversed, and the case is remanded to the magistrate's court for a new trial.

A telegram reciting, "I am feeling better. Don't come," sent to a wife in reply to her message to wire as to how he felt, and asking whether she should come, puts the telegraph company on notice that the wife will probably suffer mental anguish on her failure to receive a reply to her message, rendering the company liable for such mental anguish on failure to deliver the telegram.

Where the complaint in an action against a telegraph company for failure to deliver a telegram sent by a husband to his wife announcing that he was feeling better, and that she should not come to him, did not allege notice to the company of the illness of the wife on it receiving the telegram for transmission to her, evidence that the husband notified the company's messenger of her illness when he gave him the telegram was inadmissible.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marion County; Robt. Aldrich, Judge.

Action by Max Fass and wife against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Geo. H. Fearons, Willcox & Willcox, Henry E. Davis, and Millins & Hughes, for appellant. Livingston & Gibson, for respondents.

WOODS, J. The plaintiffs, Max Fass and his wife Theresa Fass, recovered judgment on a complaint alleging physical suffering and mental anguish of Theresa Fass owing to the defendant's negligence and willfulness in failing to deliver a telegram. Somewhere between 2 o'clock and 4 o'clock p. m., on 7th January, 1904, Theresa Fass sent over the defendant's line from Marion, S. C., to her husband, Max Fass, at Dillon, S. C., the following telegram: "Wire at once how feeling. Shall I return Friday morning." This message was received in due time, and Max Fass immediately delivered to the defendant the following reply, addressed to Mrs. Fass at Marion: "Am feeling better. Don't come. Am in store today." The message to Mrs. Fass was never delivered. When a reply to her telegram did not come in a reasonable time, Mrs. Fass became alarmed about her husband, took the train leaving Marion at 6:40 on Thursday evening, and arrived at her home at Dillon between 9 and 10 o'clock of the same day. The complaint alleges that at the time Mrs. Fass was sick and the weather very inclement; that her husband, presuming his telegram had been delivered, was not expecting her, and had made no arrangements to meet her at the station with a conveyance; that in her enfeebled condition she was thus compelled to walk to her home alone at night and in the cold; and that from the anxiety, exertion, and exposure in her weak condition she was made seriously ill. The answer was a general denial.

The exceptions are numerous, but the case is in a small compass; for the principles involved have been stated by the court in other cases. There is no allegation in the complaint that the defendant had notice of the sickness of Mrs. Fass when it failed to transmit the telegram to her. It was therefore the right of the defendant to have the statements as to her illness at that time stricken out of the complaint, but the defendant did not avail itself of that right, and hence cannot complain that the court admitted evidence in support of the allegation. Martin v. Seaboard Air Line Ry., 70 S. C. 8, 48 S. E. 616; Blassingame v. Laurens, 90 S. C. 88, 61 S. E. 96. Even after the admission of such testimony, the defendant could have asked the court to instruct the jury that the illness of the plaintiff at the time of defendant's breach of duty could not be taken into consideration in estimating her damages. But no such request was made, and there is no exception to the charge of the court on that point.

There is no foundation for the assignment of error to the circuit court in refusing to hold that there was nothing in the telegram to put the defendant on notice that Mrs. Fass would probably suffer mental anguish and endeavor to reach her husband as soon as practicable when she received no reply to her telegram for immediate information as to his health. The point is disposed of in Hughes v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 516, 52 S. E. 107, in this language: "When a message relates to the serious illness or death of a person, a telegraph company is bound to take notice that the addressee has an interest in the subject of the message, and that, in case of a near relative, the probability is that the addressee will follow the promptings of nature, and respond to the message, and, if possible, at once set out to attend the sick bedside or funeral as the case may be." Willis v. Telegraph Co., 69 S. C. 531, 48 S. E. 538, 104 Am. St. Rep. 828; Key v. Telegraph Co., 76 S. C. 301, 56 S. E. 962; Cloy v. Telegraph Co., 78 S. C. 110, 58 S. E. 972. In the case of Simmons v. Telegraph Co., 63 S. C. 425, 41 S. E. 521, 57 L. R. A. 607, it was held that a complaint alleging facts almost exactly like those here appearing stated a good cause of action for mental anguish.

The serious point in the appeal is the admission of the testimony of Max Fass that he notified defendant's messenger of the illness of Mrs. Fass when he gave him the telegram to be sent to her. The complaint contains no allegation of such notice, and therefore furnished no foundation for the recovery of special damages on that account. Capers v. Telegraph Co., 71 S. C. 29, 50 S. E. 537; Wesner v. A. O. L. R. R., 71 S. C. 211, 50 S. E. 789; Rogers v. Telegraph Co., 72 S. C. 294, 51 S. E. 773; Wehman v. So. Ry., 74 S. C. 286, 54 S. E. 360. Evidence of notice was therefore inadmissible. That the error was quite prejudicial is obvious, for the jury could not have failed to regard the fact that defendant had notice of Mrs. Fass' illness an aggravation of its negligence or wantonness in failing to transmit the telegram which would have relieved her anxiety. The exception on this point must be sustained.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court for a new trial.

MIMS v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 178*)—BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

A copy of a telegram is admissible in evidence only on proof of loss of the original.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 580; Dec. Dig. § 178.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 357*) — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—TELEGRAMS.

A writing not brought to the notice of a telegraph company is not admissible as the original of a message delivered to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1492; Dec. Dig. § 357.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 357*) — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—TELEGRAMS.

Where a telegram was dictated to a child, a girl about 15 years old, who wrote it in a memorandum book from which she read it to the telegraph company's receiving agent, who wrote it himself, instead of requiring her to write it on a message blank, the telegram as written in the book was admissible against the company as evidence of the message accepted for transmission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1492; Dec. Dig. § 357.*]

4. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 35*)—RECEIPT OF MESSAGES — STIPULATIONS IN BLANKS.

A stipulation in a telegraph company's message blanks that messages must be presented in writing at the transmitting office is binding on those who assent thereto by using the blank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

5. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 35*)—RECEIPT OF MESSAGES — STIPULATIONS IN BLANKS.

There is no presumption that the public dealing with a telegraph company has notice of stipulations on its message blanks with respect to the conduct of its business merely because they are printed thereon; and an operator, who receives a message for transmission in violation of a requirement that messages must be presented in writing, does not thereby become the agent of the sender, if the latter has no notice of the requirement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 357*) — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—TELEGRAMS.

A telegram having been read to the company's receiving agent who wrote it, the message as written by him was admissible against the company to prove that he made the mistake in the address, causing nondelivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1492; Dec. Dig. § 357.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 237*) — ADMISSIONS — STATEMENTS BY THIRD PERSONS—AUTHORITY.

A conversation between a telegraph company's agent and a third person concerning an undelivered telegram, the agent being unable to identify the person, and there being nothing to show that his statements would bind the addressee, is inadmissible against the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 883; Dec. Dig. § 237.*]

8. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 73*)—OPERATION—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether the failure of a telegraph company's receiving agent to make any effort to correct the address of an undelivered telegram showed wanton and reckless indifference to duty justifying punitive damages held under the evidence to be a question for the jury.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; J. O. Klugh, Judge.

Action by Paul Mims against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Fearons, John Gary Evans, and Jos. A. McCullough, for appellant. Cothran, Dean & Cothran, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for mental anguish arising from the failure to deliver a telegram. The complaint thus sets out the telegram and the relationship of the parties: "That on September 28, 1906, Harrison Mims, father of the plaintiff, delivered to the agent of the defendant company at Greenville, S. C., a certain telegram signed by him and addressed to the plaintiff, Paul Mims, care Columbia Hotel, Columbia, South Carolina, and reading in substance as follows: 'Your brother Frank died suddenly last night. Come at once.' The contention of the defendant under the general denial of the answer was that the telegram was not delivered because the sender made the mistake of having it addressed to the plaintiff, Columbia Hotel, Augusta, Ga., instead of Columbia Hotel, Columbia, S. C.

The question made by the numerous exceptions will be considered as presented in the argument of defendant's counsel. There was evidence that, when Frank Mims died, his father, Harrison Mims, desiring to telegraph the plaintiff, Frank's brother, to come, and being unable to write, dictated the telegram to his grandniece, Annie Early, a negro girl about 15 years old, who wrote it down in a memorandum book. Annie Early testified that, when she went to the telegraph office, she told the agent she wanted to send a message, and he wrote the telegram as she read it from the book; that the message, as read to the agent, was addressed to the Columbia Hotel, Columbia, S. C. The admission of this memorandum book as evidence is the first error assigned in the exceptions. It is true a copy of a telegram, like copies of other instruments, is admissible in evidence only on proof of loss of the original; and it is also true that a writing not brought to the notice of a telegraph company is not admissible as the original of a message delivered to it. But in this instance there was evidence that the girl held the book in her hand, and from it read the message to the receiving agent of the telegraph company; thus giving him express notice that she was reading a written message, and affording him full opportunity to examine it. The girl testified, further, that she did not know she was allowed to write the message on a telegraph blank and deliver it to the agent, but supposed it to be the business of the agent to write it. Certainly the age of the child was sufficient to put the agent on notice of her lack of familiarity with the business methods of the telegraph companies. Under the circumstances the act of the agent of the company in choosing not to require the message to be written by the child on one of its blanks, but to take it as read from the book was evidence of consent that the message, as written in the book and read to the agent, should be the telegram received by the company. In this view, the telegram, as written in the book, was properly received in evidence.

This conclusion would dispose of the position taken by defendant that there was no evidence that the defendant ever accepted for transmission a telegram directed to Columbia, S. C., but for the position taken by defendant that in receiving a message in this way the person who received it acted as agent of the sender, and not of the company, notwithstanding the fact that he was placed by defendant on its side of the desk for the purpose of receiving messages from the public. The reason given for this position is that the defendant's message blank contains the stipulation: "No responsibility regarding messages attaches to this company until the same are presented and accepted at one of its transmitting offices; and, if a message is sent to such office by one of the company's messengers, he acts for that purpose, as agent of the sender." This requirement is binding on every one who assents to it by writing his message on the blank, and perhaps as every one who is capable of complying with the requirement, and has notice of it, when dealing with the company, though, of course, the company may waive the requirement. The telegraph company may ordinarily require assent to this or any other reasonable regulation by requiring the sender, when capable of doing so, to write the message on its blank or by any other reasonable requirement. So if one with notice of a requirement that messages must be presented in writing at the company's office, for his own convenience, induces the agent to violate the regulation of the company, it may well be held that the company's agent

In violating its rules at the instance of the sender ceases to be the company's agent and becomes in the act of violation the sender's agent. It was on this principle that it was held in the case of Carroll v. So. Exp. Co., 37 S. C. 452, 16 S. E. 128, that an express agent who violates the rules of the company by procurement of a consignee for the convenience of the consignee becomes the agent of the consignee. But there is no presumption that the public, dealing with the defendant as a public service corporation, has notice of stipulations and regulations with respect to the conduct of its business merely by reason of the fact that they are printed on defendant's message blanks. Bowie v. Western Union Tel. Co., 78 S. C. 425, 59 S. E. 65. In this case there was no evidence that Harrison Mims, in whose name the message was sent, had any notice of the company's requirement here relied on to exempt it from liability; and there was direct and uncontradicted evidence that the girl who went to the telegraph office and communicated the message to the agent had no notice of the requirement. There was therefore, under the principles we have stated, no evidence warranting the court in holding that the agent of the defendant who received the message received it as the agent of the sender; and the exceptions on this subject, relating to the refusal to grant a nonsuit and to the charge, must be overruled.

There is no foundation for the assignment of error on account of the admission in evidence of the telegram, as taken down by the agent addressed to Augusta, Ga., for the reason that it was admitted as evidence of the mistake made by the agent, and not as the telegram delivered by the sender to be transmitted to plaintiff.

The defendant next complains that the circuit court should have allowed its agent Cason to testify to conversation concerning the telegram with a person described by him as a "colored man." The witness could not tell who the colored man was, and there was nothing whatever to indicate that his statements could affect the rights of the plaintiff or in any way bind him. For this reason there was no error in excluding the conversation.

The motion for nonsuit as to the cause of action for punitive damages was properly refused. The message was received by the defendant at 10:46 a. m., September 26, 1906. reached Augusta at 11:12, and a service message which left Augusta at 12:32 p. m. was received by the operator at Greenville, informing him there was no Columbia Hotel in Augusta, and asking him for a better address. The importance of the telegram was evident on its face, and Harrison Mims, the sender of the telegram, had been a resident of Greenville for many years, and at the time of this occurrence lived in his own house; yet there is no evidence that the agent made any effort to find him and get the right address, or even to notify him that the telegram had not been delivered. If there was a city directory in the office, it was not consulted, and the agent could not remember that he had sent out a messenger, though he thought it probable he had. While the mistake in copying the telegram as dictated by the girl might be attributed to negligence or inadvertence, the evidence of failure to make any effort to correct the error was properly submitted to the jury for them to determine whether it showed wanton and reckless indifference to the duty which the defendant owed to the plaintiff.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

MILLS v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 2*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DELAY—PENAL STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Act March 26, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 671), fixing a penalty against railroad companies for delaying transportation of freight, being penal, must be strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 2.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 241*)—CONSTRUCTION.

The rule requiring penal statutes to be strictly construed is subject to the requirement that all statutes must be interpreted in view of the design of their enactment.

3. STATUTES (§ 188*)—CONSTRUCTION—LEGISLATIVE DESIGN.

The legislative design in statutory enactment should not be curtailed by narrow verbal distinctions, nor enlarged into oppression by giving to the words used too broad signification.

4. CARRIERS (§ 96*)—FREIGHT—NOTICE REQUIRING PROMPT SHIPMENT—TIME FOR GIVING.

Act March 26, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 671) § 1, requiring carriers to transport freight promptly on receiving notice that prompt shipment is required, requires notice to be given within such time before shipment that the carrier's agent, notwithstanding his other duties, by exercising reasonable diligence may keep the notice in mind, it not being necessary to give notice of the exact time of shipment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

5. CARRIERS (§ 96*)—FREIGHT—NOTICE REQUIRING PROMPT TRANSPORTATION—UPON WHOM TO BE SERVED.

Under Act March 26, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 671) § 1, requiring carriers to transport freight promptly on receiving notice that prompt shipment is required, the notice must be given the shipping agent.

6. CARRIERS (§ 96*)—NOTICE REQUIRING PROMPT TRANSPORTATION—WHO MAY GIVE.

Since Act March 26, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 671) § 1, requiring carriers to transport freight promptly on receiving notice requiring prompt shipment, prescribes no particular method of giving the notice, notice may be given by the consignee or holder of the bill of lading through another; direct notice by the consignee or the holder not being essential.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Chester County; John S. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Patience A. Mills against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Abney & Miller and J. E. McDonald, for appellant. A. L. Gaston, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The complaint in this action alleges a delay of 13 days in the transportation of a car load of lumber from Westville, in Kershaw county, a station on defendant's railroad, to Smith's in York county, another station on defendant's railroad, not over 100 miles distant. Judgment was demanded on account of this delay for $65 as the amount of the statutory penalty at $5 a day for 13 days, and for $200 special damages. At the trial plaintiff's counsel conceded that there was no evidence warranting the recovery of special damages, and the jury found a verdict for $50 for the statutory penalty of $5 a day for 10 days. The appeal involves the construction of these portions of the penalty act of March 28, 1904 (24 St. at Large, p. 671):

"Section 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the state of South Carolina, that from and after May 1st, 1904, all railroad companies doing business in this state shall transport to its destination all freight received by them for transportation within this state within a reasonable time after receipt thereof, not exceeding the following times after midnight of the day of the receipt thereof, to wit: Between points not over one hundred miles apart, seventy-two hours: * * * Provided, that notice be given to the receiving company that prompt shipment of such freight is required, and when requested, such company shall insert in the bill of lading the words, 'Prompt shipment required,' which shall be conclusive evidence of such notice, and each such company shall extend such notice to its connecting line or be liable for the consequences of its failure to do so.

"Sec. 2. That any such company failing to comply with the provisions of this act, except for good and sufficient cause, the burden of proof of which shall be on the company so failing, shall be subject in addition to the liabilities and remedies now existing for unreasonable delay in the transportation of freight, to a penalty of five dollars per day for every day of delay in excess of the time hereinbefore limited, to be recovered by any consignee who may be injured in any way by such delay, or by the owner or holder of the bill of lading, in any court of competent jurisdiction. * * *

The bill of lading shows the shipment of a car of lumber by Stevens Lumber Company at Westville, consigned to Stevens Lumber Company at Smith's. But the bill of lading was indorsed in blank by Stevens Lumber Company, and there was testimony that the lumber was ordered from Stevens Lumber Company by R. G. Mills as the agent for his mother, Patience A. Mills, and that the bill of lading indorsed in blank was turned over to Mills for his mother.

By the terms of the statute, the penalty for delay does not attach unless there is notice that prompt shipment is required; and the main issue made by defendant was under its denial that such notice as the statute requires was given. The evidence on this issue was to the effect that R. G. Mills, plaintiff's agent in the purchase of the lumber, who was in the employment of the Stevens Lumber Company at Kershaw, made arrangements with defendant's agent at that point for the shipment of the car of lumber from Westville to Smith's, urging him to make prompt shipment; that Pursley, a clerk in the defendant's office at Kershaw, in recognition of Mills' demand for prompt shipment, telephoned to the defendant's agent at Westville that Mills was in a hurry to get his car placed and moved out. Defendant's counsel by objections to the evidence and requests to charge asked the circuit court to hold that the notice was insufficient as a matter of law, (1) because it was given before the shipment; and (2) because it was not given directly by the shipper to the agent at the point of shipment. The act is penal and must be strictly construed, but this rule is quite consistent with the requirement that all statutes must be interpreted in view of the design of their enactment. The legislative design in statutory enactment ought not to be cut short by narrow verbal distinctions, nor enlarged into oppression by giving to the words used too broad a signification. This statute requires notice that prompt shipment is required without expressly fixing the time of such notice. But evidently the General Assembly did not mean that the notice might be given at any time, however remote before the shipment. A statute with that meaning would be oppressive, because the burden on the railroad company of keeping in the minds of its agents notices given in the remote past that prompt shipment would be required of freight, afterwards to be shipped would be intolerable. On the other hand, the construction that the notice must be given at the very instant of shipment would be very narrow. The fair construction is that the statute requires the notice to be given within such time before shipment that the agent of the carrier, notwithstanding the other duties devolving on him, by the exercise of reasonable diligence may keep the requirement in mind. It follows that the position of the defendant that the notice must be given at the exact time of the shipment is not tenable. The statute makes it clear that the notice must be given to the shipping agent, and not to any agent of the defendant, for he is the agent who issues the bill of lading, and upon him, therefore, must devolve the duty to insert in the bill of lading on request the words, "Prompt shipment required." But it is not necessary, as defendant insists, that he must receive the notice direct from the consignee or the owner or holder of the bill of lading. The statute lays down no particular method of giving the notice, and therefore notice given by the consignee or owner or holder of the bill of lading through another is sufficient. In this view, the testimony that the notice was given by the agent of the owner and holder of the bill of lading to the agent of the defendant at Kershaw, and by him extended to the defendant's shipping agent at Westville, was competent; and it was not error for the circuit judge to refuse to instruct the jury that there was no evidence of the notice required by the statute. The court having decided in the case of Muckenfuss Manufacturing Co. v. C. & W. C. Ry. Co. (recently filed) 63 S. E. 747, that proof of injury is not necessary to sustain an action by the owner or holder of the bill of lading to recover the statutory penalty for delay in the transportation of goods, the exceptions on that point cannot be sustained.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 297*)—DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

Civ. Code 1902, § 2069, providing that when, in the judgment of the railroad commissioners, any enlargement of or improvement in stations, mode of operating a railroad, etc., is reasonable and expedient to promote the security, etc., of the public, they shall give information in writing to the railroad company, and, if the company fail within 60 days to adopt the suggestion, action may be brought, is not violative of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. S. C. art. 1, § 5, forbidding any person to be deprived of property without due process of law, because failing to expressly require a notice and hearing before the commissioners could require the changes, since the constitutional requirement under which such a notice and hearing are necessary is part of the law governing the commissioners, and the presumption is, in view of the silence of the statute as to notice and hearing, that the Legislature intended the commissioners to comply with the Constitution, and not to violate it.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 60, 297*)—DELEGATION OF POWER—DUE PROCESS—CONTROL OF RAILROADS.

A state Legislature has the right to intrust to a board of commissioners such a supervision of railroads as is reasonable and expedient for the public welfare, and a statute providing for such a supervision does not take the management of the railroad property away from the owners.

Mandamus by B. L. Caughman and others, as Railroad Commissioners, against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company. Demurrer to petition overruled, with leave to answer.

Attorney General Lyon, for petitioners. Lyles & Lyles, for respondent.

WOODS, J. B. L. Caughman, J. H. Earle, and J. M. Sullivan, railroad commissioners, by their petition ask the Supreme Court to enforce by mandamus an order made by them as railroad commissioners, requiring that the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company "should provide additional side track room at Sligh's, S. C., so that side track room would accommodate, in a way so as to be convenient, patrons loading and unloading at least four cars, and that said side track be completed on or by August 1st, 1908; that a passenger shed be erected at Sligh's, S. C., sufficient in size for the convenience and the accommodation of the traveling public on or by September 1st, 1908." The application is made under section 2119, Civ. Code 1902, which provides the writ of mandamus as a remedy for neglect or refusal of a railroad company to comply with the rules and regulations of the railroad commissioners within the limits of their authority.

The petition alleges that the order was made because of complaint made to the railroad commissioners by citizens residing in the vicinity of Sligh's, alleging that the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company was furnishing insufficient accommodation at said point for passengers traveling on said road, and insufficient facilities for receiving and delivering freight at said point, in that there was no sufficient passenger or freight depot, and in that there were insufficient side track facilities for the handling, receiving, and delivery of freights received and delivered at said point, and asking that said railroad company be compelled to furnish a suitable passenger station and sufficient side tracks to accommodate not less than four cars." The petition for mandamus further sets out that the order above recited was made after notice to the respondent and investigation of the complaint, including the hearing of the respondent; that after the order was made the commissioners, on the request of the respondent, granted to it a full rehearing of the whole matter; that, after such rehearing, the commissioners decided that the order should remain in force, and caused the same to be duly served on the respondent; and that, though more than 60 days have elapsed, the respondent has failed to comply with the order. The respondent demurred to the petition on the ground that "it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the statute or statutes of the state, under which the board of railroad commissioners purported to act, are, and always have been, null and void and of none effect upon the following grounds: (a) That the said statute or statutes violate and are repugnant to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, section 1, and article 1, § 5, of the Constitution of the state of South Carolina, in that it or they deprive your respondent of its liberty and property without due process of law, in that the said statute or statutes make no provision for notice to the railroads of the hearing before the railroad commissioners, from which the said orders of the commission are to result, and in no way require an opportunity to be heard to be given the railroads before or after the passage of the said orders. (b) That the said statute or statutes violate and are repugnant to the aforesaid section of the Constitution of the United States and of this state, in that it or they attempt to take the whole and entire management of the railroads of this state from the hands of their owners, and place it in the hands of the board of railroad commissioners; thus placing upon your respondent and the other railroads of this state burdens beyond the duties they owe the public, and depriving your respondent of its liberty and property without due process of law."

The Constitution of South Carolina provides: "A commission is hereby established to be known as 'the Railroad Commission,' which shall be composed of not less than three members, whose powers over all transporting and transmitting corporations, and duties, manner of election and term of office shall be regulated by law; and until otherwise provided by law the said Commissioners shall have the same powers and jurisdiction, perform the same duties and receive the same compensation as now conferred, prescribed and allowed by law to the existing Railroad Commissioners. * * * Article 9, § 14. By section 2067, Civ. Code 1892, the railroad commissioners are given general supervision of all railroads. By section 2068 they are required to apply for injunction or mandamus against any railroad company which after notice continues to violate any law or neglects "in any respect, or particular to comply with the terms of its charter, or with the provisions of any of the laws of the state, especially in regard to the connections with other railroads, the rates of toll, and the time schedule." Section 2069 thus confers powers and imposes duties with more particularity: "Whenever in the judgment of the railroad commissioners, it shall appear that repairs are necessary upon any such railroad, or that in addition to the rolling stock, or any enlargement of, or improvement in, the stations or station houses, or any modification in the rates of fare for transporting freight or passengers, or any change in the mode of operating the road and conducting its business, is reasonable and expedient in order to promote the security, convenience, and accommodation of the public, they shall give information, in writing, to the corporation of the improvements and changes which they adjudge to be proper; and if the said company shall fail, within sixty days, to adopt the suggestions of said commissioners, they shall take such legal proceedings as they may deem expedient, and shall have authority to call upon the Attorney General to institute and conduct such proceedings." There is no express provision of the statute that the railroad commissioners shall give notice and an opportunity to a railroad company to be heard before having imposed upon it the burden of making the enlargements, improvements, or changes which the commissioners may deem reasonable and expedient; and it is contended by respondent that the absence from the statute of such express provision makes the statute unconstitutional, because it contemplates depriving the respondent of its liberty and property without due process of law. The statute providing for railroad commissioners has been before this court in a number of cases, but in none of them was this question made or decided. The leading case which seems to give some support to the position taken by the respondent is Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 10 Sup. Ct. 462, 702, 33 L. Ed. 970. The question there arose on rates of freight fixed by the railroad commission. In declaring the act as construed by the Supreme Court of Minnesota to be unconstitutional the court said: "No hearing is provided for, no summons or notice to the company before the commission has found what it is to find and declare what it is to declare, no opportunity provides for the company to introduce witnesses before the commission, in fact, nothing which has the semblance of due process of law; and although, in the present case, it appears that, prior to the decision of the commission the company appeared before it by its agent, and the commission investigated the rates charged by the company for transporting milk, yet it does not appear what the character of the investigation was or how the result was arrived at." The courts of New York, Indiana, and Virginia in considering the same principles as applied to special taxes or assessments on property held that the statute must in terms provide for notice and opportunity to the property owner to be heard or it will be unconstitutional as imposing a special burden without a hearing, and therefore depriving a citizen of his property without due process of law. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 188, 30 Am. Rep. 289; Kuntz v. Sumption, 117 Ind. 1, 19 N. E. 474, 2 L. R. A. 657; Violett v. Alexandria, 92 Va. 561, 23 S. E. 909, 31 L. R. A. 382, 53 Am. St. Rep. 825. These decisions cannot be sustained either on principle or by authority. It cannot be doubted that the respondent was entitled, as a constitutional right, to notice and hearing before the railroad commissioners could impose upon it the burden of making the changes in its station and track at Sligh's, and it follows, if the statute purported to authorize the imposition of the burden without notice to the respondent and opportunity to be heard, it would be unconstitutional. But express statutory requirement for such notice and hearing is not essential, for the reason that the constitutional requirement that there shall be notice and opportunity to be heard is a part of the law governing the railroad commissioners. As the statute is silent on the subject, the presumption is that the Legislature intended for the commissioners to comply with the Constitution, not to violate it. The requirement that the burden imposed by them in regulating the business of the railroads should be reasonable and expedient in order to promote the security, convenience, and accommodation of the public implies that they shall make an investigation in order to ascertain what is reasonable, and that they shall, in pursuing the investigation, adopt, in their discretion, any suitable procedure not forbidden by law. The argument comes to this: The railroad commissioners are under two laws, namely, the statute law of the state, which confers upon them certain powers over railroads, and the constitutional law of the state and of the United States, which requires that they shall exercise the powers conferred by statute only by due process of law; that is, after giving the railroad company due notice and opportunity to be heard. A statute is invalid which requires something to be done which is forbidden by the Constitution, but it cannot be essential to the validity of a statute that it should enjoin obedience to the Constitution. The great weight of authority is to the effect that while notice of a special burden or duty which a board such as this proposes to impose must be extended, and an opportunity to be heard on the rightfulness of the ex-tions must be given, it is not necessary that the statute under which the board acts should expressly provide notice. Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 18 Sup. Ct. 750, 37 L. Ed. 637; Chicago, B. & Q. R. R. v. Nebraska, 170 U. S. 57, 18 Sup. Ct. 513, 42 L. Ed. 948; French v. Barber A. P. Co., 181 U. S. 324, 21 Sup. Ct. 625, 45 L. Ed. 879; Naylor v. Harrisonville, 207 Mo. 341, 105 S. W. 1074; Shannon v. Portland, 38 Or. 393, 62 Pac. 53; Gilmore v. Hentig, 33 Kan. 156, 5 Pac. 781; 8 Cyc. 1102.

The second ground of demurrer has no foundation. No attempt is made by the statute to take the management of the railroad property of the state away from the owners. The statute provides for nothing more than such supervision of railroads as is reasonable and expedient for the public welfare. It has long been settled that a state Legislature has the right to intrust such supervision to a board of commissioners. Stone v. Farmers' L. & T. Co. (Railroad Commissioner Cases) 116 U. S. 307, 6 Sup. Ct. 388, 1191, 29 L. Ed. 636.

The judgment of this court is that the demurrer be overruled, and that the respondent have 20 days from the filing of this decree to answer the petition.

GOODWIN v. ATLANTIC COAST LINE R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. April 9, 1909.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 400*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Evidence in an action for injuries to one passing over defendant's railroad track within the private yard of a mill company having control of the premises held to justify the refusal of a motion for nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff was a trespasser, and that the injury was not wantonly inflicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 100*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Contributory negligence is not a defense in a case of wanton or willful injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 194*)—CONDUCT—REMARKS OF JUDGE.

A statement by the court in ruling on a motion for a nonsuit that "the testimony clearly shows that the plaintiff was not a trespasser," which is responsive to the motion, is not a charge on the facts, in violation of Const. art. 5, § 26.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 397*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a person upon defendant's railroad track within the private yard of another having control of the premises, evidence that persons dealing with the owner of the yard were accustomed to cross the track

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes with the knowledge of defendant, and that it failed to ring the bell or blow the whistle within the yard, is admissible against defendant to prove negligence, and evidence of failure to give such signals without the yard at a public crossing near the place of the accident is competent to prove that the injuries were wantonly inflicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1345; Dec. Dig. § 397.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

The action of the court in approving plaintiff's and defendant's requests to charge, subject to such modifications as may be made in the general charge, is not objectionable as permitting the jury to determine which are correct, where the general charge is full and explicit as to the law applicable to the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 273*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY OF SPECIFIC EXCEPTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

An exception that the court erred in approving plaintiff's and defendant's requests to charge, subject to modification, because there were irreconcilable differences between the requests, and there were no modifications in the general charge, is too general, and cannot be considered by the reviewing court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 273.*]

7. RAILROADS (§ 356*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—LICENSEES.

A person passing over a railroad track within the inclosed yard of his employer in the pursuit of lawful business connected with his employment, according to a custom of employees of the owner of the yard, is a licensee, and not a trespasser, though he stops for a few moments on the track, and the company, having knowledge of such use of its track, is bound to exercise ordinary care not to injure him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1223-1233; Dec. Dig. § 356.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

A request to charge, declaring that a railroad company's failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle on entering a private yard of another, or crossing a known road is negligence per se, having been approved subject to the modifications of the general charge, must be construed with the general charge, declaring that such failure is negligence per se only when the train approaches a public highway or street, and is not objectionable as failing to express the qualification stated in general charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

9. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON FACTS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

A charge that evidence of failure to give the statutory signal for public crossings is competent to prove reckless negligence on the part of a railroad company causing injuries to a person upon its tracks within the private yard of another is not objectionable as a charge on the facts, the general charge stating that such failure is a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether the injuries were wantonly inflicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

A charge which was faulty in declaring that the plaintiff under the facts stated "had a right to be on the track," of the defendant within the private yard of his employer was not prejudicial to defendant, where the testimony clearly showed that plaintiff was not a trespasser but a licensee.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

11. TRIAL (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

The action of the court in approving requests to charge, subject to such modification as may be given in the general charge, is not objectionable as misleading and requiring the jury to reconcile inconsistencies, where the general charge covers all the law applicable to the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 703-717; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

12. RAILROADS (§ 401*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court could without error have declared that one injured upon defendant's tracks within the private yard of another was a licensee, a charge allowing the jury to determine whether he was a trespasser or a licensee was too favorable to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

13. RAILROADS (§ 385*)—OPERATION—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACKS—CARE.

Where a railroad company operates a track within the private yard of another having control of the premises, those having a right to be in the yard and accustomed to use the track in their dealings with the owner have as much right to presume that the railroad company will exercise ordinary care in operating within the yard, as the company has to presume that persons therein will give them a clear track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1811-1813; Dec. Dig. § 385.*]

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Marlboro County; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by R. C. Goodwin against the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Willcox & Willcox, Livingston & Muller, and Townsend & Rogers, for appellants. Newton & Owens, for respondent.

JONES, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant railroad company for $787.50 as damages for personal injuries, loss of three fingers of the left hand, and accompanying suffering, caused by collision with defendant's engine and car operating within the yard of the Marlboro Cotton Mill near Bennettsville, S. C., on October 20, 1906.

The main question presented by the exceptions to said judgment is whether there was error in the court's refusal of the motion for nonsuit and the motion to direct a verdict for defendant. Appellant contends that the only inference of which the testimony is susceptible is that plaintiff was a trespasser upon defendant's track at the time of the collision, and that the injury was not wantonly inflicted; that, if the injury was a result of defendant's negligence, the testimony shows conclusively that plaintiff proximately contributed thereto by standing upon the track in a position of obvious danger. There was testimony tending to show that plaintiff had for years been engaged in hauling wood and other material for the Marlboro Cotton Mill with his own team, and on this occasion had entered at the lower side of the millyard, which was inclosed, through a gate for wagons on a road leading through the inclosure partly along the wood piled next to the track and across the track at the upper side and extending out at another gate for wagons, and was going to the superintendent's office to procure payment for some service performed for the mill company; that he took the most direct route to the superintendent's office, which led across the spur track through an opening in the wood piled alongside the spur track within the inclosure, being used by the defendant company for the purpose of carrying in wood and coal for the mill company and in hauling out cars containing the products of the mill; that persons employed about the mill and yard were accustomed to cross said track and walk along it whenever it suited their convenience without objection by the railroad company, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the mill company, whose orders only excluded children and loafers; that, on reaching the track at the opening in the woodpile alongside, plaintiff was accosted by a man loading his wagon with wood at or near the opening, and stopped on the edge of the track and engaged in conversation with the man, and standing with his side or back to the direction from which a train might approach; that while in this position neither he nor the person with whom he was conversing heard the approach of the cars nor any signals, and that while he saw Mr. Thrower, the engineer of the mill company, approaching from nearly the opposite direction he did not hear his calls of warning on account of the wind blowing in a contrary direction; that there was no ringing of bell or blowing of whistle or any other signal of warning given by the defendants of the train's approach and no lookout on the rear of the backing train, and that the train was backing "at a pretty rapid rate"; that plaintiff became aware of the approach of the backing train when it was within a few feet of him, raised his hand against the car, was thrown down, and, while endeavoring to get out of the way over the wood which had been placed along the track, was thrown back upon the track by the falling wood, and his left hand run over by the wheels of the car, the car being stopped so quickly that only two trucks had passed him.

There was testimony that the inclosure was controlled by the Marlboro Cotton Mill; that it had a gate for the entrance of the train cars which was closed at night; that the spur was about 325 feet in length from gate to coal chute at the end where the coal was dumped; and that it was the custom for the Marlboro Cotton Mill to unload the cars of wood and pile the wood on either side of the track. The defendant's train was a freight train operating between Florence, S. C., and Fayetteville, N. C., passing by the cotton mill one day going and the next day returning, and it was of frequent occurrence for the train to stop at the mill and use the siding in carrying in material or carrying out the products of the mill. On this occasion, about schedule time, the train arrived, and plaintiff was aware of its approach on the main line, but he testified that he was not aware that the engine had moved onto the siding, although he was aware that there was a box car on the siding within the inclosure at the platform of the packing room, but whether the car was empty or loaded with mill products for transportation out was a matter as to which there was some conflict in the testimony. On the part of defendant there was testimony that the car was loaded for transportation out, that the engine switched from the main line, entered the inclosure, attached to the loaded car, and pushed on slowly at the rate of three miles per hour upgrade towards the coal chute to take out also an empty car there; that the bell was ringing all the while; that the engineer did not expect that any one would be on the track on this occasion, and did not discover the presence of any one on the track until he heard some one holler, and that he immediately put on brakes and stopped the train. The brakeman, however, testified that, after coupling with the car at the platform, he signed the engineer back to the coal chute for the empty and climbed on top of the car to give signals, and that as he climbed up, he saw a man standing on the edge of the railroad with his side towards him, in a position of danger talking to another man, that he called out to him, "Look out, we are coming back there after some cars!" that he did not see him any more until he heard him holler; that he then gave stop signal and the train stopped when only two trucks had passed him. It appears that the distance from the point where the brakeman was when he saw plaintiff to the place of collision was about 125 feet. We are of the opinion that it cannot be said that the testimony conclusively shows that plaintiff was a bald trespasser upon the track of the railroad company, as in Hale v. Railroad Co., 84 S. C. 292, 13 S. E. 537, where the party injured was on the side track in the depot yard of the railroad company and within its exclusive control, and as in Smalley v. Railway Co., 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489, where the injured party was on a trestle on the main line of the railroad company. Here the track was within the private inclosure of the Marlboro Cotton Mill and subject to its general control, and its use by the railroad company was not exclusive. The plaintiff was in the yard on business with the mill company and under circumstances warranting him in supposing he could cross the track as others were accustomed to do with the knowledge and acquiescence of the owner and controller of the inclosure.

A possible theory of the case, then, is that plaintiff was crossing the track as a licensee and not as a trespasser, in which event the railroad company was bound to observe ordinary care not to injure him. Jones v. Railroad, 61 S. C. 559, 39 S. E. 758. The mere fact that plaintiff stopped upon the track for a few moments under circumstances tending to show constant use of the track by persons having business in the yard would not of itself be conclusive that plaintiff was a trespasser in being where he was. The testimony tended to show, not merely a case of inadvertent negligence, but a case of advertent negligence, a reckless and wanton disregard of plaintiff's safety by running against him in the yard of his employer without any attempt to stop when it could easily have been done in time, and without any warning after knowledge of plaintiff's dangerous situation. Under this view it is unnecessary to consider whether the testimony shows conclusively that the plaintiff by his own negligence contributed to his injury, as contributory negligence is not a defense in a case of wanton or willful injury. Hence there was no error in refusing the motion for nonsuit and to direct a verdict for defendant. In announcing his ruling upon the motion for nonsuit, Judge Watts said in the presence of the jury: "The testimony clearly shows that the plaintiff was not a trespasser." It is contended that this was an expression of an opinion to the jury on a question of fact contrary to article 5, § 26, Const. The statement was responsive to the motion, and was not a charge to the jury in respect to matters of fact. Usually what a judge says in ruling upon admissibility of testimony, motion for nonsuit, and to direct a verdict is not considered a violation of the provisions of the Constitution. Glover v. Telegraph Co., 78 S. C. 505, 59 S. E. 526; State v. Arnold, 80 S. C. 386, 61 S. E. 891. There were no exceptional circumstances showing abuse of discretion to the prejudice of appellant, and the court was careful to impress upon the jury that they were the exclusive judges of the facts.

The exceptions to the admission of testimony cannot be sustained. Plaintiff's action was not for an injury done at a public crossing, and the testimony admitted was not to show that the place of injury was at a public crossing, but that many persons were accustomed to use and cross the track within the inclosure of the Marlboro Mill Company as a circumstance to show that under the common law it was the duty of the railroad company operating within the inclosure with knowledge of the circumstances to exercise ordinary care. As we understand the testimony, there was a wagon road crossing used by the mill company and those dealing with it within the inclosure, but there was no public crossing or traveled place, in the sense of the statute, within the inclosure, but there was a public crossing near the inclosure outside. In so far, therefore, as the testimony admitted tended to show failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle within the inclosure, it related to defendant's alleged duty at common law, and, in so far as the admitted testimony tended to show a failure to give such signals without the inclosure at a public crossing near, the testimony was competent under the allegations of the complaint charging a wanton and reckless disregard of duty. Mack v. Railway, 52 S. C. 325, 29 S. E. 905, 40 L. R. A. 679, 68 Am. St. Rep. 913; Mason v. Southern Ry., 58 S. C. 70, 36 S. E. 440, 53 L. R. A. 913, 79 Am. St. Rep. 826.

Counsel for plaintiff and for defendant presented requests to charge, and in response thereto Judge Watts, after reading them to the jury, said: "In a large measure the attorneys on both sides have been careful in their requests to charge, and it is all good law except when I change or modify it, and, when I change or modify it, I want you to accept the change or modification." It is contended that this was error (1) because it left it to the jury to determine which was the correct law applicable to the case; (2) because there was irreconcilable differences and contradictions between the requests submitted by the two sides, and there were no modifications in the general charge. The first specification cannot be sustained because the general charge was full and explicit as to the law applicable to the case. The second specification cannot be sustained because it is so general that it wholly fails to indicate what material differences or contradictions existed between the two sets of requests to charge, and as to what particular proposition or modification, or want of modification, was objectionable. The object of an exception is to specify some particular error in the trial court so that neither counsel nor court need speculate as to the proposition sought to be reviewed. The design of requests to charge is to have the court instruct the jury as to the law applicable to all the material issues in the case, and, if this is correctly done in the general charge, the use and office of requests to charge have been fully met. It cannot be prejudicial to appellant for the court to approve its requests subject to whatever modification may be made in the general charge, unless an erroneous modification has in fact been made; nor can it be prejudicial to appellant for the court to charge respondent's requests subject to modifications in the general charge unless it is shown that the request without modification or with the modification given in the general charge is erroneous.

Appellant excepts to the following instructions given at the request of respondent:

"(1) If the jury believe from the evidence that the track upon which the plaintiff is alleged to have been injured was frequented by people passing to and fro along said railroad, which fact was well known to defendant or its agents, servants, and employes, and it had been so used for a long time, then the plaintiff in being found upon said tract with no knowledge of the approach of the train would be a licensee thereon, and it was the duty of the defendant to observe ordinary care in backing its cars into said yard and upon said track.

"(2) If the jury believe from the testimony that the plaintiff at the time of the said accident was in the employment of the mill and being found upon the track and without knowledge of the approach of the cars, and in the pursuit of lawful business, and it was the custom of the employes of the mill to cross said track and to go upon the said track at their pleasure and without warning to keep off of it, then the plaintiff had a right to be there, and defendant owed him the duty of ordinary care."

It is contended that this charge was erroneous because "(1) there is no allegation in the complaint that the place where plaintiff was injured was at a crossing by defendant's track of a street, highway, or traveled place; (2) that the passing to and fro by certain individuals gives the prescriptive right to use the alleged way, whereas such right can be obtained only where the public have used it; and (3) that, even assuming that the right to pass along or over said track existed, it did not give the right to stand and remain to talk upon the track as implied in said requests, and which was the position, the uncontradicted testimony shows, occupied by the plaintiff when he received the injuries complained of." If the facts hypothetically stated in the charge are accepted as established by the testimony, then we think it was correct to hold that plaintiff was not a bald trespasser, but a licensee to whom the defendant owed the duty of exercising ordinary care not to injure him. This is especially true when considered with respect to the undisputed fact that the track was within the inclosed yard of the Marlboro Mill Company.

Error is assigned in charging the following request by plaintiff: "(4) If the jury believe from the testimony that the agents of the defendant failed to ring the bell or blow the whistle or give other signals of approach of the train on entering the millyard and crossing a known road, then the defendant was guilty of negligence or gross negligence, according to the consciousness of said employes as to whether or not they were failing to discharge a known duty." The specifications of error are: (1) That a failure to ring the bell or blow the whistle on entering the millyard or crossing a known road was declared to be negligence per se, whereas such failure is negligence per se only when the train approaches the crossing of a street, highway, or traveled place; (2) that such failure, when consciously done, is only a circumstance to show gross negligence; (3) that the charge was not responsive to the complaint. The request was charged subject to the modifications of the general charge, and must be construed with such general charge on the subject, which was as follows: "Now the law requires a railroad train when it comes to a public crossing or traveled place or street where the highway or traveled place crosses the railroad, or where the public has a right to cross, it requires them when within 500 yards of such street, highway, or traveled place to ring a bell or blow a whistle, and keep that up continuously within 500 yards of the crossing and be continued until the engine passes over it, and, if any one is injured at a public crossing by the failure of the railroad company, its agents, or servants to ring the bell or blow the whistle until the engine has passed over the crossing, the law says that that is negligence per se, but that only applies to a traveled place, a public highway, or street where it crosses the railroad, or at a place where the public has crossed and recrossed and used for passage notoriously and adversely for a period of twenty years, and, if they have used it in that way for that length of time, they have acquired a right to cross there." This modification of plaintiff's fourth request to charge brought it in harmony with defendant's view of the law as expressed in its requests to charge on that subject, all of which requests of defendant were given to the jury without modification.

It is excepted that the court erred in charging plaintiff's fifth request as follows: "If the jury believe from the testimony that the defendant's agents failed to give the signal required by statute for public crossings near the accident, then such evidence is competent to support the allegations of reckless negligence." We do not regard this as a charge on the facts as alleged in the exception, but as a statement of the rule of evidence in Mack v. Railway and Mason v. Railway, supra. This is clearly shown by the following from the general charge: "Where a case is brought and there is any allegation or proof that the party was injured at a crossing, and they allege wantonness or willfulness on the part of the agents and servants of the company in injuring him, the party injured would have the right to show as a circumstance to go to the jury that they did not ring the bell or blow the whistle within 500 yards of the crossing, and that goes to the jury as a circumstance to be considered by them as to whether there was a willful disregard of the law or invasion of the rights of the party injured."

It is further alleged that the court erred in charging plaintiff's thirteenth request as follows: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the track upon which plaintiff is alleged to have been injured is upon the property of the cotton mill and the plaintiff was an employé in and about said mill, then the plaintiff had a right to be on said track and the defendant owed him the duty of ordinary care, and, if defendant failed to observe such care, then it would be liable in this action." It is objected that this charge was faulty in declaring that plaintiff under the facts stated "had a right to be on the track," not to pass over or along the same, and that too regardless of any business there. As we are satisfied upon the undisputed facts of this case that plaintiff was not a bald trespasser upon defendant's track, and that defendant was in duty bound to exercise ordinary care not to injure plaintiff in his situation within the inclosed millyard of his employer, the Marlboro Mill Company, we are not disposed to be very critical in reference to the language of the charge, since no real prejudice could arise therefrom.

The remaining exception complains of error, in that, while the court approved defendant's request to charge set forth in the exception subject to such modification as may be given in the general charge, this method of treating the requests to charge tended to mislead and confuse the jurors, and to cast upon them the duty of reconciling inconsistencies and contradictions, and that defendant's requests specified should have been charged unqualifiedly. This point has been already considered to some extent. It is fully met by the fact that the general charge fairly covered all the law applicable to the case and sought to be brought to the attention of the court by the requests. Indeed, in some particulars the charge to the jury was too favorable to the defendant, as for example, (1) in leaving it to the jury to determine whether plaintiff was trespasser or licensee at the time of the collision, when he could without error have declared that plaintiff was entitled to the care due to a licensee; (2) in charging as applicable to the case that the railroad has a right to run its cars wherever its tracks go and its employes have the right if they see a man on the track to presume that he will get out of the way of the cars.

The fundamental error in appellant's case is in supposing that the rule in Smalley v. Railway, supra, as applied to a trespasser on the track of the railway company, is applicable in this case where the track was in the private yard of another. The doctrine that a railroad company has a right to presume that a mature person apparently in the use of his faculties and on the railroad track without license will get off the track on the approach of the train rests upon the railroad company's right of exclusive ownership and control, and the trespasser's knowledge that he has no right to use the track. But the case is different when the railroad company is itself a licensee operating within the private yard of another having control of the premises. In such case those having a right to be in the yard and accustomed to use the track in their business dealings with the owner of the yard have as much right to presume that the railroad company will exercise ordinary care in operating within the yard as the railroad company has to presume that persons therein will give them a clear track.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

HARVEY v. CITY OF ELKINS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 16, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 41*) — DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—AFFECTING REAL PROPERTY—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

This court will entertain an appeal from a decree, rendered by a circuit court in an injunction proceeding, refusing to dissolve and perpetuating a temporary injunction affecting the use and enjoyment of real property, notwithstanding the value of the realty involved may be less than $100.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 153; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 601*)—PERMISSION TO ALTER BUILDING—UNREASONABLE REFUSAL.

Where a city council, acting under authority of the city charter (Acts 1901, p. 420, c. 151), and the general law (Code 1906, § 1868), which empowers it "to provide for the regular building of houses or other structures and to provide for the kind of material to be used in the construction thereof," and "to make regulations guarding against danger or damage by fire," passes an ordinance requiring permission to be obtained from such city council before a property owner can "alter, change or repair" a building already erected, and under such ordinance refuses permission to the owner of a house to make such minor alterations, changes, and repairs, as the replacing of windows and doors, the removing and relocation of partition walls on the inside of the house, the repapering of the walls, and the painting of the outside walls, such refusal is unwarranted and unreasonable, and the ordinance will not be construed as authorizing the city to withhold permission to make such minor and necessary repairs, and the municipal officers may be enjoined from preventing the making of such alterations, changes, and repairs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Bill by M. H. Harvey against the City of Elkins and others. Decree for complainant, and defendant City appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel T. Spears, for appellant. W. B. Maxwell, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. Mrs. M. H. Harvey is the owner of a one-story wooden building in the city of Elkins. It had been occupied by the sheriff as an office, and in March, 1907, the front door, one window, and a part of the wall were taken out in order to remove a large safe used by the sheriff. Immediately thereafter G. B. Harvey, the husband of plaintiff, proceeded to replace the front of the building so removed, putting in a larger window in the front. He was notified by the chief of police that, if he persisted in making such repairs without permission from the city council, he would be arrested. On the 21st day of March, 1907, and after he was threatened with arrest, he applied to the city council for permission, stating in his application such repairs as he desired to make, which were the repair of the front of the house as above stated, the changing of a partition inside of the building, the repapering of the wall inside, the changing of his electric lights, and the painting of the building on the outside. Permission to do this was refused. He again, on April 4, 1907, applied to the council for permission to replace the front of the building in the same manner in which it was just before the part of the front had been torn away, and to replace the door and window which had been removed, and also asked permission to relocate a partition on the inside, to paper the walls, to rearrange the electric lights, and to paint the building on the outside. Permission to do these things was also denied. Mrs. Harvey thereupon applied to the circuit court of Randolph county, then in session, on the 26th day of April, 1907, for an injunction to restrain and inhibit the city of Elkins, and its officers, from interfering with her having such repairs made, and on this bill, verified and further supported by affidavits, a temporary injunction was granted. On the same day the city of Elkins appeared and demurred to and answered the bill, and gave notice that it would move to dissolve the injunction. Motion to dissolve was made, and by agreement the case was heard upon the bill and exhibits, answer and general replication thereto, and affidavits filed with the bill, and on the hearing the court perpetuated the injunction. From that decree the city of Elkins has appealed to this court.

The record presents two questions only: First, whether or not this court has jurisdiction to entertain the appeal; second, whether or not the city of Elkins had the right under its charter to deny plaintiff the right to make the repairs above mentioned.

In regard to the first question, it is contended by counsel for appellee that, as the pecuniary value of the property in question is not shown, this court has not jurisdiction of the appeal; but the question concerns the free use and enjoyment of real estate, and the whole matter is disposed of by the decree perpetuating the injunction. It adjud-cates the principle of the cause. A decree refusing to dissolve an injunction, in such a case, is appealable without regard to the pecuniary amount involved. We therefore entertain the appeal. Chapter 135, § 1, cl. 7, Code (section 4038, Code 1906); Robrecht v. Wharton, 29 W. Va. 746, 2 S. E. 793. The case of Carskadon v. Board of Education, 61 W. Va. 468, 56 S. E. 834, on which appellee relies to show want of jurisdiction, is not similar to this one, and does not govern. In that case the board had let, by contract, a certain schoolhouse to one Radcliff for the purpose of delivering lectures during six nights at the price of $10 per night. Carskadon, suing on behalf of himself and other taxpayers of the district, obtained an injunction which was later perpetuated, and the board of education appealed. All the rent that the board was to get for the use of the schoolhouse was $60. The court held that it involved only a pecuniary question, and, the amount being less than $100, the appeal had been improvidently granted. In the present case the question is not a pecuniary one. As the matter concerns appellant, it is a question of its right to pass and enforce a city ordinance, which it insists is lawful and reasonable, and from the view point of the appellee it concerns her right to make certain repairs on and in her house, free from interference by the city authorities, without which repairs she cannot enjoy the use of her property. As the statute now allows an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve, as well as from an order dissolving, an injunction, the right to an appeal in a case where the whole matter is disposed of on the merits by a decree disposing of the temporary injunction would seem to be mutual; and no one, we think, would question Mrs. Harvey's right to appeal from the decree if it had dissolved the injunction, because such a decree would, in effect, have denied her the beneficial use of her property.

Second. Is the ordinance complained of susceptible of the construction which the council has given it? Acts 1901, p. 430, c. 151, § 28, amending the charter of the city of Elkins, among other things, empowers the council "to provide for the regular building of houses or other structures and to provide for the kind of material to be used in the construction thereof; * * * and generally to have power to take such measures as are deemed necessary or advisable to protect persons and property, public or private within the city." Section 42 of said act further preserves to the city "all the rights, powers and responsibilities" which it had prior to this act; that is, such rights and powers as were granted to it under chapter 47 of the Code of 1906. By section 28 of chapter 47 (Code 1906, § 1868), the council of cities is empowered "to make regulations guarding against danger or damage by fire." Pursuant to authority thus granted, the council passed the following ordinance (No. 12): "Any person desiring to erect a new building of any kind, or to alter, change or repair any building of any kind heretofore erected shall submit to the council the general plan of such new building and the purposes for which it is proposed to use the same, or if it is proposed to change, alter or repair an old building the specifications shall state the nature of such proposed change, the purposes for which the old building was used and the purpose to which it is intended to use it after such change is made and in either event shall designate the street, alley, road, lot or land on which it is proposed to erect such new building or upon which the old building stands and shall do no work whatever upon any such building until a permit has been obtained from the city council."

In the case of Christie v. Malden, 23 W. Va. 667, the law on this subject is thus stated: "A municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers, and no other: (1) Those granted in express words by its charter or the general statutes under which it is incorporated; (2) those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers thus expressly granted; and (3) those essential to the declared purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable." See, also, City of Newton v. Belger, 143 Mass. 598, 10 N. E. 494; First National Bank of Mt. Vernon v. Sarlls, 129 Ind. 201, 28 N. E. 484, 13 L. R. A. 481, 28 Am. St. Rep. 185. "The courts will review the question as to the reasonableness of ordinances passed under a grant of power general in its nature or under incidental or implied municipal powers, and if any given ordinance is found unreasonable will declare it void as a matter of law." McQuillin on Munic. Ord. § 182, and authorities there cited; Christie v. Malden, supra. The same rules which govern in the construction and interpretation of an act of the Legislature will apply and govern in the determination of the true intent and meaning of a city ordinance, and this court has said that: "Whenever an act of the Legislature can be so construed and applied as to avoid conflict with a constitutional provision, and give it the force of law, such construction will be adopted." Typewriter Co. v. Piggott, 60 W. Va. 533, 55 S. E. 664.

So, by analogy, whenever a city ordinance can be so construed and applied as to avoid a conflict with natural, fundamental, and necessary rights of property, and thus give it the force of law, such construction will be adopted. Applying this rule of construction to the ordinance in question, and comparing it with the law authorizing the city "to provide for the regular building of houses or other structures and to provide for the kind of material to be used in the construction thereof; * * * and generally to have power to take such measures as are deemed necessary or advisable to protect persons and property, public or private within the city"—we would not undertake to say that the city of Elkins has not the power to pass such an ordinance. But our conclusion is that upon the facts presented in the present case the city has made an unreasonable application of it. It would be both unjust and unreasonable to permit a city, by virtue of such an ordinance, to deny to one of its citizens the right to make the repairs above enumerated. Such repairs are not only necessary to the preservation of the property itself, but the health and comfort of the occupants as well.

We find no error in the decree appealed from, and affirm it, with costs and damages to appellee.

HOWELL v. HARVEY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 16, 1909.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 156*)—PLEADING—NECESSITY.

The statute of frauds may be relied on as a defense under the plea of non assumpsit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 156.*]

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 23*)—ORIGINAL OR COLLATERAL PROMISE.

If a person make an oral promise to pay the debt of another in order to derive some benefit to himself thereby, which he did not otherwise have, such promise is an original undertaking and not within the statute of frauds; and in such case it matters not if the original promisor be not released.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

3. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF (§ 23*)—ORIGINAL OR COLLATERAL PROMISE.

P. contracted to build a house for Harvey, and sublet a part of the job to Howell, who did a portion of it and quit because P. failed to pay him. Harvey told Howell to go on and finish the work and he would pay him. Howell completed the job, and Harvey refused to pay him. In an action on the oral promise, held, that the promise is an original one, and therefore not within the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

4. DECISION DISAPPROVED.

The case of Noyes' Ex'r v. Humphreys, 11 Grat. (Va.) 636, considered and disapproved.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Cabell County. Assumpsit by A. C. Howell against H. C. Harvey, executor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Brown, Jackson & Knight, T. W. Peyton, and Thos. H. Harvey, for plaintiff in error. George I. Neall and Holt & Duncan, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. W. W. Peyton contracted with H. C. Harvey in May, 1899, to build a house for him on the corner of Third avenue and Tenth street, in the city of Huntington, W. Va. Peyton sublet a part of the work to A. C. Howell, who proceeded with his part of the work until June 22, 1899, when his men quit work because Peyton had not paid him. Peyton failed. Harvey was away from home when the men ceased work. Howell says that on Harvey's return to Huntington he asked Howell why the work was not going on, and he replied that Peyton had not paid him, and he could not pay his men, and they had quit. He further says that Harvey told him: "For God's sake, go on with this work. Finish this post office building. If you don't do it, it will ruin us." Three others testified to substantially the same conversation, and that Harvey told Howell he would pay him; one of them, that he said "he would pay him every cent." Harvey denied making any such statement. At this time Peyton owed Howell on the subcontract something over $600. On the 24th day of June, 1899, the day of this alleged conversation, Harvey paid Howell $600, but says he did so on a written order from Peyton, which order was identified and filed as evidence. Howell completed the work about the 10th of August, 1899; and, Harvey refusing to pay him, he sued him in assumpsit in the circuit court of Cabell county upon his oral promise, on the 22d day of January, 1902. One W. M. Mertens, who had furnished material to Peyton to be used in the construction of the house, filed his bill in the circuit court of Cabell county on the 26th day of December, 1899, to enforce his mechanic's, or materialman's, lien, and made Harvey, Peyton, Howell, and others defendants to the bill. Howell answered and averred his contract with Peyton, filed a statement of his account against Peyton showing a balance due him of $788.12, sought to enforce his mechanic's lien against Harvey's property, and prayed for a personal decree against Peyton. The itemized account, verified by Howell's affidavit, was exhibited with his bill. He also served notice of his lien upon Harvey. This suit was referred to a commissioner, who reported that Harvey was not indebted to Peyton, but that, after allowing Harvey the "liquidated and unliquidated damages" to which he was entitled against him, Peyton was indebted to Harvey in the sum of $18.71. Howell was surety on Peyton's bond to Harvey for the faithful performance of his contract. The circuit court held Howell's claim to be invalid as a lien, but some other mechanics' liens were decreed to be good. From the final decree in the case, H. C. Harvey and another appealed, and on review of the cause by this court the decree of the lower court was reversed, and the plaintiff's bill dismissed for want of equity, but without prejudice to the rights of the parties claiming to hold mechanics' liens to sue Peyton at law. See Mertens v. Cassini Mosaic & Tile Co., 53 W. Va. 192, 44 S. E. 241. The present action was brought in January, 1902, but the trial was delayed pending the determination of the appeal in the Mertens suit, which was decided by this court in April, 1903. Trial of this action was had, and on the 5th day of July, 1905, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $847.37, with interest and cost, upon defendant's demurrer to the evidence. It is now before us upon writ of error awarded to defendant.

Defendant relies upon the statute of frauds, although he has not pleaded it specially. In some jurisdictions it must be specially pleaded; but in this state and in Virginia it is not necessary, when the defendant has by plea, or answer, denied the contract declared on. This is an action of assumpsit, and the defendant has pleaded to the general issue. The plea of non assumpsit is broader in its scope than most other pleas, and under it defendant may invoke the statute of frauds. Hogg's Pl. & Forms, § 220; Rowton v. Rowton, 1 H. & M. 92; Fleming v. Holt, 12 W. Va. 143; Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. 220, s. c. 35 W. Va. 103, 12 S. E. 1108. The case having been decided upon a demurrer to evidence, the testimony of plaintiff and his other witnesses in regard to the oral contract, made between him and defendant after the work had been partly performed, must be taken as true. This, then, proves the contract declared on in the special count.

The question then arises: Is the force of this evidence destroyed by the fact that, after the work had been fully performed, plaintiff sought to enforce his claim as a mechanic's lien in the Mertens chancery suit? We think not. We do not think his unsuccessful efforts, in that suit, are inconsistent with his present action. It was a circumstance to be considered by the jury in determining whether or not plaintiff had actually released this defendant from his oral promise; but, if there was a consideration to support the promise, there certainly was none supporting a release from it. If this defendant was bound on his oral promise to plaintiff, it was upon a new consideration moving from plaintiff to him, and such promise need not, necessarily, have released the original contractor, Peyton, from his obligation to him. If the defendant was bound, then they were both bound to plaintiff, until he is paid. In the case of McLaughlin v. Austin, 104 Mich. 489, 62 N. W. 719, which is a case almost identical with this one, the Supreme Court of Michigan, said: "It is possible for one to make a valid oral promise to pay a debt of another without releasing the original debtor, though it is not where the consideration moves to the original debtor alone."

* * * The fact that his claim of lien contained the sworn statement that he furnished material and labor in pursuance of a contract with Jones was proper evidence to be considered by the jury in determining whether the work was done in reliance upon a new undertaking with the defendant, but is not conclusive that it was not so done." See, also, the following additional authorities: Mallory v. Gillett, 21 N. Y. 412; Leonard v. Vrendenburgh, 8 Johns. (N. Y.) 29, 5 Am. Dec. 317; White v. Rintoul, 108 N. Y. 222, 15 N. E. 318; Nelson v. Boynton, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 396, 37 Am. Dec. 148. This fact was a matter of evidence for the jury on the question of plaintiff's intention to release defendant, and they must have resolved that question in favor of plaintiff.

Counsel for plaintiff in error also insist that the fact that plaintiff was surety on Peyton's bond to defendant is a matter entitled to great weight to show that plaintiff was not induced to complete the work because of defendant's promise, but that he did it to relieve himself from a liability greater than his loss of pay for services. This, also, was only an evidential fact to be considered by the jury on the question of intention, and, if this liability still existed at the time of this action, defendant had a right to recoup damages against this plaintiff resulting from his insolvent principal's failure to carry out his contract; but this he did not do. The jury has found by its verdict that defendant made the promise declared on, and that plaintiff, by his subsequent unsuccessful effort to enforce his claim as a lien, did not release defendant from his promise; and, this finding being supported by the evidence, we think the court did right in refusing to set aside the verdict, unless as a matter of law the defendant is not bound by his oral promise to plaintiff. This question depends upon whether or not the promise was to answer for the debt of another, and is therefore not actionable. The statute of frauds is one noted for its brevity and the terseness of its language, yet it has claimed the attention of the courts of last resort, both in this country and in England, more often perhaps than any other law. It is practically the same in all the states. It was enacted to relieve persons and their estates against false and fictitious claims, by requiring the highest order of proof to establish liability in cases where it is sought to recover against a person as the mere voluntary surety or guarantor of another; but it has been perhaps as frequently invoked to avoid just liability as it has been relied upon to protect against injustice. The courts have said that it shall not be perverted and made the instrument of accomplishing a wrong, and have therefore in the vast majority of cases construed it to have no application in those cases where there is a consideration supporting the oral promise to answer for the debt or obligation of another, other than the release of the original obligor, or the extinguishment of the old debt, or promise. If the promisor derives a benefit from his oral promise which he did not otherwise have, his promise becomes a new and original one, and falls not within the purview of the statute. The rule by which to determine whether a promise is original, or collateral and without consideration, is thus stated in 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 929. "An absolute promise to pay the debt of another is not within the statute, though the liability of the original debtor still subsists, where the leading object of the promisor is to subserve some pecuniary interest or business purpose of his own, and he receives a benefit which he did not before enjoy, and would not have possessed but for the promise."

In support of the text a large number of authorities are cited, among them, the case of Emerson v. Slater, 22 How. 28, 16 L. Ed. 360, which seems to be a leading case upon the subject. That case is so very similar to the one now under consideration that we think it well to state it. The plaintiff, Emerson, had been employed by a railroad company to build certain bridges. The company failed to make payments according to agreement, and Emerson refused to proceed with the work. The defendant was a large stockholder in the road and had leased to it large quantities of railroad iron and held an assignment of the earnings of the road to secure payments on his lease. The road could not operate, and there could be no earnings, until the bridges were completed. Under these circumstances, the defendant orally promised to pay plaintiff, if he would go on and complete the bridges, which he did. Defendant refused to comply with his oral promise, and plaintiff brought assumpsit. The court held his oral promise to be binding, and stated the law to be that: "Whenever the main purpose and object of the promisor is, not to answer for another, but to subserve some pecuniary or business purpose of his own, involving either a benefit to himself, or damage to the other contracting party, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing that liability." The opinion further says: "Nothing is better settled than the rule that if there is a benefit to the defendant, and a loss to the plaintiff consequential upon and directly resulting from the defendant's promise in behalf of the plaintiff, there is a sufficient consideration moving from the plaintiff to enable the latter to maintain an action upon the promise to recover compensation."

The case of Myers v. Dorman, 34 Hun (N. Y.) 115, is even stronger in support of the rule, if any difference, than the one last above referred to. There Myers, the plaintiff, Stephen Dorman, the defendant, and one Taylor had each recovered several judgments against one J. L. Dorman, which aggregated $1,839.87, on which executions were issued. The sheriff had levied upon the goods of J. L. Dorman under prior executions amounting to $2,432.55. On the day of sale it was agreed among these three judgment creditors of J. L. Dorman that if Myers and Taylor should refrain from bidding and permit Stephen Dorman, the defendant, to purchase the stock of goods, he would pay them the amount of their judgments against J. L. Dorman. The defendant did purchase the goods at $2,440, and thereafter refused to pay the judgments of the other two men, whereupon Myers sued him. The jury found that this agreement was not made with any fraudulent intent, and the court held that the agreement was not within the statute of frauds because: "(1) He had not pleaded it as a defense to the agreement which was set out in the complaint. (2) His agreement was founded upon a new consideration, viz., the promise of the plaintiff and Taylor not to bid at a sale." The court in its opinion says: "The case is not within the statute, for the reason that the defendant's promise to pay the debt of the judgment debtor was founded upon a new consideration, to wit, the promise of the plaintiff and Taylor above stated."

The case of Wills v. Outler et al., 61 N. H. 405, is also very much in point. In that case it appears that Otterson & Co., who were carrying on a foundry business, became embarrassed for want of funds, and made a sale and transfer of their business to the defendants. At the time of this sale, there were back wages due a large number of men employed in the foundry. Learning of the sale, they refused to go on with the work unless provision was made for their pay, whereupon one Mr. Reed, a member of the defendant firm, met a number of the men who had collected at the foundry and told them that: "If they would go to work again as before, the defendants would pay them the same wages that they had been receiving, payments to be made at the end of each week, and also the amount of the arrears due them for November on the 15th of January and one half of the amount of the arrears for December on the 15th of February, and the other half on the 15th of March, following." On a suit brought by one of the workmen for the money due from the old firm, the court held the new firm liable, holding that the defendants' liability was on an original contract founded on a new consideration, and was not within the statute of frauds. The same principle had been declared in the case of Britton v. Angier, 49 N. H. 420, following the case of Emerson v. Slater, supra, to which the court refers as a leading case.

Elkin v. Timlin, 151 Pa. 491, 25 Atl. 139, is a case in which the defendant had agreed to sell his own interest and the interest of his co-tenant in a tract of land to plaintiff, and when he presented the deed of his co-tenant for his interest plaintiff refused to accept it, fearing there might be judgments against such co-tenant; and the defendant, to induce him to take the deed, agreed orally to pay all the judgments of his co-tenant. The judgments did exist, and he refused to pay them, and plaintiff sued. The court held that this promise was not within the statute of frauds, but was a new promise supported by a consideration which moved directly to the promisor.

It could hardly be supposed, in this case, that the oral promise of the defendant had the effect to release the judgment debtor. In Hale v. Stewart, 76 Mo. 20, Stewart held a note against one Ide for $650 secured by a deed of trust upon Ide's property. Stewart afterwards assigned this note without recourse to Hale. Hale objected to the manner of assignment, whereupon Stewart agreed orally that, if the note was not paid at maturity, he would pay it. There was a prior incumbrance upon the same land for which it was later sold. Stewart wanted to buy the land, but did not want to bid at the public sale, and promised Hale that, if he would attend the sale and buy it in for him, he would pay off the aforesaid note. Hale attended the sale and bought the land at the price of $600 and had the trustee to make a deed to Stewart, and Stewart took possession of the land. The $600, at which price Hale bid in the land, was credited on the note of Ide to Stewart which he had indorsed without recourse to Hale. Stewart refusing to pay the note, Hale brought suit, and defendant relied upon the statute of frauds. The court held that the promise was not within the statute of frauds, and that it was Stewart's new and original promise based on the consideration that Hale should attend the sale and buy the land for him.

The facts in the case of Oldenburg et al. v. Dorsey, 102 Md. 172, 62 Atl. 576 (5 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 841, and note), are very similar to the case under review, and the decision in that case supports our opinion on the following propositions, viz.: (1) Harvey's oral promise is an original and binding one; (2) both Harvey and Peyton were bound to Howell as original promisors; and (3) that Harvey had a right to recoup damages in this action, if he had suffered any, on account of Peyton's failure to comply with his contract on which Howell was his surety. However, Harvey made no effort to recoup damages.

The case of Crawford v. Edison, 45 Ohio St. 239, 18 N. E. 80, is another case very much in point. The second point of the syllabus, which seems to combine both the law and the facts of the case, is as follows: "S. agreed with C. to furnish the material and build him a house for a specified amount. S. employed E. to put on the roof, eave troughs, and conductor pipes, for a stipulated sum, to be paid when the work should be completed. When E. had done about two-thirds of the work, S. abandoned the job and left the county, without having paid E., or provided for his payment. E. then informed C. that he would not do any more work unless he was to be paid. Thereupon C. told E. to go on with his part of the work, and complete it, and he would pay him. E., accordingly, completed his job, and charged the amount to C. Held, C.'s promise was not collateral, to answer for the debt of another, but was an original one, for his own benefit, and unaffected by the statute of frauds." The opinion refers to the case of Emerson v. Slater, supra. A similar case also is the case of Clifford v. Lühring, 69 Ill. 401.

The case of Hooper v. Hooper, 82 W. Va. 526, 9 S. E. 987, is very much in point. In that case it appears that Chas. E. Hooper owed one Hamilton $1,000. Said Hooper sold a stock of goods to one Casteel for $1,000 and took in payment a lot in the town of Grafton which, at said Hooper's request, was conveyed by Casteel to Hooper's father, who, in consideration of the conveyance, promised to pay his son's debt to Hamilton. The father's promise was held to be original and binding; but, notwithstanding the father's binding promise, the son was not thereby discharged of his obligation to Hamilton. See the opinion prepared by Brannon, J., pages 534 to 538 of 82 W. Va., pages 940, 942, of 9 S. E. See, also, Young v. French, 85 Wis. 111; Swayne v. Hill, 59 Neb. 652, 81 N. W. 855; Garvey v. Crouch (Ky.) 85 S. W. 273; Kutzmeyer v. Ennis, 27 N. J. Law, 371; Bailey v. Marshall, 174 Pa. 602, 34 Atl. 326; Borchsenius v. Canutuson, 100 Ill. 82; Patterson v. Mills, 21 Kan. 163; Carragher v. Allen, 112 Iowa, 168, 83 N. W. 902; Board of Com'rs v. Steam Heating Co., 128 Ind. 247, 27 N. E. 612, 12 L. R. A. 502. The Indiana court in its opinion in the case last cited relies on the case of Emerson v. Slater, supra.

Counsel for defendant relies upon the case of Noyes' Ex'x v. Humphreys, 11 Grat. (Va.) 636, which is, indeed, very similar to the case under review. Noyes was the owner of certain salt property and leased the same to one Thompson for 10 years, reserving a large rent. Thompson undertook to make extensive improvements upon the property and employed one Humphreys to do the work. Humphreys did a great deal of the work, and Thompson failed to pay him, and he said he would quit if he was not paid. Noyes, desiring that the work should proceed, said to Humphreys: "Go on and finish it. I will pay you for it." Humphreys then completed the work; Noyes attending and giving directions during its progress through several months. Thompson and Humphreys thereupon had a settlement, and it was ascertained that there was a balance due Humphreys of $454.78, for which Thompson executed his bond to Humphreys payable in nine months. Humphreys sued Noyes on his oral promise. Judge Allen, in discussing the case, says: "Original undertakings need not be in writing, not being within the statute. The difficulty is in determining under which head the undertaking in any particular case is to be classed. Where the party undertaken for is under no original liability, the promise is an original promise, and binding though not in writing. The promisor is the party immediately liable, and the undertaking is to pay or answer for his own debt or default, and not for another's." In view of the facts, as they appear from the opinion in Noyes' Ex'x v. Humphreys, and in view of the many decisions hereinbefore referred to, we fail to see why the court did not decide the case otherwise than it did, because, tested by the great weight of authorities, there was a new consideration moving from Humphreys to Noyes which ought to have made Noyes' promise an original one. We do not controvert the principle of law announced by the court in that case and in other Virginia decisions therein referred to; but we think the principle was incorrectly applied to the facts in that case, as we understand them from reading the opinion, and we do not feel inclined to follow that decision in opposition to so many other reputable authorities.

The case of Radliff v. Poundstone, 23 W. Va. 724, is also cited by counsel for plaintiff in error as authority on the question of Harvey's nonliability on his oral promise; but the facts in that case are very different from the facts in the present case, and it does not govern. The material facts in that case, briefly stated, are these: Radliff owed Poundstone and his wife $3,350, for which he had executed his note payable to them jointly; but the proof showed, and the court held, that the wife of Poundstone was the beneficial owner of the entire debt, so that in applying the law the debt must be viewed as if the note had been executed to the wife alone. Some time after this note was given, Radliff and Poundstone formed a partnership for the purpose of buying and selling coal, and each was to furnish an equal amount of money. Radliff was to advance the money necessary to commence the business, and, as the bill alleges, did advance $8,600. Radliff says that there was an agreement between them that one-half the money so advanced was to be charged against said note, and that the wife of Poundstone orally assented to this arrangement. The wife denied the alleged agreement on her part, or that she had any knowledge of it, and set up her title to the entire amount of the note. This statement shows clearly that there could have been no consideration for the wife's promise, assuming that she made it. The promise was not an inducement to the partnership, for it had already been formed. There had been no release of the husband from his promise, as one of the partners, to bear one-half the expense, for the bill sought recovery from both Poundstone and his wife. The court, on page 732 of 23 W. Va., says: "Her promise therefore was not only without consideration, but it was collateral, and her husband continued bound."

When there is no new consideration for the promise, it follows, as a matter of course, that the only other consideration for the promise to pay the debt of another would be his release from the debt; otherwise the promise would be nudum pactum and void, even if it were in writing and signed by the promisor. Hence, it will be seen, in those cases where the courts have held that the release of the original promisor is essential to the validity of the new promise, that there was no consideration whatever for the promise. Gerow v. Riffe, 29 W. Va. 462, 2 S. E. 104; Mankins v. Jones, 63 W. Va. 373, 60 S. E. 248, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 214. But if the consideration is a benefit to the promisor, which accrued to him by virtue of the promise, it is an original undertaking, and not within the statute, whether the original promisor be released, or not. This is the test applied by the United States Supreme Court in Emerson v. Slater, supra, and also by this court in Hooper v. Hooper, supra.

It remains only to apply the test, or correct principle of law, to the facts in the present case. Is defendant's oral statement to plaintiff, to go on and finish the job and he would pay him, collateral, and therefore void; or is it original, and therefore binding? What was the new consideration? Plaintiff was a subcontractor with Peyton, who had failed on the job. There was no privity of contract between plaintiff and defendant on account of the original contract between Peyton and defendant. Plaintiff was bound to Peyton only to do the work which he had originally agreed to do, and when Peyton failed to pay him he had a right to quit, and did so; but defendant was anxious to have the building completed in order that he might have the use of his building, and by reason of his promise to plaintiff he was enabled to have his building completed. Here, then, was a benefit moving directly from the promisee to the promisor by virtue of his promise, which he did not have without such promise, and the new consideration was sufficient to support the promise to pay what was then due, as well as to pay for services to be thereafter rendered.

Finding no error in the judgment of the lower court, we affirm it.

BRANNON, J. (concurring). I have no objection to the judgment given by this court. I desire to say that, as I understand the intricate question of direct and collateral promise, where there is no benefit accruing to the promisor, the fact that the main debtor still is bound is a test, showing the promise of the new man to be collateral and not good without a writing; but, where a benefit goes to that new man, his promise is direct and binding without a writing, though the original debtor still remains bound. 29 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law, 929; Mankin v. Jones, 63 W. Va. 373, 60 S. E. 248, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 214.

DANIELS v. GILLESPIE.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 23, 1909.)

1. EQUITY (§ 44*)—JURISDICTION—CONCURRENCE.

Generally courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction of causes of action arising out of fraud, accident, or mistake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 141; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 313*)—SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—JURISDICTION—EQUITY.

Settlement of partnership accounts is within the exclusive jurisdiction of courts of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 729; Dec. Dig. § 313.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 311*)—JURISDICTION—FRAUD.

Though the law affords a remedy by action for fraud and deceit, perpetrated in effecting a settlement of partnership affairs, the jurisdiction of the law courts in such cases is not exclusive, and resort may be had to a court of equity to correct the settlement by surcharging and falsifying it as to certain items, or to set it aside wholly, and judicially settle the accounts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 723; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

4. PARTNERSHIP (§ 311*)—JURISDICTION—FRAUD.

The establishment of fraud on the part of one of the parties in stating an account between partners entitles the other to have it wholly set aside and restated in a court of equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 723; Dec. Dig. § 311.*]

5. PARTNERSHIP (§ 311*)—PRIVATE SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—FRAUD—RELIEF—RESTORATION.

If, in a private settlement of partnership accounts, fraud has been committed by one of the parties to the injury of the other, the latter may have relief in equity without restoring to the former what he received in the settlement.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, McDowell County.

Bill by W. C. Daniels against Gratton Gillespie. Decree for defendant, and complainant appeals. Reversed.

T. L. Henritze and Lawson Worrell, for appellant. D. J. F. Strother, D. E. French, and W. L. Taylor, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, J. W. C. Daniels brought this suit in the circuit court of McDowell county to set aside his purchase of his copartner's interest in a store, cancel his negotiable promissory notes given therefor, and settle and wind up the partnership business. The court on final hearing dismissed his bill, and he has appealed.

Prior to January 1, 1904, he owned a retail store at North Fork, in said county, and on that day sold an interest in it to the defendant Gratton (Grat) Gillespie. He put in his merchandise at a valuation of $11,148.

95. Within a year thereafter he paid into the business in some form $3,836.01 additional and Gillespie $2,028.13. Neither was to have any salary, and Daniels was to own three-fourths of the business and Gillespie the remaining fourth. The firm seems to have lost considerable money during the year; for in the following February the stock invoiced $8,163.16, there were accounts due the store amounting to $1,444.76, and debts due from it amounting to $10,513.60. On February 1, 1905, Daniels bought Gillespie's interest for the sum of $2,185, executing his three negotiable promissory notes therefor. On April 24, 1905, he brought this suit for the purpose above stated. His bill admits knowledge of firm losses at the time he bought and the clamor of creditors for payment of pastdue bills, and avers the purchase was made for the purpose of obtaining possession of the business, to the end that its exact condition might be ascertained and a settlement made without incurring the expense of a receivership. It says the plaintiff, on conferring with the defendant about the state of the business and attempting to purchase his interest, found the latter unwilling to agree to any equitable and just settlement. The latter threatened to bring a suit to dissolve the partnership and have a receiver appointed, and, rather than have this done, the plaintiff executed to him notes covering the amount he had put into the business, and so obtained possession. It charges the firm losses to alleged dishonesty and neglect of business on the part of the defendant, specifying numerous instances of such misconduct. The answer denies all these allegations, and evidence was adduced in support of both parties. The commissioner, after considering all of it, came to the conclusion that the defendant had clandestinely withdrawn from the business more than $1,200 in money, depositing it in his own name in two banks distant from the one in which the firm kept its deposits. He further finds the defendant was extravagant in his expenditures and habits, and negligent in business, but is unable to ascertain what sums were squandered by him. Being of the opinion, in view of these facts, that the contract of sale should be set aside, he stated and reported an account between the parties, showing that Daniels had sustained a loss of $554.34 in excess of the amount which he should bear. Twelve exceptions to this report were filed, and it was recommitted to give the defendant an opportunity to take further evidence to prove the money deposited by him as aforesaid had been derived from sources other than the social business. Additional evidence was taken, but the commissioner held it insufficient to justify a different conclusion from that at which he had previously arrived. But, perceiving a slight error in his calculations, he restated the account, and found that Daniels' loss, in excess of what he should have borne, was $561.84. Nineteen exceptions to this report were filed. On the hearing the court differed from the commissioner in respect to the weight of the evidence, and, sustaining exception No. 2 to the last report, based on insufficiency of evidence, as well as a number of others, subsidiary in character, dismissed the bill.

A cross-assignment of error, based on the overruling of the demurrer to the bill, raises the question of equity jurisdiction; adequacy of legal remedy by an action for damages being assigned as the reason for lack thereof. The authorities invoked for this proposition do not sustain it. In Childers v. Neeley, 47 W. Va. 70, 34 S. E. 828, 49 L. R. A. 468, 81 Am. St. Rep. 777, the partnership had been dissolved and a settlement made. The only matter alleged against the defendant was his failure to execute a bond of indemnity to the plaintiff. It appearing to the court that the partnership business had been settled, this was held conclusive in the absence of allegation and proof of any ground for setting it aside, such as accident, mistake, or fraud. The case of Mahnke v. Neale, 23 W. Va. 57, is very similar. Jurisdiction in equity to set aside a settlement for fraud is acknowledged in both cases. Relief was denied, not because the plaintiffs had invoked an inappropriate remedy, but because the allegations and proof were insufficient to justify the relief prayed. Crockett v. Burleson, 60 W. Va. 252, 54 S. E. 341, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263, merely declares jurisdiction at law to recover damages for fraud and deceit on the part of the defendant in the execution of a contract of dissolution and settlement. It does not deny jurisdiction in equity for rescission of a voidable contract and a settlement of the partnership business in equity. McAuley v. Cooley, 45 Neb. 583, 63 N. W. 871, is to the same effect. It is hardly necessary to remark that generally courts of law and equity have concurrent jurisdiction of causes predicated on fraud, accident, and mistake, nor that equity is the proper forum in which to obtain an accounting, dissolution, and settlement respecting a partnership. 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1054; 30 Cyc. 715. Such jurisdiction is not denied in the briefs of counsel as we read them. It is only insisted that the settlement effected between the parties by the purchase of the interest of one by the other gives an adequate remedy at law, and therefore precludes jurisdiction in equity. The authorities do not sustain this position. There is jurisdiction in equity to correct errors in accounts stated between partners by surcharging and falsifying the statement, and, when the plaintiff is entitled to wholly set aside the settlement made, he has the further right to a settlement in the same suit under the rules and principles prescribed by law and equity. Matters of account are per se within the scope of equity jurisdiction. 2 Story's Eq. Jur. § 441. In respect thereto courts of law and courts of equity have concurrent jurisdiction. Id. § 442; Tillar v. Cook, 77 Va. 477.

If the object of the suit were merely to prevent collection of the notes by establishing fraud in the procurement thereof or failure of consideration, in whole or in part, it seems clear that these matters of defense might be set up in a court of law, and there might be no jurisdiction in equity; but the relief sought by the bill does not stop with this. It goes entirely beyond the mere matter of defense, and includes a settlement of the partnership affairs. When a stated account between partners is vitiated by fraud or involves a mistake affecting the whole thereof, it is set aside and a new settlement and statement made; but, if the mistake does not go to the entire account and is limited to certain items, correction is made by surcharging or falsifying or both, according to the nature of the errors, all items except the erroneous one being allowed to stand. The establishment of fraud in respect to any item or part of the account, unlike mistake as to an item or items, impeaches the entire settlement. Allfrey v. Allfrey, 1 Mac. & G. 87; Williamson v. Barbour, 9 Ch. D. 529; Gething v. Keighley, 9 Ch. D. 547, 550; Lindley, Part. 969, bottom p. 1256; Collyer, Part. § 298.

We do not stop to discuss so plain a proposition as that the purchase or settlement, whichever it may be termed, may be set aside on allegation and proof of fraud on the part of the defendant; but a matter worthy of consideration is whether the plaintiff, having obtained possession of the property by this purchase, and desiring to set aside the contract for fraud, must restore the property to the possession of the defendant or admit him to joint possession and control thereof as a condition precedent to relief, and the authorities answer this proposition in the negative. Oliver v. House, 125 Ga. 637, 54 S. E. 732; Wallace v. Sisson (Cal.) 33 Pac. 496; Elfelt v. Hart (C. C.) 1 Fed. 264; Abrahams v. Hunt, 26 Pa. 49. "A partner who has been defrauded into a private settlement may institute a suit for a judicial accounting without rescinding the settlement and putting the defrauding partner in statu quo." 30 Cyc. 713. The reason for differentiating such a case from one of rescission of a contract of purchase between strangers is apparent. Before the sale each had right of possession, and the possession of each was the possession of the other. By giving notice of election to rescind the purchaser virtually puts the seller in statu quo, except that he expects to retain the assets at their real value, with assent of the other party, without relinquishing his right to a just and fair settlement of the accounts. Abrahams v. Hunt, cited, allows a partner to set aside a release executed to his co-partner by showing that the latter coerced the execution thereof by unjustly withholding the books and acting unfairly in other respects, and does not require him to restore what he obtained in the private settlement as a condition precedent. As has been stated, the bill charges the defendant with dishonesty and neglect of duty, specifying a number of instances, including the secret withdrawal and depositing of the firm's money in his own name, and avers the plaintiff's ignorance of such conduct at the time of his purchase. Plaintiff avers that since the dissolution he has learned that the "defendant was regularly systematically robbing him, not only during the period of said partnership, but prior thereto, while the said defendant was employed as a clerk or salesman in his business." A further averment of ignorance of the fraud reads as follows: "The amount paid by the plaintiff to the defendant (and for which notes were given) was paid without knowledge of the conduct of the said defendant." We do not doubt the sufficiency of these allegations. They charge the fraud and the plaintiff's ignorance thereof at the time of the dissolution and the settlement, specifically setting forth certain instances, and thus show the plaintiff was imposed upon in the settlement.

Enough has been stated to indicate that the vital questions in the case are (1) whether the evidence adduced by the plaintiff, considered alone, sustains the allegations of the bill; and (2), if it does, whether the evidence adduced by the defendant is sufficient to relieve him from the imputations of fraud thus cast upon him. Numerous witnesses testify to the reckless and dissolute conduct of the defendant. His habitual and persistent association with lewd women and reckless expenditures of money upon them and in other ways are abundantly shewn. Many specific instances of misconduct are related, but the one most clearly indicating fraudulent intent, and therefore the gravest and most serious as regards this case, is his conversion of money into a check in the name of a third party, and causing the check to be assigned to him, and then depositing it in his own name in a bank other than the one in which the firm money was kept. This is hardly reconcilable with any intent or purpose other than that of defrauding his partner. J. A. Jackson says Gillespie gave him $50 and asked him to go up to Mr. Toney's office and obtain the latter's check for that amount in his own name and bring it back to him, which was done. Toney says Jackson brought him the money and he gave the check, as requested, which came back to him, bearing the indorsements of Jackson and Gillespie, and showing it had passed through the Tazewell National Bank in which Gillespie made individual deposits. Gillespie offers no explanation of this. He merely says he does not remember anything about it. J. A. Lay testifies to having deposited $33 in the bank of Keystone for Gillespie, and to Gillespie's having requested him to make another deposit for him on another occasion. He further says he was in the store on one occasion when Gillespie told him he must send a check to the bank and sat down to write, saying he was writing to the bank, and, observing Daniels coming into the store, he arose and tore up the letter. The check he proposed to send away was a railroad check, amounting to ninety-odd dollars. C. B. Harman says Gillespie had $40 deposited with his wife for safe-keeping for a short period of time. Gillespie bought from T. P. Mason a locket in December, 1904, for the sum of $15 or $18, telling Mason not to let Daniels see it. He admitted having spent $75 on one trip to Bluefield. Witness after witness testifies to his having frequented houses of ill fame, having had lewd women in the store, and the loitering of that class of women in and about it. As he was a man of practically no means or property other than what he had invested in the store, it is perfectly manifest that he could not maintain himself in that sort of life, and at the same time accumulate deposits, without withdrawing money from the firm business. That he did this clandestinely and in a manner indicating fraudulent intent is disclosed by his having made the deposits in banks other than the one in which the firm deposits were made, his having failed to charge himself with the money on the books of the firm, and his having cautioned persons with whom he had financial transactions not to disclose them to his partner. The circumstances, viewed as a whole, are, we think, sufficient to establish the charge of fraud. After the report was recommitted to allow him to exculpate himself, he attempted to indicate the sources from which he derived some of the money deposited, but his attempted explanation relates only to deposits made prior to the formation of the partnership, and, as to these, is not very satisfactory. As to a deposit of $71 a check of W. C. Daniels, he says: "I don't remember what that was for." As to another check of Lester G. Toney, he said: "I don't remember what this other one was, $50." In fact, this is the check he procured by Jackson with money furnished him. There are several other items that he does not explain. As to a check of Aaron Catzen for $40, one of W. M. Kinsey for $35, and another of Lester G. Toney, he says nothing. Another check for $50, drawn by Aaron Catzen, he accounts for by saying he cashed it for Catzen, but does not say where he got the money with which to cash it and others he says he cashed. No explanation whatever is offered by him as to numerous and considerable deposits made after the 1st day of January, 1904, amounting to several hundred dollars. During all this time he charged himself on the books with only $32. This he explains by saying he had no occasion to buy much and had money for things he could not obtain in the store. A deposit of $108 in his name in the Keystone Bank was found. This, he says, was money belonging to Charles Harman and James Crawford, which he had collected as rent from their tenants. It appears that he did collect considerable money for them, but Harman says he had accounted for all of it except $60 which he claimed had been paid into the business of W. C. Daniels & Co. This statement of Harman's is not denied by him. This is sufficient to indicate the character of his testimony. Of it the commissioner said: "The defendant denies that he had misappropriated any of the partnership funds, and in general terms says that none of the money deposited in the bank by him as shown by the evidence of W. T. Gillespie belonged to the partnership or to the plaintiff. He is asked by his counsel to explain the different items set out in the statement filed with Gillespie's deposition as deposits made by him, and he explains and accounts for the various amounts deposited prior to the formation of the partnership, but he fails to explain a single item embraced within the partnership period. The commissioner in his former report charged the defendant with those deposits only, which were made during the continuance of the partnership, and he was not charged with a single item deposited prior to that date. His failure to explain a single item and to account for a single deposit made during the continuance of the partnership, and with which he was charged in the settlement adopted by the commissioner in his former report, is, in the mind of your commissioner, significant to say the least, and has the effect to confirm the commissioner's opinion as embodied in his former report, and he therefore adopts the theory of settlement heretofore adopted and reported, and asks that said former report be considered as part of this report, with the exceptions hereinafter noted. Some evidence was given by the defendant tending to show that he had some income other than that from the partnership business, but in the opinion of your commissioner he fails to show that he actually had such income from January 1, 1904, to February 1, 1905, the period of the partnership, but all the evidences of sales of cattle, farm products, etc., shows that these sales were made before or after this period. Your commissioner therefore finds that the evidence is insufficient to overcome the case heretofore made out, and upon which his former report was based."

After a careful examination of the evidence in question, we fully concur in the commissioner's estimate of it, from which it results that in our opinion the circuit court erred in sustaining the exceptions to his report. We have examined the report of the commissioner and the appellee's exceptions thereto, finding no errors therein to his prejudice. The account is not stated on correct principles, but the result is to the prejudice of Daniels, who does not complain of the commissioner's report, and asks a decree in conformity therewith. Therefore the decree complained of will be reversed, and a decree will be entered here, ordering the surrender and cancellation of the notes mentioned and described in the bill and proceedings, confirming the commissioner's report, and requiring the appellee, Gillespie, to pay to the appellant, Daniels, the sum of $561.84, with interest thereon from the 29th day of May, 1907, until paid, and costs in this court and the court below.

Reversed.

DENT v. PICKENS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Jan. 28, 1907. On Rehearing, March 23, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1198*)—REMAND—PROCEDURE BELOW.

When the appellate court has remanded a cause to the circuit court with directions as to the collection and application of certain funds, it is error for the circuit court to decree any of such funds to be applied otherwise than as so directed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4668; Dec. Dig. § 1198.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 747*)—CROSS-ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS.

When, on petition for an appeal from and supersedeas to a decree, a partial appeal only is allowed involving certain several sums required to be paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, and the court has erroneously allowed to and permitted the defendant to retain and apply to his own use another sum of the same fund, such error cannot be corrected on cross-assignment of error by the plaintiff claiming such sum, on the hearing of such partial appeal, but will only be corrected upon an independent appeal taken by the plaintiff.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County.

Bill by Susan C. Dent against Dever Pickens and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 59 W. Va. 274, 53 S. E. 154.

J. Hop Woods, for appellant. Fred O. Blue, for appellees.

McWHORTER, J. This is an appeal from so much of the decree of the circuit court of Barbour county entered in the cause of Dent v. Pickens on the 23d day of February, 1905, as confirmed and allowed to be retained by A. G. Dayton the sum of $376.97, being the residue of a sum of $1,721.21 which had been paid into the hands of said Dayton on the 22d day of April, 1892, by Commissioner Peck. In an opinion written in said cause, found in 46 W. Va. 378, 393, 33 S. E. 308, in remanding the cause to the circuit court, said court was directed "to refer the cause to a commissioner to ascertain and report what moneys due on the claims assigned by Dever Pickens from the parties mentioned in the amended bills as debtors to him, if any, have been paid since the filing of the first amended bill, by whom and to whom paid, and whether the $1,000 of the debt secured by the trust deed made by M. W. and Ledrue Coburn of October 21, 1885, secured to Dever Pickens, and mentioned in the said marriage contract as having been assigned to Mollie Pickens, has been paid to her since the filing of the first amended bill, and whether any or all of such moneys have been paid or not; that the court take proceedings to collect all such money as may not be shown, upon proper and sufficient evidence, to have been paid prior to the filing of the said first amended bill, to be collected from the persons who have since received it, or from the debtors who may not yet have paid what they owe; and that the same, as fast as collected, be applied to the judgment of appellant, until the same is satisfied"—the said sum of $1,721.21 being a part of the moneys referred to in the matters so to be referred to the commissioner and to be applied to plaintiff's judgment as fast as collected. After the case went back, the circuit court entered a decree therein on the 23d of February, 1905, wherein is contained, among other things, the following: "And it further appearing to the court from the pleadings and proofs herein, and from said decree of February 23, 1900, and from said report, that of the sum of $1,721.21, paid to the defendant Alston G. Dayton, attorney, on the 22d day of April, 1892, by Melville Peck, special commissioner, as recited in said decree, the said Dayton paid to the defendant Mollie Pickens (now Mollie Pickens-Martin) on the 12th day of May, 1892, the sum of $1,000 and on the 6th day of June, 1892, the further sum of $69.24, to the defendant John J. Davis on the 21st day of May, 1892, as counsel fees against the defendant Dever Pickens, the sum of $125; to the defendant John Bassel on the 26th day of May, 1892, as counsel fees * * * against said defendant Dever Pickens, the sum of $150, and the residue, to wit, $376.97, he retained for himself as counsel fees against said defendant Dever Pickens, and that all of said payments of said sum of $1,721.21, and the amount thereof so retained by said defendant A. G. Dayton were severally paid and retained after the filing of the plaintiff's first amended bill herein at the September rules of this court, 1889, upon which process issued upon the 31st day of August, 1889, whereby and by reason of plaintiff's execution, as determined by said affirmed decree of February 23, 1900, liens were created upon said sum of $1,721.21 in behalf of plaintiff's demand herein in the hands of said defendant A. G. Dayton, who paid out the same to the persons aforesaid, except the amount thereof retained by himself de son tort, with respect to which so retained by himself it appears that an attorney's lien in his behalf existed previously by reason of his relation as attorney to the original debt in favor of the defendant Dever Pickens, of which said sum of $1,721.21 is parcel, secured by the deed of trust dated December 21, 1885, to himself and said James Pickens as trustees, executed by the defendants M. W. Coburn and Ledrue Coburn, in said antenuptial contract mentioned. It is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that said A. G. Dayton and said Mollie Pickens do pay to the plaintiff the said sum of $1,000, with interest thereon from said 12th day of May, 1892, and the said sum of $69.24, with interest thereon from said 6th day of June, 1892; that said A. G. Dayton and John J. Davis do pay to the plaintiff the said sum of $125, with interest thereon from said 21st day of May, 1892; that said A. G. Dayton and John Bassel do pay to the plaintiff said sum of $150, with interest thereon from said 26th day of May, 1892, and that leave be given the plaintiff to sue out several executions therefor, and that when the same, or either of them, are so paid, the same shall be credited upon the plaintiff's decree herein, and the right of substitution to the said payments as to said debts, as between the said defendants herein decreed to pay the same, shall exist as between themselves according to their rights and equity in respect thereto, and as to said sum of $376.97, residue of said sum of $1,721.21, retained by said Dayton as aforesaid, the same is confirmed and allowed to him, as and for his attorney's lien upon said original debt, of which said sum of $1,721.21 is parcel as aforesaid." From this decree of February 23, 1905, the defendants John D. Pickens, executor of James Pickens, deceased, John D. Pickens, Mollie Pickens Martin, Dever Pickens, and Minnie Coburn Pickens filed their petition in this court for an appeal.

A partial appeal only, therefrom and supersedeas thereto were allowed, as follows: "State of West Virginia: An appeal and supersedeas upon the foregoing petition was allowed as to so much of the decree pronounced on the 23d day of February, 1905, as requires that A. G. Dayton and Mollie Pickens pay to the plaintiff the sum of $1,000, with interest thereon from the 12th day of May, 1892, and the sum of $69.24, with interest thereon from the 6th day of June, 1892, and that said A. G. Dayton and John J. Davis pay to the plaintiff the sum of $125, with interest thereon from the 21st day of May, 1892, and that said A. G. Dayton and John Bassel pay to the plaintiff the sum of $150, with interest thereon from the 26th day of May, 1892, in court, at Charleston, on the 12th day of May, 1905." Said appeal was decided, as will appear in 59 W. Va. 274, 53 S. E. 154, where it is said at page 161 of 53 S. E.: "From the principles and conclusions above stated, it results that A. G. Dayton was liable to the plaintiff for said sums of $69.24, $125, and $150, paid by him to Mollie Pickens, John J. Davis, and John Bassel, respectively, and that, as said parties received it from him with knowledge of the source from which it was derived, and all the circumstances above referred to, so much of the decree as relates to said sums will be affirmed. As said Dayton received said sum of $1,000, and paid it to Mollie Pickens before the filing of said second amended bill, he stands in a different situation as to it. It cannot be said that there was any pending suit with reference thereto at the time he received the money, and he, therefore, violated no duty. For this reason, the decree should have required Mollie Pickens alone to pay said sum, and, in so far as it requires A. G. Dayton and Mollie Pickens to pay to Susan C. Dent $1,000 with interest thereon from the 12th day of May, 1892, until paid, the same must be reversed, and a decree entered here requiring said Mollie Pickens to pay said sum, with interest thereon as aforesaid, to said Susan C. Dent." It is further said at same page: "A cross-assignment of error is predicated on the refusal of the court to require the defendant A. G. Dayton to pay over to the plaintiff a balance of the Coburn debt, amounting to $376.97, part of which he retained on account of his fees as attorney for Dever Pickens, and the residue of which he applied on costs due from his client. That matter is not now before this court, for the reasons assigned in disposing of other assignments of error as to matters not brought up by the appeal." Susan C. Dent then filed her petition for an appeal from so much of said decree of February 23, 1905, as permitted and authorized the defendant Dayton to retain as and for his attorney's lien on said original debt, the $376.97, residue of said sum of $1,721.21. The sum here involved, the item of $376.97, for the reasons given in Dent v. Pickens, 59 W. Va. 274, 53 S. E. 154, fixing liability of said A. G. Dayton for the said sums of $69.24, $125, and $150, being governed by the same principles, should have been required by said decree to be paid by the said Dayton to the plaintiff Dent, and, as shown by said report of the case in 53 S. E. 154, the said decree of February 23, 1905, as to said sum of $376.97, could not be reversed on cross-assignment of error in that case because the same was not before the court therein on said appeal.

For the reasons stated, the said decree of February 23, 1905, disposing of the said sum of $376.97, is reversed and annulled, and, this court proceeding to render such decree as the circuit court should have rendered, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said A. G. Dayton do pay to the plaintiff the sum of $376.97, the residue of said sum of $1,721.21, with interest thereon from the 21st day of May, 1892, until paid.

ROBINSON, J., absent (related to parties).

On Rehearing.

WILLIAMS, J. The money retained by appellee on account of his services as attorney for Dever Pickens stands on no higher footing in respect to the claim of Susan Dent-Roy than any other portion of the M. W. & Ledrue Coburn debt; and in the former appeals in this suit the disbursements of all the rest of said Coburn debt have been held to be in fraud of Susan Dent's claim. What right has appellee to his fee as attorney for Dever Pickens payable out of said fund superior to the right of his associate counsel? Pickens and his wife assigned $1,000 of this Coburn debt for the joint benefit of all three of the attorneys.

Counsel for appellee contends, in his brief, that this Coburn fund was subject to an attorney's lien in favor of appellee for services rendered by him in respect to the collection of said fund before Susan Dent acquired any right to any part of it. If this is true, his lien ought to be protected and saved to him, provided the amount of it can be ascertained; but, by reference to his answer, we find that he does not assert any such lien. He therein expressly claims title to the fund because of an agreement between himself and Dever Pickens that he, Bassel, and Davis were to be paid their fees out of it for their services in defending the Dent v. Pickens law action. In his deposition he says: "When the original law cause of Dent v. Pickens was instituted, and, if I remember rightly, in less than a week after the summons issued in it, Dever Pickens employed John J. Davis, John Bassel and myself to defend him in it, and in the conversation which I had with him at that time we verbally assigned or agreed that I should hold to the extent of $1,000 this debt—this Coburn debt—when collected by me, to secure to Davis, Bassel and myself our fees incurred in the defense of this action at law against him." And later he took a written assignment, dated August 20, 1889, from Dever Pickens and Minnie Pickens his wife, which reads as follows: "For the purpose of securing to John J. Davis, John Bassel, and Alston G. Dayton their fees as attorneys for Dever Pickens in the cases of Susan C. Dent v. Dever Pickens both in law and chancery in the circuit court of Barbour county, W. Va., we hereby assign the residue of about $1,000 of a debt due from M. W. & Ledrue Coburn to Mrs. Minnie B. Pickens assignee of said Dever Pickens, after deducting offset and amount heretofore assigned thereout by said Dever Pickens to Miss Mollie Pickens. In case the law cause of Dent v. Pickens is gained by said Pickens in the end said Davis, Bassel, and Dayton are to have a fee of $1,000, otherwise such fee as may be hereafter agreed upon August 20, 1889."

By acceptance of this assignment he recognized the right of Minnie Pickens (née Coburn) to dispose of said Coburn debt under the settlement made upon her by Dever Pickens which was decreed to be fraudulent as to Susan Dent. All of said M. W. & Ledrue Coburn fund, except the $376.97 in the hands of appellee, has been applied on Susan Dent's judgment. The amount now held by him is a part of the $1,000 assigned for fees of himself and associate counsel in the Dent-Pickens suits and the same liability attaches to it. Even if the court were satisfied that appellee has an attorney's lien on said Coburn fund, the record furnishes no information as to the extent of it. Appellee does not attempt to show what per cent. of the debt he is entitled to, nor what was the value of his services in respect to said fund. We do not think he has proven that he has an attorney's lien; neither has he shown how much he claims under such lien, whether $10 or $500.

For these additional reasons, we think the former decree rendered by this court on this appeal on the 26th day of January, 1907, is right, and we refuse to reverse or change it.

LAMBERT v. ARMENTROUT et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 23, 1909.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 325*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—IMPEACHING ONE'S OWN WITNESS.

Cross-examination is confined to matters of the examination in chief. If a party wishes by his adversary's witness to prove other matters, he must wait his turn, or, in the court's discretion, may without waiting his turn interrogate the witness; but in either case he makes the witness his own as to such other matters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1098; Dec. Dig. § 325.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 400*)—IMPEACHING OWN WITNESS—CONTRADICTORY STATEMENTS.

A party may not impeach his own witness either by attacking his reputation for veracity or by proving by others previous contradictory statements. But, if the witness is a party in interest, so that such statements would be admissible as admissions against his interest, the party may prove such prior admissions, though they may contradict the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1269; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

3. SALES (§ 266*)—IMPLIED WARRANTY.

There is no implied warranty of quality or soundness of chattels sold. There must be either fraudulent representation or express warranty of quality, soundness, or fitness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. § 754; Dec. Dig. § 266.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County.

Action by L. D. Lambert against C. L. Armentrout and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

L. Hansford and Cunningham & Stallings, for plaintiffs in error. J. Wm. Harmon, for defendant in error.

BRANNON, J. C. L. Armentrout and C. S. Armentrout made a promissory note to R. E. Lee Armentrout, which R. E. Lee Armentrout assigned to L. D. Lambert, and Lambert sued on it before a justice, making C. L. Armentrout, C. S. Armentrout, and R. E. Lee Armentrout defendants. The case went to the circuit court of Randolph county by appeal, and there the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and from judgment against the three Armentrouths C. L. and C. S. Armentrout have come to this court.

The defense was that the note had been given for a horse and wagon, and that the horse had been warranted as sound, but, in fact, was unsound. On the trial the plaintiff introduced R. E. Lee Armentrout as a witness, who gave evidence in chief that the note had been given for a horse and wagon, and that $40, the price of the wagon, had been paid, and no more, and gave no evidence at all touching the warranty or soundness of the horse. On cross-examination the defense asked him if he had not warranted the soundness of the horse, and he denied having done so. The defense also asked whether he had not made statements out of court that he knew the horse was unsound, and had warranted him as sound, and he denied having made such statements. Then the defense offered to prove by other witnesses that Armentrout had made such contradictory statements, but the court would not allow evidence of such statements. The great weight of authority is that a party has no right to cross-examine a witness beyond facts elicited on his examination in chief. He cannot prove his own case by his adversary's witness without making him his own witness as to such new independent matter. If he wishes to prove other matters by him, he must call him in the subsequent progress of the case, and if, without waiting his turn, which the court to avoid confusion and promote method and regularity should require, he at once interrogates, he makes the witness his own. State v. Hatfield, 48 W. Va. 561, 37 S. E. 626; State v. Carr (decided February, 1909), 63 S. E. 766; 3 Jones on Ev. § 820, note 6; 2 Elliott on Ev. §§ 917, 922. So the defense in this case made Armentrout its own witness touching contradictory, out of court statements as to warranty of the horse. This being so, then comes the question whether the defendants could impeach Armentrout by proof from other witnesses of what he denied; that is, that he made statements that he knew the horse was unsound, and had stated he was sound when he sold him. I do not know that this court has passed on this question. A party cannot impeach his own witness by evidence of other witnesses either as to general reputation for veracity or of previous inconsistent statements. McKelvey on Ev. 400; 2 Elliott on Ev. § 985; 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 1128; 3 Jones on Ev. § 857; Underhill on Ev. § 347. And it makes no difference that the adverse party first called the witness, since by cross-examination on matters other than those included in his chief examination the party makes the witness his own as to such new matters, and the same rule applies "with reference to impeaching his testimony as though he had been called in the first instance by such party." McKelvey on Ev. 404; Starkie on Ev. 250 (10th Ed.). This rule seems unreasonable. It is founded on the unsubstantial reason that the party by presenting the witness represents him as credible. Hardly so where the adverse party presents him first. But such is the rule so firmly set that in England, and many of our states it has been changed by statutes allowing the party to prove inconsistent statements, as in Virginia in the case of the unfortunate McCue (108 Va. 870, 49 S. E. 623), where the old rule is seemingly criticised, and the subject discussed. It is ridiculed in that great work, Wigmore on Evidence.

I must not be taken as saying that a party is bound by what his witness says. He cannot impeach his general reputation for veracity or prove contradictory statements; but he may by other witnesses prove that the facts are otherwise than as stated, and it is no objection to any relevant evidence of material facts on which he relies to sustain his case that it may operate to contradict and thus discredit his own witness. Stout v. Sands, 56 W. Va. 663, 49 S. E. 428; 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1129; Id. (1st Ed.) 812; Wharton on Ev. § 549; 3 Jones on Ev. § 860; 2 Wigmore on Ev. §§ 907, 1051; Hickory v. U. S., 151 U. S. 303, 14 Sup. Ct. 334, 38 L. Ed. 170; McKelvey on Ev. 400; 2 Elliott on Ev. § 985; Mississippi Glass Co. v. Franzen, 143 Fed. 501, 74 C. C. A. 135, 6 Am. & Eng. Ann. Cas. 707. The rule which denies right to prove contradictory statements of one's own witness is not infallible. 2 Wigmore on Evidence, § 906, says: "So far as impeachment by prior self-contradiction is under any of the foregoing doctrines prohibited, the prohibition does not apply to a party's admission, which is receivable as such, even though it be also a self-contradiction of himself as a witness." Hickory v. U. S., 151 U. S. 303, 14 Sup. Ct. 334, 38 L. Ed. 170, says that the rule does not apply to a party. We find in that reliable work, 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1130, that where one's witness denies a contradictory statement the party cannot disprove it by other witnesses "where it would not be admissible as independent evidence, and can therefore have no effect but to impeach the credit of the witness." Likewise Elliott on Ev. § 972. Thus it is seen that, if one calls a witness, he may prove by another witness the former's contradictory statement if that statement would be admissible if he had not called the witness, as, for instance, an admission against interest. If that former statement would come in as independent evidence, it can be proven, though the witness has denied it when called by the suitor. In this case R. E. Lee Armentrout was a party defendant; but what is here meant by "party" is one in interest, one whose admission is admissible. We all know that you can prove an admission of a party without laying any foundation which is required to impeach a witness not interested so as to make his admission evidence. R. E. Lee Armentrout made the sale of the horse, and was payee of the note. His admission of unsoundness or warranty would be admissible if he had not been used as a witness by the defendants. It was thus error to refuse to allow his admissions to go in evidence.

The court refused evidence to prove that the horse for which in part the note sued on was given was unsound. Notwithstanding the rule against one impeaching his own evidence, this evidence, under law above stated, would have been admissible if the fact sought to be proven were a good defense; but it is not, and therefore there was no error in its refusal. There is an implied warranty of title in sales of chattels, but not of quality. There must be fraudulent representation or express warranty of quality, soundness, or fitness as a general rule. The rule of caveat emptor here applies. Mason v. Chappell, 15 Grat. 572; Byrnside v. Burdett, 15 W. Va. 702; Jarret v. Goodnow, 39 W. Va. 602, 20 S. E. 575, 32 L. R. A. 321.

These principles call upon us to set aside and reverse verdict and judgment and remand for another trial, according to those principles; and it will be so ordered.

COX v. GRADY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 867*)—REVIEW—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL.

"If the verdict was not demanded by the law and the evidence, the Supreme Court will not disturb the first grant of a new trial, though it was put upon a single ground; nor will it determine whether the trial court was right in granting the motion on the special ground."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3477; Dec. Dig. § 867.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; J. T. Pendleton, Judge.

Action by A. H. Cox against G. G. Grady. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order denying a new trial, he brings error. Affirmed.

B. F. Abbott, for plaintiff in error. Rosser & Brandon, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. This is a suit by an attorney at law against his client for professional services. There was a sharp conflict in the evidence relative to the amount of compensation to be paid under the contract of employment. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant moved for a new trial, which the court granted in the following order: "Upon hearing the within motion, it is ordered that the same be granted on the ninth and tenth grounds of the amended motion for new trial, and on those grounds alone." The plaintiff excepted to the grant of a new trial.

1. The preliminary question to be determined is the scope of an assignment of error which complains of the first grant of a new trial upon special grounds. There seems to be a divergence of opinion in the reported cases, prior to the adoption of the Code of 1895, as to the exact point or points for decision presented by an assignment of error of this character. In Everett v. Southern Express Co., 46 Ga. 303, it was ruled that when a motion for a new trial contains several grounds, and the court grants a new trial on one of the grounds, overruling the others, and the bill of exceptions is filed to his judgment, the Supreme Court will inquire if the judgment be right in granting a new trial, and, if that be right on any of the grounds taken in the motion, this court will affirm the judgment, notwithstanding the court may have erred in the ground on which he placed the judgment. To the same effect are Reid v. Whitfield, 48 Ga. 187, and Whitaker v. Groover, 54 Ga. 174. In cases of which the foregoing are typical, the reviewing court refused to be limited to the merit of the special ground upon which the trial judge rested his action in deciding whether the first grant of a new trial should be disturbed.

A few years afterwards it was held, in Long v. Bullard, 69 Ga. 678, that the grant of a new trial upon one of the various grounds of the motion was in legal effect a denial of the motion on all the other grounds, and such a judgment as from which the defendants might have taken a bill of exceptions directly to this court and had all the law points settled. Following this decision it was ruled that, where a new trial was granted on one ground of the motion, the only question before the Supreme Court is whether the court erred in granting the motion on that ground. Singleton v. Southwestern R. Co., 70 Ga. 464, 48 Am. Rep. 574; Ga. R. Co. v. Letchworth, 78 Ga. 88; Krogg v. A. & W. P. R., 77 Ga. 202, 4 Am. St. Rep. 77; Nixon v. Christie, 84 Ga. 469, 10 S. E. 1087. In these two latter cases a judgment granting a new trial upon a special ground was reversed, because such special ground was without merit. At the time of these decisions the statute law on the subject of the grant of a new trial was as follows: "The presiding judge may exercise a sound discretion in granting or refusing new trials in cases where the verdict may be decidedly and strongly against the weight of evidence, although there may appear to be some slight evidence in favor of the finding." Code 1882, § 3717. "In all applications for new trials on grounds not provided for in this Code, the presiding judge may exercise a sound legal discretion in granting or refusing the same according to the provisions of the common law and practice of the courts." Code 1882, § 3718.

In many of the earlier decisions no distinction is made between the first and subsequent grants of a new trial. It was frequently declared that since the abolition of appeals in the superior court from one jury to another, the first grant of a new trial was to be favored, and the discretion of the trial judge would not be interfered with, except where manifestly abused. So the rule was formulated that "the first grant of a new trial will not be reversed by this court, unless the plaintiff in error makes it appear from the record that the judge abused his discretion in granting it, and that the law and facts require the verdict, notwithstanding the judgment of the presiding judge." Sparks v. Noyes, 64 Ga. 437. The headnote of this decision was incorporated as section 5585 of the Civil Code of 1895. This section was construed in Johnson v. Ga. R. Co., 102 Ga. 577, 27 S. E. 681, where it was held that the first grant of a new trial by a trial judge, whether upon general or special grounds, will not be disturbed, unless upon looking through the record of the entire case it can be judicially determined, not only that the judge abused his discretion, but that upon the record as a whole the verdict as to each material issue involved in the case was demanded by the law and the evidence. There has been a uniform adherence to this construction in all of the decisions pronounced by this court since the decision in that case. Weinkle v. Railroad Co., 107 Ga. 367, 33 S. E. 471; Watson v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 112 Ga. 258, 37 S. E. 363; Harvey v. Bowles, 112 Ga. 363, 37 S. E. 363; McCain v. College Park, 112 Ga. 701, 37 S. E. 971; Brantley v. Bank of Waycross, 112 Ga. 532, 37 S. E. 737; Carter v. Dunson, 113 Ga. 374, 38 S. E. 830; Thornton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99; Cordray v. Savannah R. Co., 117 Ga. 464, 43 S. E. 755; Johnson v. Winkles, 119 Ga. 262, 46 S. E. 99; Fugazzi v. Tomlinson, 119 Ga. 622, 46 S. E. 831; Walker v. Hughes, 120 Ga. 1079, 48 S. E. 387; Solomons v. Merchants', etc., Co., 121 Ga. 88, 48 S. E. 687; Elliott v. McCalla, 123 Ga. 26, 50 S. E. 960; Smith v. Hightower, 123 Ga. 110, 51 S. E. 28; Thompson v. Hays, 123 Ga. 110, 51 S. E. 33; A. & B. Ry. Co. v. Cobb, 125 Ga. 121, 53 S. E. 591; Ogletree v. Livingston, 125 Ga. 549, 54 S. E. 625; W. & A. R. Co. v. Callaway, 127 Ga. 125, 56 S. E. 105; Livingston v. Ogletree, 127 Ga. 205, 56 S. E. 283; Phoenix Duster, etc., Co. v. Allen-Holmes Co., 127 Ga. 458, 56 S. E. 513; Malcom v. Dobbs, 127 Ga. 487, 56 S. E. 622; Bagley v. Shumate, 128 Ga. 78, 57 S. E. 99; Armour v. Burkhalter, 130 Ga. 370, 60 S. E. 850.

The rule has been even more strongly stated. For instance, it was said in Mock v. Savannah & Statesboro R. Co., 122 Ga. 385, 50 S. E. 121, if the verdict was not demanded by the law and the evidence, the Supreme Court will not disturb the first grant of a new trial, though it was put upon a special ground; nor will it determine whether the court was right or not in granting a motion on a special ground. Again, it was announced in Macon Con. St. R. Co. v. Jones, 118 Ga. 351, 42 S. E. 468, unless the verdict rendered was absolutely demanded by the evidence, this court will not undertake to decide whether or not the trial judge abused his discretion in granting a first new trial, even though the grant thereof was based solely upon a single question of law determining which it was unnecessary to consider the evidence in the case.

2. It is urged by counsel for the plaintiff in error that it does not appear from the record that this is the first grant of a new trial, and therefore the court cannot assume the existence of a fact not disclosed by the record. The reply to this contention is obvious. Looking to the record, it does not appear that there were former trials of the case, and this court cannot assume that such was the fact. So far as we are informed by the record, there was only one trial of the case. If there had been former trials, and verdicts set aside on motions for new trials, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff in error to make such appear in the preparation of his record. We are therefore bound to assume that this is the first grant of a new trial.

The evidence was conflicting, and following the plain mandate of section 5585, and the decisions of this court since its incorporation in the Civil Code of 1895, we will refuse to set aside a judgment granting a new trial for the first time, upon conflicting evidence, although the court may have based his judgment granting a new trial solely upon an alleged error of law, which in point of fact may not have been a substantial error.

No special form of words is necessary to make an assignment of a chose in action. 2. INSURANCE (§ 209*)—LIFE POLICY—ASSIGNMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a policy of life insurance was made payable to the estate of the insured, and he made a written statement that he had that day made application to the company to change the beneficiary from his estate to a person named, stating that, if the change was not made during his life, he wanted the money paid to such person, who had rendered to him services as a cook during a number of years, for which he owed such person, and where he delivered the policy, together with this written statement, to the person named, he intending it, and she accepting it, as an assignment of the policy, and where on the same day he wrote to the company, inclosing the amount which it charged for assenting to a change of beneficiary, and informing it of the desired change, and that he owed the person mentioned, and wished such person "to have something as a gift after I am gone," held, that this operated as a transfer of the policy, and authorized the assignee to bring suit on it after the death of the insured.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Fulton County; W. D. Ellis, Judge.

Action by G. A. Durdin against the Southern Mutual Life Insurance Association. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Anna Durdin brought suit against the Southern Mutual Life Insurance Association on a policy issued by it to William D. Durdin. The only portion of the policy necessary to be set out is the following: "The Southern Mutual Life Insurance Association, upon satisfactory proof of the death of the said William D. Durdin, the assured, and the surrender of this policy, will pay to estate, the beneficiary named in the application of the said assured, as many dollars as there are members of the branch above named, in good standing, on the day of the death of the said assured." The petition alleged, in brief, as follows: Defendant is indebted to petitioner in the sum of $1,500. On February 18, 1908, it issued the policy of insurance, to which reference has been made above, to William D. Durdin, insuring his life. Durdin paid the admission fee and all dues and assessments of which he had notice to the time of his death. On the 1st day of March, 1908, he transferred and assigned the policy to the plaintiff. The assignment was in writing, a copy being attached to the petition. He died on March 9, 1908. Proof of his death has been furnished to the defendant as provided in the policy, but it fails and refuses to pay the amount due thereon. On the day of his death there were 1,500 members in good standing in the branch of the company mentioned in the policy. Attached to the petition as exhibits were copies of the policy and of the instrument claimed to be an assignment. The latter was as follows: "This is to certify that I, W. D. Durdin, has this day made application for change in his life insurance policy from estate to Georgia Ann Durdin, and in case the change is not made during my lifetime I want the money paid to her for her services as cook for me during the last 35 years. I owe her for her services, and want it paid before anything done with my estate. I have this day signed this affidavit in presence of Chas. T. Pitts, agent for Southern Life Ins. Co., Atlanta, Ga." This was signed by Durdin and attested by two witnesses.

The plaintiff amended her petition by alleging as follows: The policy to which reference was made in the instrument attached to the original petition as an assignment was the policy on which suit was brought, and this was the only policy held by Durdin at that time. On March 1, 1908, Durdin, in writing, notified the defendant company of the assignment of the policy to plaintiff; a copy of the letter containing such notice being attached to the amendment as an exhibit. The defendant consented to the assignment and accepted the sum of 60 cents, which was its charge for so consenting, and that amount was paid by Durdin and accepted by the company for that purpose. It was the intention of Durdin to assign the policy to the plaintiff. He executed the instrument attached to the original petition, and delivered it, together with the policy, to the plaintiff, and it was accepted by her as a transfer; and on the same day Durdin notified the defendant of the transfer of the policy, as above stated. The letter, of which a copy was attached to the amendment as an exhibit, was as follows:

"March 1st, 1908. Newborn, Ga.

"Mr. Thos. C. Candler, Atlanta, Ga.—
Dear Sir: Inclosed find 50 [60?] cents for change in my policy from estate to Georgia Anna Durdin. My policy No. 61,051, class (4). The woman spoken of as beneficiary is my cook, and I want to leave her one policy. I also want four more policies in your company. Can I get them by standing medical examination? Georgia Durdin has cooked for me for 35 years, and I want her to have something as a gift after I am gone. Please attend to same for me. Respectfully, W. D. Durdin.

"Please let me hear from you in regard to it. Respectfully, W. D. D."

Defendant demurred to the petition, and after the amendment was made the demurrer was overruled. Defendant excepted.

Candless, Thomson & Hirsch and R. L. D. McAllister, for plaintiff in error. Moore & Branch, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The only question made and argued in this case was whether the allegations of the petition showed an assignment of the insurance policy on the life of Durdin to the plaintiff. At common law choses in action were not assignable. Courts of equity did not recognize transfers of mere litigious rights, but did recognize assignments of choses in action, and looked upon the assignee as the true beneficial owner. In this state choses in action arising in contract are assignable in writing. Civ. Code 1895, § 3077, declares: "All choses in action arising upon contract may be assigned so as to vest the title in the assignee, but he takes it, except negotiable securities, subject to the equities existing between the assignor and debtor at the time of the assignment, and until notice of the assignment is given to the person liable." No special form of words is necessary to make an assignment. Any language, however informal, if it shows the intention of the owner of the chose in action to transfer it, will be sufficient to vest the property in the assignee. 4 Cyc. 42; 2 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1055.

In Dugas v. Mathews, 9 Ga. 510, 54 Am. Dec. 361, the sufficiency of an instrument to operate as an assignment of a judgment was under consideration. It was "held that a formal deed of assignment is not necessary, but that evidence in writing, which shows that the plaintiff has conveyed the interest in the judgment or execution to the person claiming to be assignee, will be sufficient to enable him to sue out process of garnishment thereon." The paper there relied on as an assignment of the judgment had at its head a statement of the parties to the case and the court and term from which the fi. fa. issued. It was addressed to the attorney at law who represented the plaintiff, was signed by the plaintiff, and contained the following statement: "Having assigned the above judgment and execution to Lewis A. Dugas, you are authorized to use my name in any proceeding yourself or the said Lewis A. may deem necessary to the collection of said debt, and you are authorized to act as my attorney in any court proceeding instituted for the collection of the same, should you deem the use of my name necessary." It was held that this was a sufficient written assignment of judgment. In the opinion, Nisbet, J., said: "We cannot believe that the ends of justice can be subverted by requiring, under the act of 1829, a technically formal deed of assignment. What we do require is that there be intelligible written evidence that the judgment is the property of him who claims to be its assignee. Such we consider this order to be."

In Stanford v. Connery, 84 Ga. 731, 11 S. E. 507, it was held that a letter from the usee of an execution to his attorney, stating that it was the property of a named person, "and is subject to his control and direction, and you are hereby authorized to pay the amount over to him when collected, or assign him the execution if he requires it," was an assignment to the person so named, and that the usee could not afterwards transfer the execution to another.

In Loudermilk v. Loudermilk, 93 Ga. 443, 21 S. E. 77, where the payee of a nonnegotible promissory note indorsed it to a third person by name, without any words of limitation or exception, it was held that there was a written assignment of the note to the indorsee, and that under Code, § 3077, the latter could maintain an action upon it in his own name against the maker.

In First National Bank v. Hartman Steel Co., 87 Ga. 485, 13 S. E. 586, one company which had done work for another drew a draft on the debtor for the amount of the balance due, payable 15 days after date, "as advised," indorsed it to the bank, received credit for the amount, and checked out the amount on the same day. The words "as advised" referred to a letter which the drawer on the same day wrote to the company for which the work was done, and in which it was said: "We have to-day made draft on you at 15 days, for balance of contract on standpipe at Columbus, $2,783.00. This draft, of course, we would like for you to accept; but it is not absolutely necessary if, for any reason, you prefer not doing so. We make the draft, however, inasmuch as we have gotten some money from the First National Bank here on this work, and simply want to transfer this balance to them. In other words, we wish the draft paid whenever the amount is due, either by taking up the draft, or remitting to the First National Bank here, as you see fit. * * * It would be quite an accommodation to us if you would transfer this amount in the manner indicated." At the time the draft was received by the bank, it was agreed between it and the treasurer of the drawer that the latter would notify the drawee of the transfer to the bank of the balance due on the contract. The letter was received by the drawee; but it refused to accept the draft, notifying the drawer that it would not do so till the work was satisfactory to its representative. It was held that this constituted an assignment of the chose in action to the bank, and it was entitled to the fund over garnishing creditors of the assignor.

See, also, Western Union Tel. Co. v. Ryan, 126 Ga. 191, 55 S. E. 21; Walton v. Horkan, 112 Ga. 814, 38 S. E. 105, 81 Am. St. Rep. 77.

Applying these principles to the case now before us, the allegations of the petition were sufficient to show an assignment of the policy of insurance to the plaintiff. It was payable to the estate of the assured, and he had a right to assign it without the consent of the company, so far as anything in this record appears to the contrary. Civ. Code 1895, § 2116; Rylander v. Allen, 125 Ga. 206, 53 S. E. 1082, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 126. The writing which he executed stated that it was to certify that he had that day made application for change in his life insurance policy from his estate to the present plaintiff, "and in case the change is not made during my lifetime I want the money paid to her for her services as cook for me during the last 35 years. I owe her for her services, and I want it paid before anything done with my estate." It was alleged that this instrument, together with the policy of insurance to which it referred (being that on which suit was brought), was delivered to the plaintiff, and accepted by her as a transfer, and that it was the intention of the insured to assign the policy to her. It was also alleged that on the same day he sent to the company the letter inclosing 50 (or 60) cents for a change in his policy, that being the correct amount, and stating that he wanted her to have something "as a gift after I am gone," and that the company consented to the change and accepted the amount sent to it, which was its charge for consenting thereto. These allegations were sufficient to show an assignment of the policy, and on demurrer they are to be taken as true.

The writing sufficiently describes the policy to be capable of being applied to its subject-matter. It states that the insured has applied for a change in his life insurance policy from his estate, and that he has signed the paper in the presence of the agent of "the Southern Life Ins. Co." of Atlanta, Ga. The policy was issued by the Southern Mutual Life Insurance Association of Atlanta, Ga., and was payable to his estate. It was alleged that he had no other policy of life insurance than this, and that on the same day he wrote to that company the letter to which reference has already been made.

It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff in error that the alleged assignment was testamentary in character. If a present transfer of the policy was made, it was valid, although payment would not be made on it until it matured by the death of the insured. An assignment of a nonnegotiable note may be good in the present, although it may not be due until a future day. So a policy itself is assignable before the death of the insured, and the assignment is not testamentary because payment is not to be received by the assignee until after the death of the insured. There is nothing about this instrument to indicate a testamentary intention; but the surroundings, so far as they appear from the record, indicated an opposite intention. If the purpose of the maker had been to execute a will, it would have been entirely unnecessary to apply to the insurance company and make a required payment for that purpose.

It was also made a ground of demurrer that the purported consideration of the assignment was the services of the plaintiff as cook during 35 years, but that it does not set out what such services were worth, or whether any payment had been made therefor. This ground is not well taken.

In the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error there is some discussion as to the propriety of the allowance of the amendment to the petition; but there is no assignment of error which raises any point on that subject.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

CITY OF LA GRANGE v. TROUP COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 426*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—PROPERTY LIABLE—PUBLIC PROPERTY.

Where an act of the General Assembly gives a general power to municipal authorities to assess against the property abutting on streets improved a specified percentage of the cost of such improvements, providing for the collection of such assessment by a levy and sale of the property assessed, and there is no provision clearly authorizing such assessment against public property, there is an implied exemption of the property of the county from such assessment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Troup County; R. W. Freeman, Judge.

Action by the City of La Grange against Troup County. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

E. R. Bradfield, Jr., for plaintiff in error. W. T. Tuggle, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The city of La Grange, a municipal corporation, brought suit against the county of Troup, alleging that, by virtue of the authority conferred upon the city by its charter and ordinances passed in pursuance thereof, it caused to be paved certain streets within the corporate limits of the city abutting on the public square whereon the courthouse stood, and that the county is indebted to the city in the sum of $4,448.88 for its pro rata part of the assessment levied to pay the cost of such improvement. The provisions in the charter under which the paving of the streets was done and the assessment against the county levied give the city authority to assess against the abutting owners on each side of the street one-third of the cost of paving or otherwise improving the street, and create a lien on such property for the amount of such assessment. To the petition special and general demurrers were filed, and to the order of the court sustaining the general demurrer and dismissing the petition the plaintiff excepted.

1. There is no express provision in the charter of the city that public property shall be subject to the assessment provided for, nor is there any provision in the charter excepting public property from the operation of such assessment. When a city is given authority to assess abutting property for a part of the cost of street improvements, and nothing is said as to whether or not public property is or is not excepted, there is much conflict in the authorities of other jurisdictions as to whether or not such public property can be lawfully assessed for a pro rata part of the cost of such improvements. 28 Cyc. 1117; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1187; 1 Page & Jones on Taxation by Assessment, § 582; Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 550. We think the better view is that where general power is given a municipality to levy local assessments upon the property benefited by street improvements, and there is no provision clearly showing that public property shall be subject to such assessment, there is an implied exception in favor of its exemption. The municipality cannot assess abutting public property unless the power to levy such assessment is clearly given. This view is supported by many authorities cited in connection with the text employed by the authorities above referred to. While the question may not have heretofore been directly before this court for decision, in the case of City of Atlanta v. First Methodist Church, 86 Ga. 730, 13 S. E. 252, 12 L. R. A. 852, it was recognized in the discussion of the subject found on page 736 et seq. of 86 Ga., and the view which we entertain as constituting the true rule of law is there expressed by Chief Justice Bleckley. In Elliott on Roads and Streets, § 550, the following language is used: "Public property held for governmental purposes, as a courthouse, cannot be sold to pay an assessment levied for the improvement of a street unless a sale is expressly authorized by the statute, nor will such property ordinarily be deemed within the general words of a statute delegating, in general terms, the authority to levy local assessments. Statutes conferring a general authority to assess are usually construed as operating upon property subject to legal process, and not upon property held for governmental purposes by the state or any of the local instrumentalities of government."

In view of the provisions of the act creating a charter for the city of La Grange (Acts 1901, p. 477), giving power to make assessments against abutting property for street improvements, we think public property is not under such act liable to assessment. The only provision for the collection of such assessment is the sale at public outcry of the property assessed. It is provided in the act referred to that such sale shall vest absolute title in the purchaser, and that the city marshal "shall have authority to eject occupants and to put purchasers in possession." We do not think it was intended that such provision should apply to the property on which is situated the courthouse and jail of the county. If the property on which the courthouse and jail are located be subject to such local assessments, to strictly enforce the only provisions of the act providing for the collection thereof would require a levy on and sale of the public property and an eviction of the occupants thereof, and would deprive the county of the instrumentalities by means of which, through its officers, it is enabled to perform the functions of government. To levy upon and sell the courthouse and jail would be to allow the municipality to invade the power and authority of the county, and seriously interfere with its governmental operations and the administration of justice. We think a power of such far-reaching consequences is not to be inferred from a general act; but, to entitle a municipality to its exercise, it would have to be clearly granted by the Legislature, if it could be granted at all by it, and we do not think that the charter of La Grange, giving power generally to assess abutting property for local street improvements, gives it the power to collect from the county any part of the costs of such improvements.

2. It is contended by counsel for the plaintiff in error that the act of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 119) construed in connection with the act creating a charter for the city of La Grange, gives the city the power to collect such assessment. We do not think the act of 1906 has any application to a case of this kind. This act gives authority to the Governor where the state is the owner, to the ordinary or chairman of the board of county commissioners where the county is the owner, and to the mayor where the municipality is the owner, of property fronting on a street in a municipality, to sign an application for such street to be improved, but has no application except "whenever the abutting owners of any street or sidewalk in this state petition to have the same improved." Under the allegations of the petition this act has no application to the case in hand.

The court committed no error in sustaining the general demurrer; and the judgment dismissing the petition is affirmed. All the Justices concur.

PETERSON v. LOTT et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

1. DECISION IN FORMER ACTION.

In Wadley Lumber Co. v. Lott, 130 Ga. 185, 60 S. E. 836, the deed made by Peterson to Lott in 1882, upon the construction of which their respective rights in the present case depend, was construed. It was there held that this instrument conveyed the fee in the land therein described to Lott, subject, however, to the right of Peterson to have it reconveyed to him when Lott died, or offered the land for sale, upon his paying the original purchase money and the value of all improvements placed by him upon the land, estimated in the manner provided for in the deed, and that, as neither of these events had happened when the Wadley Lumber Company cut the sawmill timber from the land, the title conveyed by Peterson to Lott was then as completely in Lott as it was on the date of the execution of the deed, and he therefore had the right to recover from the lumber company for the cutting of such timber, although such company cut the timber under a conveyance of the timber which it received from Peterson in January, 1904, and the judgment of the trial court to this effect was affirmed.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 405*)—EQUITABLE RELIEF—GROUNDS.

It follows that, although Lott, since he recovered this judgment against the lumber company, may have offered the land for sale, and may thereafter have refused to accept from Peterson the amount of the original purchase money for the land, together with the value of the improvements placed by Lott thereon, and to thereupon reconvey the land to Peterson, the latter is not, under a cross-petition seeking specific performance, but making no case for equitable set-off against an insolvent, filed by him in a suit brought against him by the former to recover damages for the cutting and using of the timber by the lumber company, entitled to have Lott, by injunction, prevented from collecting the amount of his judgment against such company, although, if he does so, Peterson may be liable to the lumber company for a breach of the warranty of title to the timber, contained in the deed which he made to that company.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 171*)—ENTIRE OR SEVERABLE.

If a person entered into a written agreement with another to obtain for the latter a body of timber, including several tracts, to be paid for in an entire amount, received $1,000, and agreed to repay it if he should fail to procure the timber from the owner of it, this was an entire contract, and was not performed by procuring only a portion of the timber described in it from the owner, unless there was a waiver of complete performance by the other party, or a modification of it by the parties thereto.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*)—GROUNDS—FAILURE TO CHARGE.

In the absence of any request to charge duly made, the omission to charge certain propositions of law, of which complaint was made in the motion for a new trial, furnishes no ground for a reversal. The court charged in regard to the theory of the defendant.

4. TRIAL (§ 25*)—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

Where the plaintiff alleged that he had paid to the defendant a stated sum of money under a written contract, by which the defendant agreed to return the money upon failure to procure certain timber for the plaintiff, and that the defendant failed to procure the timber, but refused to return the money, and where the defendant denied all the substantial allegations of the petition, though in an amendment he impliedly admitted the contract, and set up certain affirmative grounds of defense, but did not withdraw the general denial, or make admissions which would make out a prima facie case for the plaintiff, the latter was entitled to the opening and conclusion of the argument. *Mitchem v. (Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 19, 1908. Rehearing Denied Jan. 21, 1909.)

1. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 2*)—EMANCIPATION—“VOLUNTARY CONTRACT.”

Civ. Code 1895, § 2502, providing that parental power over a child is lost “by voluntary contract releasing the right to a third person,” does not relate to a contract of a parent apprenticing his child to a third person, and such “voluntary contract” of a father may be valid and binding on the father, although he does not therein apprentice his child.

2. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 2*)—PERSONS IN LOCO PARENTIS—GRANDPARENTS—GIFT OF CHILD.

Where a father makes an absolute and unconditional gift of his child to its grandparents, who accept it and take it into their home as one of the family, and there is no express agreement, or facts and circumstances connected with the transaction from which an agreement could be implied, that any one other than such grandparents is to receive the proceeds of the labor of such child, or is to maintain or care for it, held:

(a) The grandparents stand in loco parentis to such child, and are entitled to the proceeds of its labor, and are bound for its care, maintenance and support.

(b) Such contract is not without consideration.

(c) Such contract is sufficiently definite and clear in its terms to be valid and binding on the father.

8. NO ERROR.

In this case the court did not err in awarding the custody of the child to the defendants.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Clarke County; C. H. Brand, Judge.

Habeas corpus by F. B. Eaves against J. P. Fears and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

R. R. Arnold, J. L. Mayson, Cobb & Erwin, and Slaton & Phillips, for plaintiff in error. H. S. West, and Tye, Peeples, Bryan & Jordan, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff sued out a writ of habeas corpus to recover the possession of his child from its maternal grandparents, and to the order of the court awarding the custody of the child to the defendants the plaintiff excepted. On November 6, 1902, the plaintiff married the daughter of the defendants. The child was born on October 20, 1903, and the mother died seven days thereafter. The defendants have had possession of the child since the death of its mother. There was evidence offered by the defendants that the father gave them the child. The father denied that he had ever made any contract whereby he had lost his parental control over the child.

1. Civ. Code 1895, § 2502, provides: “Until majority, the child remains under the control of the father, who is entitled to his services and the proceeds of his labor. This parental power is lost—(1) By voluntary contract releasing the right to a third person.” Counsel for the plaintiff contends that the meaning of the provision that the parental power is lost by voluntary contract releasing the right to a third person relates only to apprenticing the child by the father. This provision was in the Code of 1863, and in 1865 the Legislature passed an act providing that the father might apprentice his child (Acts 1865-66, p. 6), which is now embodied in section 2604 of the Civil Code of 1895. This section provides as follows: “All minors may, by whichever parent has the legal control of them, be bound out as apprentices to any respectable person until they attain the age of twenty-one years, or for a shorter period.” Both of the sections above referred to were placed in the Codes of 1863, 1873, and 1882, as well as the Code of 1895. We do not think that the words “voluntary contract," in section 2502, mean a contract of apprenticeship. We think the Legislature, in passing the act of 1865 giving the father the right to apprentice his child, intended to legislate upon a separate and distinct matter from that embraced in section 2502. By the passage of this act after the Code of 1863, embracing the provisions of section 2502 of the present Code, and by retaining these two distinct provisions in all the Codes since its passage, it was evidently the intention that the loss of parental power, as provided in section 2502, meant something other than apprenticing. This section has been construed in several decisions of this court, and it has nowhere been held that a contract releasing the parental power to a third person, referred to in that section, merely related to the apprenticing of a child by its parents. In this connection, see Looney v. Martin, 123 Ga. 209, 51 S. E. 304; Carter v. Brett, 116 Ga. 114, 42 S. E. 348; Lamar v. Harris, 117 Ga. 993, 44 S. E. 866, and other authorities cited in these cases.

We agree with learned counsel for plaintiff that the law never intended that a child should be the subject of bargain and sales, as is property. It was never contemplated that all of the laws governing a contract of bargain and sale of property should apply to a contract whereby a father released control of his child. The law presumes all men honest in their dealings, and likewise presumes that a parent, in disposing of his child, would be actuated by motives that are proper, and that his chief concern would be the welfare of his child. It would be an inhuman, and, indeed, a monstrous act, for a father to dispose of his child as he would a piece of property, solely to relieve himself of his child's care and support, or for any pecuniary considerations. The law, in providing that he could lose his parental power by a voluntary contract, never contemplated that the father would dispose of his child solely for the purposes above stated, nor would it look with favor on any such contract. The state is vitally interested in the existence, and the proper moral, intellectual, and physical training of its children, who are to become its men and women; and in looking to the welfare and well-being of the child itself, when it provided that the father could release his parental power over his child to another, it presumed that the parent would, in making such contracts, always have in mind the interests of his child. We do not think that the Legislature, in the two sections above quoted, meant to provide that the parental power could be lost only by a contract of apprenticeship. Under section 2604 the parent can apprentice his child, and under section 2502 he can lose his parental power by contract which does not involve all the incidents of the contract of apprenticeship, though, as above stated, it did not contemplate a contract with all the incidents of a bargain and sale of property. Moreover, the law provides that in the trial of habeas corpus cases the court shall have the power to give custody of the child to a third person. The law would not permit a person to whom a parent has released his parental control over a child to have its custody, if such person was unfit. One of the main concerns of the court in awarding the custody of the child is the welfare of the child itself, and no parent could make such an absolute disposition of his child that the court could in no event disregard the contract of the parent.

2. Counsel for the plaintiff contends that, if any contract was made by the plaintiff releasing his parental control over his child, it was without consideration, and its terms were not definite and certain. The evidence of Mrs. Fears was to the effect that on the day of the death of the mother of the child the plaintiff gave the child to her, and she agreed to take it and try to raise it, and did then take it. Nothing was said as to the time during which she was to have the child. She took the child, and a few weeks thereafter the father told her that he had given her the child for her life. There were several other witnesses, who testified that thereafter the father made the statement to them that he had given the child to Mrs. Fears. There is testimony by Mr. Fears, one of the defendants, relating to a conversation had with the plaintiff, several weeks after the death of the mother, wherein the plaintiff used the expression, "I have given you my baby, and I am surprised to think you all think I am such a boy, to think I would come in and take the baby away from you." In answer to an inquiry by the court as to what length of time the child was given him by the plaintiff, Mr. Fears answered, "Unlimited. unreservedly," and he further testified concerning this conversation: "I said my wife and I would rather have a contract. * * * I said the baby is a tie that you have given us, and binds you to our hearts as any child we have got." This witness further testified that during the conversation the plaintiff said: "Unreservedly, it is yours; don't you and your wife worry no more about this child." Mr. Fears further testified: "After Eaves told me the baby was ours, I and my wife talked the matter over. My daughter was keeping a boarding house. We decided it was no place to raise a child in a boarding house. I then went and had a home built beyond that, for the purpose of raising this little child, where it could be properly treated and properly trained, without having boarders around it."

Both defendants filed an answer wherein they claimed that the father had made a contract whereby he released his control and rights "to these defendants." It does not appear from any of the testimony in the case that anything was ever agreed upon between the parties as to who should have the proceeds of the labor of the child, or who should maintain and support it; but an absolute, definite, and unconditional gift of a child to another, who takes it with the statement that he would try to raise it, would put such other person in loco parentis to the child, with all the duties and rights of a parent. We do not mean to say that if the facts and circumstances connected with the contract were such as to leave it in serious doubt as to who was to receive the proceeds of the labor of the child, or provide for its maintenance and support, the contract would be sufficiently definite and clear in its terms. But where there are no facts or circumstances from which it might be inferred that the parent, or any one other than the person accepting the child as a gift, is to receive such proceeds or provide such maintenance, the person receiving from the parent the child as a gift would have all of the rights, and would have imposed on him all of the duties of a parent.

In the case of Williams v. Hutchinson, 3 N. Y. 312, 53 Am. Dec. 301, it was ruled: "Persons standing in loco parentis are entitled to the rights and subject to the liabilities of an actual parent, though not legally compelled to assume that relation." In 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1050, the doctrine is laid down that "persons standing in loco parentis to minor children are also bound to support them." In the case of Thorp v. Bateman, 37 Mich. 68, 26 Am. Rep. 497, 498, the court says: "The case made by Bateman was substantially this: That his wife was the grandmother of Thorp's daughter, and the latter was taken into Bateman's family when she was a very young child, where she remained and was supported by Bateman for several years under an agreement that she should live there until she became of legal age; that, Mrs. Bateman having died, Thorp came and took his daughter away against the will of Bateman, and without making any compensation, thereby depriving the latter of the benefit he might have derived from the labor of the daughter afterwards. The action was grounded on an implied assumpsit, and the plaintiff in the court below was allowed to recover. It can hardly be pretended that in the absence of an express arrangement Thorp would have been liable to pay for his daughter's board and support. The presumption always is, when a child is thus taken into a family, that neither support nor services are expected to be compensated, except as the one compensates the other; in other words, that the child comes in as a member of the family, and for the time being occupies substantially the same position as would a member of the family by nature." In 29 Cyc. 1671, it is stated: "A person standing in loco parentis is bound for the maintenance, care, and education of the child, and liable for necessities furnished to it, and he cannot be allowed to assert a claim for the support of the child to whom he stands in such relation, in the absence of an express or implied understanding that he is to be compensated therefor."

In this case there was no express or implied understanding that the defendants were to be compensated for the care and support of the child of the plaintiff, or that they were not entitled to the proceeds of its labor. The law imposes on the father the duty of maintaining and supporting his child; and, while he may release his parental control and contract for this support and maintenance to be furnished by others, we do not mean to hold that he could relieve himself of this legal obligation, were the support not properly furnished by the person with whom he contracted. In 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1050, this text is employed: "A husband is not bound in law to provide for a child of his wife by a former husband; but if he receives such child into his home, and holds him out to the world as a member of his family, he stands to him in loco parentis, and incurs the same liability for his support as in the case of his children. In such case there is no implied contract on the part of the child to pay for its support, and the stepfather cannot, as against the child, charge or recover compensation therefor." In the case of Bentley v. Terry, 59 Ga. 555, 27 Am. Rep. 399, it was held that a contract, though made with the wife by the child's father, will be enforced, if acquiesced in by the husband. On page 557 of 59 Ga. (27 Am. Rep. 399) the court says: "Nor do we think that she could not make such a contract under the circumstances of this case. Her husband acquiesces in it. He joins her in defense of this suit. He received the child at his house, and supports his wife throughout in the transaction. The contract is binding both upon the wife and himself. Besides, this is a sort of matter that the wife will always manage, and the husband must object in time if he does not wish to be bound by her acts. In the case of James v. Cleghorn, 54 Ga. 10, the contract there enforced was with a married woman. But it is clear, in this case, that the husband has ratified all that his wife did." We think the court was authorized, under all the evidence in the present case, to find that the plaintiff had made a contract, sufficiently definite and clear in its terms, releasing his parental control over his child to the defendants, and that there was a sufficient consideration to support the same.

3. The evidence shows that the plaintiff and the defendants are all able to maintain and rear the child, and there was no question made in the evidence as to the fitness of the father, or the grandparents, to raise her. She has been with the grandparents since she was a few days old, and has known no other home. They were boarding when they received her; but, thinking it would be better for the child to raise her in a home of their own, rather than in a boarding house, they ceased boarding and built a home, to which they moved. The evidence shows them to be greatly attached to the child, that they treat her with loving kindness, and evince for her the deep affection which grandparents usually feel for their grandchildren. There were no errors committed on the trial of which complaint is made which require the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

SCOTT v. STATE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 236*)—INTENT—INSTRUCTIONS.

Under the evidence disclosed in the record, a charge of the court that "if you should find in this case that the defendant used a weapon, a shotgun, and that was a weapon in its nature likely to produce death, and that he, in shooting that gun, shot and killed the party alleged in the bill of indictment, intending to shoot her, that if there were no circumstances which would justify or mitigate the shooting, he would none the less be guilty of murder, although at the time he so shot he might not have intended to take the life of the party whom he shot," was not open to the criticism that it was injurious to the defendant, in "that it relieved the state from the legal duty upon it to show a specific intention to kill at the moment the fatal shot was fired, and left the jury to infer from the court's charge that the defendant would be guilty of murder if he shot his wife without an intention to kill her, and that the shooting was not accidental."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 586; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 922*) — NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS—FAILURE TO INSTRUCT.

In the absence of a timely written request, failure to give instructions upon the subject of impeachment of witnesses is not cause for the reversal of a judgment refusing a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2216; Dec. Dig. § 922.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 956*)—NEW TRIAL—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUROR—MOTION—AFFIDAVITS—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a defendant, after conviction, seeks a new trial on the ground of partiality of one of the jurors, shown by certain declarations of the juror made before his acceptance, it is incumbent on the defendant, on the hearing of the motion for new trial, to prove affirmatively that neither he nor his counsel had knowledge of the alleged disqualification of the juror before the rendition of the verdict.

Testimony of the witness by whom the alleged disqualification was sought to be proved, merely to the effect that, after hearing the juror make the disqualifying declarations, he, the witness, had not communicated them either to defendant or his counsel before the rendition of the verdict, was not sufficient to show want of such knowledge by defendant or his counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2385, 2386; Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

4. ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR ABANDONED.

In the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error before this court the ground of the motion for new trial which related to newly discovered evidence was expressly abandoned. The evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Chattooga County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Luke Scott was convicted of murder, and he brings error. Affirmed.

F. W. Copeland and C. D. Rivers, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Ennis, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

ATKINSON, J. The defendant was convicted of murder, with recommendation that he be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for life. He moved for a new trial, which being refused, exception was taken by writ of error to this court. The evidence disclosed that the deceased was the wife of the defendant, and that the cause of her death was a wound inflicted by the defendant by discharging a gun loaded with small shot, which took effect in the calf of her leg. The theory of the defense was accident.

1. One of the grounds of the motion for new trial complained that the court erred in charging: "If you should find in this case that the defendant used a weapon, a shotgun, and that was a weapon in its nature likely to produce death, and that he, in shooting that gun, shot and killed the party alleged in the bill of indictment, intending to shoot her, that if there were no circumstances which would justify or mitigate the shooting, he would none the less be guilty of murder, although at the time he shot he might not have intended to take the life of the party whom he shot." The criticism made upon the charge was "that it relieved the state from the legal duty upon it to show a specific intention to kill at the moment the fatal shot was fired, and left the jury to infer from the court's charge that the defendant would be guilty of murder if he shot his wife without an intention to kill her, and that the shooting was not accidental." Inasmuch as death actually ensued as a result of the gunshot, the charge of the court was sustained by the rulings reported in the cases stated below, and was not sufficient cause for the grant of a new trial. Stovall v. State, 106 Ga. 443, 447, 32 S. E. 586; Freeman v. State, 70 Ga. 736, 739; Collier v. State, 39 Ga. 31, 99 Am. Dec. 449; Hill v. State, 41 Ga. 485; Chelsey v. State, 121 Ga. 340, 344, 49 S. E. 258; Napper v. State, 123 Ga. 573, 51 S. E. 592.

2. Another ground of the motion for a new trial was: "Movant further contends that evidence was introduced by defendant to impeach the witness Lee Shropshire, who testified for the state, and without whose testimony, as defendant contends, there could have been no conviction, and the court failed to refer to said impeaching testimony in its charge, on which account movant contends he was deprived of a legal trial." This ground of the motion fails to set forth or otherwise specify the impeaching testimony relied on; but, aside from this, a judgment refusing a new trial on a ground complaining of a failure to charge the law with regard to impeachment of witnesses, where no timely written request was made for such charge, will not be reversed. Caesar v. State, 127 Ga. 710, 57 S. E. 66.

3. Another ground of the motion for new trial was as follows: "Movant further amends, and says a new trial should be granted on account of the partiality of one of the twelve jurors that found defendant guilty, and because of his prejudice against defendant when he qualified as a juror in said case, as shown in the affidavit of D. W. Ledford, hereto attached as a part of this amendment." The affidavit referred to was as follows: "Affiant is a bailiff in said court, and in such capacity has been in attendance upon said court and its trial juries at the present September term, 1908; that he knows C. F. Hense, who was one of the jurors who tried defendant and returned a verdict of guilty against him at said term; and affiant says that he heard said above-named juror say, prior to being sworn and accepted as a juror in the above-stated cause, and while serving as a juror in another case. Affiant says that he never communicated these facts to defendant, or to either of his counsel, until after the conviction of defendant; that he heard C. F. Hense say that he did not care if he did get on the jury to try Luke Scott, that it would not take long to hang him; that said Luke Scott ought to be mobbed, and that said C. F. Hense was then talking of the above-stated cause." There was no affidavit from the defendant or his counsel to the effect that they did not know of the alleged disqualification of the juror. In this respect the motion was defective.

If the defendant or his counsel knew of the incompetency of the juror before verdict, they should have complained then, without waiting to take the chance of any benefit that might flow from a favorable verdict, and, as the presumptions are all in favor of the legality of the verdict, the burden of proof rested upon the defendant to show that neither he nor his counsel knew of the disqualification before verdict. There was no attempt made to prove these negatives, except by the affidavit of the witness offered to impeach the competency of the juror. He merely said that "he never communicated these facts to defendant, or to either of his counsel, until after the conviction of defendant." That is insufficient, because others may have heard the remarks made by the juror, and may have communicated them to the defendant or his counsel, or the witness may have told others what he had heard the juror say, and they may have informed the defendant or his counsel. The requisite proof on questions of this kind is usually made by affidavits of the defendant and his counsel, in which they expressly deny having had knowledge of the existence of the incompetency of the juror at any time before the verdict. This was done in Glover v. State, 128 Ga. 1, 57 S. E. 101, and Moncrief v. State, 59 Ga. 470, and other cases where judgments refusing motions for new trials have been reversed.

4. The statement made in the fourth headnote needs no further reference.

MANRY et al. v. TWITTY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 19, 1909.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—DEFAULT—OPENING—TIME FOR APPLICATION.

Where an application by petition to open an entry of default was made at the trial term of the superior court, in which it was alleged that, when the appearance term convened, the petitioner was not physically able to attend court, that he had employed attorneys and given them full information in regard to his defense and instructed them to file an answer, which he thought they would do, that his attorneys, not finding him at court, did not file any defense, but where it failed to show any reason why the defendant's presence was necessary to the filing of the answer, or that he was sick and unable to be present at or before the time during the continuance of the term when the docket was called and the default entered, or that he had taken any steps for about eight months after the commencement of the return term, alleging that he then discovered the entry of default and moved to open it, the petition was demurrable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 281; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 143*)—DEFAULT—OPENING.

If the evidence placed before the court be considered, it showed affirmatively that the default was not entered for about three months after the return term of the court convened, and no excuse for the delay in filing the defense during that time appeared.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Mitchell County; J. H. Scaife, Judge pro hac.

Petition by W. H. Manry and another to open a default judgment taken against them by W. C. Twitty. The petition was denied, and petitioners bring error. Affirmed.

On July 23, 1908, W. H. Manry and his wife presented to the judge presiding in the superior court of Mitchell county, then in session during an adjourned term, a petition, alleging in brief as follows: They reside in said county. On October 1, 1907, W. C. Twitty filed in the office of the clerk of the superior court an action against the present petitioners to recover certain land. The case was returnable to the October term, 1907, of the court, and service was perfected on the defendants. W. H. Manry, representing himself and wife, went to the county seat and employed a firm of attorneys to represent them in the case. He delivered to the attorneys the copies of the plaintiff's petition which had been served on the defendants, together with their titles to the land in question, made to the attorneys a full and complete statement of the status of the case, and directed them to file the defense to the suit at the October term; but at that term W. H. Manry was sick and unable to attend court, and his attorneys, not finding him there, did not file a defense to the action. "When the October term, 1907, of said court convened, which was the return term of said case, petitioner W. H. Manry was not physically able to attend said court, but thought that said attorneys whom they had employed to file their defense would attend to the same." He would have been present at that term of the court, had he not been sick. The defendants did not know that the case was in default until the term when the petition was filed (April adjourned term, 1908). They came to court prepared to go into the trial, and upon inquiry as to the status of the case they learned that it had been marked in default at the October term, 1907. They have a legal, meritorious defense to the suit; the husband holding bond for title to the land and the right of possession thereto, having purchased it in 1906 and having from that date been in peaceable possession thereof. The wife is not interested in the land. There is in fact but about two-fifths of an acre involved in the litigation, but upon it the husband, since its purchase, has erected improvements of the value of $200 or more, and these were made before the action to recover the land was begun. In a dispute as to the correctness of the land line, processioners, with the county surveyor, after having given to Twitty and other parties interested due and legal notice, surveyed the line of the tract, and their finding was in favor of Manry. They tendered the costs, announced that they were ready to proceed to trial, and prayed that the judgment of default be opened.

Twitty demurred to the petition because it set forth no legal reason for opening the default, and because no legal or meritorious defense was filed with the motion or set out therein. Thereupon the petitioners tendered an answer to the original suit, which admitted possession in Manry, denied that the plaintiff had title or that the defendants had received mesne profits of the value alleged by the plaintiff, admitted that they refused to deliver possession to the plaintiff, and alleged that Manry claimed title to the land under bond for title from H. H. Merritt, made March 1, 1908. On the hearing of the motion the respondent directed the attention of the judge to the records of the court in which the suit was pending, and tendered them as evidence. The court admitted them over objection. They showed that at the October term, 1907, the court remained in session from the 21st to the 25th of October, and was adjourned until January 20, 1908, and remained in session from that date until January 28th, when the October term was finally adjourned. The docket showed that the entry of judgment by default had been made at the October term, 1907. It was admitted that the case had been called in open court but once since it was filed—that is, when the entry of judgment by default was entered—and also that the record did not show that the entry of judgment by default had been made on the last day of the court, or on any other day previously fixed by order of the court for the calling of the appearance docket. After considering the motion to open the default, the records of the court, and the defense tendered by the movants, the judge entered the following order: "Upon hearing this demurrer, the same is hereby sustained, and the motion to open the default judgment is hereby refused and denied." The plaintiff in the original suit was then allowed by the court to take a verdict by default, without the introduction of evidence, and the movants excepted.

E. E. Cox, for plaintiffs in error. Pope & Bennet, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is not altogether clear whether the presiding judge intended his order to operate as a dismissal on demurrer of the motion to open the default, or as a refusal of the motion upon the facts presented both by the pleadings and evidence. The order stated that the demurrer was sustained, but also added that the motion to open the default was refused and denied. But, in whichever light it is regarded, it must be affirmed, because neither on the face of the application, nor with the addition of the facts disclosed by the evidence, was the movant entitled to have the default opened. If the records of the court be considered in connection with the motion, it appears that the suit was brought to the October term, 1907, of the court of the county in which the defendants resided, as well as where the land lay; that the term of the court met on October 21st, and continued for five days, when it was adjourned until the 20th of January following, and remained in session until January 28th; and that the judgment of default was not entered until during the adjourned term. There is no evidence that during all that time Manry was sick or unable to attend court; nor is there anything to show why the defense could not have been filed during this period of about three months after the commencement of the return term; nor is any reason shown why his being sick, so that he could not attend court, rendered it impossible or even difficult for him or his attorneys to file a defense.

If the evidence be not considered, but only the written motion to open the default, it failed to state a case which would entitle the movant to have the application granted. On the face of the petition or motion it was alleged that the defendants in the suit to recover the land were duly served, and knew that the October term, 1907, was the return term at which they must plead; that Manry, on behalf of himself and wife, employed a firm of attorneys, delivered to them the copies of the petition and process which had been served on the defendants, together with their title to the land, made to the attorneys a full statement of the status, and directed them to file a defense at the return term. The only excuse for the failure to plead was that at the October term "defendant W. H. Manry was sick and unable to attend court, and his attorneys, not finding him here, did not file a defense to said case." Immediately after this statement followed the allegation that "when the October term, 1907, of said court convened, which was the return term of said case, petitioner W. H. Manry was not physically able to attend said court, but thought that said attorneys whom they had employed to file their defense would attend to the same. Defendant W. H. Manry would have been present at this term of the court, had he not been sick." The petition does not allege that Manry was sick at the time when the default was entered, and it fails to allege when such entry was made. The evidence which the judge admitted may furnish the reason for this omission; but on the face of the motion the entire failure to state the character of this malady, or how serious it was, or how long it continued, or that it existed when the default was entered, is significant. If, as he alleged, he had attorneys, and furnished to them all the information and data necessary for the filing of an answer, and instructed them to do so, it is not apparent how his absence from the court caused a failure to plead at the proper time, or why his presence at court was necessary at all for the purpose of filing an answer. It may, indeed, be conjectured that possibly the payment of a retainer required by his attorneys, or the performance of some other act not disclosed in his pleadings, was necessary as a condition precedent to his having a right to rely upon their representing him and filing pleadings on his behalf. But the causal connection between his absence from court and the absence from the file of an answer in due time is left to surmise.

When the answer to the original suit which Manry now proposes to file is inspected, the fact that his presence for the mere purpose of filing it was unnecessary is patent. It was not required to be verified. It consists of less than half a page of typewritten matter, in which he admits that he is in possession of the land and refuses to deliver it to the plaintiff, and denies that the plaintiff is the owner of it, or is entitled to it, or that the defendant has received mesne profits of the yearly value alleged by the plaintiff. To this is added the following statement: "Defendant W. H. Manry claims title to said land under bond for title from H. H. Merritt, made March 1, 1908." It needs no argument to show that Manry's sickness when the October term of court convened furnished no reason why such an answer could not have been filed before the call of the docket and the entry of the default at some time during the term. The defendant took no action until the April adjourned term, 1908, which was held on July 23d, eight months after the convening of the October term, 1907, when he made his motion to open the default, alleging that he had come prepared to try the case. Neither the allegations nor the evidence (if considered) showed any ground requiring the opening of the default "for providential cause preventing the filing of a plea, or for excusable negligence." The presiding judge correctly declined to open it. Civ. Code 1895, § 5072; Moore v. Kelly & Jones Co., 109 Ga. 799, 35 S. E. 168; Ingalls v. Lamar, 115 Ga. 296, 41 S. E. 573; Brucker v. O'Connor, 115 Ga. 96, 41 S. E. 245; Kellam v. Todd, 114 Ga. 983, 41 S. E. 39.

It was not contended that there was any other error which infected the final judgment, except the refusal to open the default.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MITCHELL v. MASURY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 784*)—DISMISSAL—GROUNDS.

It is no ground to dismiss a bill of exceptions that the certificate thereto directs the clerk to transmit it and the record of the case to the Court of Appeals, where that court, on receipt and examination of the record, being of the opinion that the case is one of which the Supreme Court, and not that court, has jurisdiction, orders the case dismissed from its files and the bill of exceptions and record transmitted to the Supreme Court; it further appearing from an inspection of the record that the Supreme Court has exclusive jurisdiction of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3126; Dec. Dig. § 784.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 783*)—DISMISSAL—GROUNDS.

It is no ground for the dismissal of a bill of exceptions that the brief of evidence considered by the judge in passing on a motion for new trial was not filed pursuant to the order of the judge providing for the filing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3125; Dec. Dig. § 783.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 627*)—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—TIME FOR FILING.

Where a motion for new trial is filed in term, and, contemporaneously with the grant of a rule nisi calling on the respondent to show cause why the motion should not be granted, the judge passes an order providing "that the movant have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in the said case, the presiding judge may enter his approval thereon at any time, either in term or vacation, and if the hearing of the motion shall be in vacation, and the brief of the evidence has not been filed in the clerk's office before the date of the hearing, said brief of the evidence may be filed in the clerk's office at any time within 10 days after the motion is heard and determined," and where at the hearing the brief of evidence is approved by the judge and considered by him in passing on the motion for new trial, and where the brief is thereafter filed in the clerk's office more than 10 days after the hearing and determination of the motion for new trial, on the same day the bill of exceptions is certified, and the brief of evidence is incorporated in the record sent to this court by specification in the bill of exceptions, this court will not refuse to consider such assignments of error as depend on the evidence for adjudication, merely because the brief of evidence was not filed with the clerk within 10 days of the disposition of the motion for new trial.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 303*)—DISPOSSESSORY PROCEEDINGS—AMENDMENT.

An affidavit, which is the basis of a dispossession warrant, and the warrant, after the filing of the counter affidavit, become mesne process, and are amendable by striking out the representative character of the landlord, and allowing the case to proceed in his individual name.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 303*)—DISPOSSESSORY PROCEEDINGS—AMENDMENT.

An undated affidavit to dispossess a tenant may be amended by supplying the date, on the trial of an issue formed by the tenant's counter affidavit.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1042*)—HARMLESS ERROR—RULINGS ON PLEADINGS.

Under the statutory affidavit the tenant can raise the issue that no oath was administered to or taken by the person subscribing the alleged dispossession affidavit. Even if this issue could also be raised by special plea, the striking thereof by the court will not require a new trial, where the defendant is allowed to make the issue under his counter affidavit, and the jury are instructed by the court as to the appropriate law.

7. TRIAL (§ 193*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION.

8. AFFIDAVITS (§ 11*)—OATH.

If an affiant, at the time of tendering the affidavit to the officer, uses language signifying that he consciously takes upon himself the obligation of an oath, and the officer so understands, and immediately signs the jurat, this will amount to such concurrence of act and intention as will constitute a legal swearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Affidavits, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

9. NEW TRIAL (§ 18*)—GROUNDS—REFUSAL TO STRIKE PLEADINGS.

The refusal of the court, on oral motion, to strike pleadings as insufficient, is not a proper ground of a motion for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 690*)—RECORD—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

An assignment of error that the court allowed the testimony of a named witness to be withdrawn from the jury's consideration is insufficient, where the substance of the testimony is not made to appear. The testimony may have been irrelevant and harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2897; Dec. Dig. § 690.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 690*)—RECORD—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Thomas County; C. P. Hansell, Judge pro hac.

Action by Grace Masury against J. W. H. Mitchell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Fondrew Mitchell and Roscoe Luke, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Merrill and Haygood & Cutts, for defendant in error.

EVANS, P. J. 1-3. On the call of the case the defendant in error moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions, on the ground that the certificate thereto directed that it and the record be transmitted to the Court of Appeals, and, as the Court of Appeals had no jurisdiction of the case, no bill of exceptions had been legally filed in the Supreme Court. It appears from the record that the Court of Appeals, on an examination of the record, passed an order directing that the case be dismissed from its files, and that the bill of exceptions and the record be transmitted to the Supreme Court. The record was accordingly transmitted, and on an inspection thereof it appears that the Supreme Court has sole jurisdiction of the case; and under the ruling in Dawson v. State, 130 Ga. 127, 60 S. E. 315, such case will be retained and entered on the docket of the Supreme Court for hearing and determination. Nor will the writ of error be dismissed on the ground stated in the second headnote. Cook v. Childers, 94 Ga. 718, 19 S. E. 819.

Counsel for plaintiff in error make the further point that, even if the failure to dismiss the bill of exceptions on the ground that the brief of evidence considered by the judge in passing on the motion for a new trial was not filed pursuant to the order of the court, still such brief should be disregarded, and such assignments as are dependent upon the evidence for determination present no question for decision. Where a term order allows the movant until the hearing to make out and present a brief of the evidence for the approval of the court, and to file the same with the clerk within 10 days thereafter, it has been held that a brief which has been approved by the judge, but not filed in the clerk's office at the time of the hearing, is sufficient to prevent the dismissal of the motion for a new trial. Elmore v. Thaggard, 130 Ga. 701, 61 S. E. 726. The brief of evidence is an essential part of a motion for new trial, and its approval by the judge under an order allowing him to do so at the hearing, and making provision for its subsequent filing, is the legal equivalent of an entry of filing upon the brief by the clerk. Malsby v. Young, 104 Ga. 205, 30 S. E. 854. Such being the case, the limitation of time in the order providing for such subsequent filing after the hearing is necessarily directory, and not mandatory; and if the brief in point of fact be filed by the time the bill of exceptions is certified, and such brief be specified in the bill of exceptions as a part of the record, and accordingly transmitted, this court will consider and pass upon such assignments of error as depend upon an examination of the evidence for their determination.

4. The case under consideration arose in this manner: On October 11, 1900, Mrs. Grace Masury leased in writing to J. W. H. Mitchell, for a term of five years, a certain house and lot for $200 per annum, payable quarterly in advance. On June 6, 1905, Mitchell wrote to Mrs. Masury, proposing to renew the lease for the same term of years, to which Mrs. Masury replied, June 20, 1905, as follows: "Mr. John W. H. Mitchell, Thomasville, Ga.—Dear Sir: Your favor of 6th instant came to hand to-day, and in reply would say I am willing that you should release the property on which you are now living at the same rate. At the extremely low rate which you pay, it seems to me that you could keep the premises in slightly better repair. The renewal of the lease can be drawn by my son-in-law, Mr. Sturgis, before the present one expires; and after the signing of the new lease you will kindly pay the rent to me directly. Mr. Sturgis will acquaint Mr. Mallette of this plan in due time. June 20, 1905. Yours truly, [Signed] (Mrs.) Grace Masury, per E. M. S." Mitchell remained in possession, paying rent according to the terms of the expired lease, and in April, 1906, Sturgis and Mitchell had an interview relative to the preparation of a new lease. Sturgis prepared a lease contract, and sent it to Mitchell for signature, who refused to sign it. On August 24, 1907, Mrs. Masury gave Mitchell written notice that she had agreed to sell the place, and for him to vacate. Mitchell declined to surrender possession, and on November 16, 1907, Mrs.

Masury sued out a dispossessory warrant. Mitchell filed the statutory counter affidavit thereto, and on February 4, 1908, Mrs. Masury dismissed her proceedings. On the same day, but after the dismissal of the dispossessory warrant proceedings, Mrs. Masury's attorney, W. C. Snodgrass, made affidavit as attorney for Mrs. Masury, executrix of the last will and testament of John W. Masury, deceased, that Mitchell occupied the premises (the same as described in the former proceedings) as a tenant at will; that demand was made for the same on August 14, 1907; that there was $50 past-due rent, which rent was demanded after due, and payment refused. An eviction warrant issued, and Mitchell filed, with the officer to whom it was given to execute, his counter affidavit denying that he was a tenant holding over, and denying that he was due any rent. The affidavit and warrant of the landlord and the counter affidavit of the tenant were returned to the superior court for trial, and the plaintiff prevailed.

At the trial the plaintiff moved to amend the affidavit and eviction warrant by striking therefrom the words, "executrix of the last will and testament of John W. Masury, deceased," so that the cause may proceed in the name of Grace Masury. The amendment was allowed, and pendente lite exceptions were taken. All affidavits that are the foundation of legal proceedings are amendable to the same extent as ordinary declarations. Civ. Code 1895, § 5122. In an action by or against an executor, the declaration may be amended by striking out the representative character of the plaintiff. Civ. Code 1895, § 5106.

5. The defendant moved to strike the affidavit because it was undated, and the court allowed the date to be supplied by amendment. The allowance of this amendment was proper. Civ. Code 1895, § 5106.

6. At the trial term the defendant filed his plea in abatement on the ground that no oath was administered to or taken by the person who subscribed the alleged affidavit upon which the eviction warrant issued. The court struck the plea, and exception pendente lite was taken. It is immaterial to decide whether this defense could have been made by special plea, because, after the court made this ruling, the defendant, on his own initiative, examined as witnesses both the person alleged to have made the affidavit and the magistrate before whom it is alleged to have been made as to the execution of the affidavit, and whether any oath was administered at the time, and the court instructed the jury on this subject. The defendant was allowed to make the defense, notwithstanding his plea in abatement was stricken, and can have no real ground for complaint because of the refusal of the court to separately submit the issue. See Le Master v. Orr, 101 Ga. 762, 29 S. E. 32.

7. On the trial, in addition to the facts already appearing, evidence was introduced by the plaintiff tending to show that some time in April, 1906, Sturgis (the plaintiff's attorney) and Mitchell met and agreed upon the terms of a lease, which Sturgis reduced to writing according to his understanding of the agreement. One of these terms was that the landlord reserved the right to sell the premises on 60 days' notice. Sturgis sent the lease contract to Mitchell for execution, who refused to sign it. Mitchell testified that he did not sign the lease contract which Sturgis prepared, because its terms were different from the old lease, which was renewed by Mrs. Masury's letter of June 20th. The old lease expired October 1, 1905, and from that time to January 1, 1908, Mitchell has paid the rent to Mrs. Masury. The court charged: "In this case it is agreed that Mr. Mitchell, the defendant, was a tenant of Mrs. Masury of the property known as the Blackshear place, on the Boston road, on the outskirts of Thomasville, and that Mrs. Masury is seeking to recover the possession of that property from the tenant on two grounds—that he is a tenant at will, a tenant holding over beyond his term, who becomes, under such circumstances as testified here, a tenant at will; that is, if he holds beyond his term, and the landlord accepts rent from him, allows him to go on, accepts rent, that makes him a tenant at will." The criticism is that the court expressed an opinion that under the testimony in the case the defendant was a tenant at will. The defendant in his pleading and in his testimony denied that he was a tenant at will. It was his contention that his letter and Mrs. Masury's reply extended the provisions of the old contract for a period of five years; while the landlord contended that the letter disclosed on its face that it was not to be considered as closing up a lease contract, but only indicated her willingness to re-lease the property at the same rate. It is not altogether clear that the landlord intended by her letter that the new lease should embrace all the terms and covenants of the old lease, or only that the proposition as to rental price was absolutely accepted, leaving the other provisions, such as duration of term, etc., to be incorporated in the new lease. But Mitchell rejected the lease contract prepared by Sturgis in the spring of 1906, and continued to pay rent, according to his contention, pursuant to the obligation of the old contract, until January 1, 1908, and that the rent was received by Mrs. Masury with knowledge that he was relying upon her letter as extending the old contract, with all its provisions, for five years; and, if the jury should find such was the truth of the case, then Mitchell would not be a tenant at will. The charge was hurtful for the reason given.

8. Exception is taken to this charge: "There must be enough before you to satisfy your mind that the party making the affidavit meant to swear to it, and the officer so understood it—meant to swear to it, and to swear to the truth of it, and attest it." The court was instructing the jury upon the question as to whether there had been any affidavit made upon which the dispossessory warrant issued, and the criticism is that an intention to make an affidavit is treated as the equivalent of its actual execution. The excerpt to which exception is taken is but a fragment of what the court charged. The jury were instructed in the same connection: "There is no special form of words necessary to constitute an oath; but it is necessary for enough to be said by affiant to indicate to the officer that he wanted to swear to it, and did swear to it, and the officer so understood it, and accepted it as such, and signed it accordingly." According to the ruling in McCain v. Bonner, 122 Ga. 846, 51 S. E. 36, there was no error in the full instruction.

9-11. Than as otherwise indicated, no cause for a new trial is made to appear.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

WYNN v. GEORGIA RY. & ELECTRIC CO.
 (No. 1,513.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 250*)—TENDER OF FARE—SUFFICIENCY.

A passenger upon a public conveyance may tender to the common carrier a larger sum than the amount due as fare in payment thereof, and require the carrier to return the change. The sum tendered, however, must be a reasonable amount, and not unduly disproportionate to the amount of the fare.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1001; Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 250*)—TENDER OF FARE—REQUEST FOR CHANGE—SUFFICIENCY.

A street railway company may enact and enforce a reasonable rule limiting the amount of change its conductors shall be required to make, when a sum in excess of the fare is tendered by the passenger. A rule that the conductors shall make change to an amount not exceeding $2 is reasonable; and, where such a rule exists, the tender of a $5 bill in payment of the 5-cent fare, with a request for a return of the change, is not a good tender of the fare.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 1001; Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by W. A. Wynn against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Wynn brought suit against the Georgia Railway & Electric Company for damages on account of being refused passage on one of its street cars. The case was heard before the trial judge upon a stipulation as to the facts as follows: "At the time and place named in the petition, plaintiff offered the conductor of defendant's car a $5 bill, to pay the regular fare of 5 cents for passage on the car. This $5 bill was the smallest change plaintiff had in his possession. The conductor refused to take said $5 bill, and to take plaintiff's fare out of it, for the reason that the conductor did not have change for said $5 bill. There was at the time in force a rule of the defendant requiring its conductors to keep on hand change to the amount of $2, and not requiring them to keep on hand any greater amount of change than $2. The conductor, when plaintiff offered the $5 bill, and refused to pay fare in any other way, stopped the car and expelled plaintiff therefrom." The judge found in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff excepts.

Moore & Branch, for plaintiff in error.
Rosser & Brandon and Ben J. Conyers, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. In ordinary commercial transactions the tender made for the payment of any debt ought to be for the exact sum due. The tender of a larger sum is good, however, provided a return of the balance is not required; but, if the tender of the larger sum is coupled with a demand for the return of the change, the person to whom the tender is made may decline to accept it. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 17, 18. This rule, however, is not strictly applicable to passengers on public conveyances; the rule in such cases being that the passenger need not tender the exact fare, but may tender a reasonable sum and require a return of the difference between the actual fare and the amount tendered. 6 Cyc. 547; 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 167.

2. But few cases have arisen involving the question as to what would be a reasonable tender by a passenger upon a street car where the fare is only 5 cents. As in other matters affecting its relations with the public, which have not been made the subject-matter of statute or specific regulation by the general law, the carrier has a right to make reasonable rules touching the question as to how large a coin or bill it will accept and make change from as a tender for fare by the passenger. In the case of Barrett v. Market Street R. Co., 81 Cal. 296, 22 Pac. 359, 6 L. R. A. 336, 15 Am. St. Rep. 61, where it appeared the company had not promulgated a rule upon the subject, it was held that the tender of a $5 gold coin for a fare of 5 cents was not unreasonable. This case, so far as we have been able to find, is the only one holding so large a tender to be reasonable in such a case. In the case of Knoxville Traction Co. v. Wilkerson, 117 Tenn. 482, 99 S. W. 992, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579, the company had a rule requiring passengers to present, in payment of the 5-cent fare, a bill or coin not exceeding $5; and this was held reasonable. In Barker v. Central Park R. Co., 151 N. Y. 238, 45 N. E. 550, 35 L. R. A. 489, 56 Am. St. Rep. 626, it was held that, where the street railway company required its conductors to accept any amount up to $2, the rule was reasonable, and the tender of $5 in payment of the fare was not a good tender. This case cites and distinguishes the California case, cited above, pointing out that in that case there was no rule on the subject, and also that the decision was probably influenced by the fact, noticed in the course of the opinion in the California case, that in that state at that time the $5 gold piece was the smallest gold coin in general use among the people. The ruling in the case of Barker v. Central Park R. Co., supra, was followed in the case of Muldowney v. Pittsburg, etc., Traction Co., 8 Pa. Super. Ct. 335. In the case at bar the street railway company had a rule limiting the amount of change to be made by the conductor to $2. We agree with the New York and the Pennsylvania courts that this rule is reasonable, and that the tender of a $5 bill in payment of 5-cent fare is unreasonable.

Judgment affirmed.

HUNTLEY MFG. CO. v. NIXON GROCERY CO. (No. 1,357.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 588*)—RECORD—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—COMPLIANCE WITH STATUTE—NECESSITY.

There is no brief of the evidence in this case, as required by Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5484, 5488. What purports to be a brief of the evidence consists of a lengthy correspondence between the parties, the many letters being given in full, with no attempt to brief their contents. This court cannot undertake to winnow the wheat from the chaff, or separate the material from the immaterial, in the evidence. This work can be better done by the attorneys; and, unless the statute is complied with in this respect, an affirmance must result, where the questions to be decided depend upon a consideration of the evidence. In this case the only question presented for decision depends upon the construction of the evidence; and, there being no proper brief of the evidence, the judgment must be affirmed. Hirsch v. Dozier Lumber Co., 2 Ga. App. 520, 58 S. E. 786; Harris v. McArthur, 90 Ga. 217, 15 S. E. 758.

Notice of the sanction of a writ of certiorari and of the time and place of the hearing must be given to the defendant in certiorari at least 10 days before the sitting of the court to which the certiorari is returnable. It appearing in this case that the notice, which was sent by mail, did not reach opposing counsel until the ninth day before the sitting of the court, the judge erred in not dismissing the certiorari on motion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Whitfield County; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Certiorari by J. A. Speer against T. M. Rollins. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Speer sued out a certiorari, and filed it in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Whitfield county on March 25, 1908. The next term of the superior court of that county convened on the first Monday in April, and therefore under the law the certiorari was triable at the next succeeding term of the court, which convened on the second Monday in October, which came on the 12th of October. More than 10 days prior to the April term of the court the attorney for the plaintiff in certiorari mailed to the attorney for the defendant in certiorari the statutory notice of the sanction of the writ, stating that it would be tried at the April term of the court. Discovering later that the writ was returnable to the October term, he on the 2d day of October mailed another notice to opposing counsel. However, it appears that opposing counsel did not receive it until October 3d, which was only 9 days before the sitting of the court. When the case was called for a hearing, the defendant in certiorari moved to dismiss on the ground that notice of sanction had not been given as required by law. The judge overruled the motion and sustained the certiorari, to both of which rulings the defendant in certiorari excepted.

M. C. Tarver, for plaintiff in error. J. M. Rudolph, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). Personally we dislike to give this case the direction which our opinion as judges leads us to believe it should take. The certiorari was meritorious, and the judge's action in sustaining it would be unhesitatingly affirmed, if we did not deem he had erred in refusing to dismiss the case. The provision of our Code requiring that the statutory notice of the sanction of the writ and of the time and place of hearing shall be served upon opposing counsel at least 10 days before the sitting of the court to which the writ is returnable is mandatory, and failure to give the notice, except in providential cases, results in the dismissal of the case, irrespective of the merits. The first notice given in this case was clearly insufficient, because it designated the wrong term. The second notice, while mailed on the tenth day before the sitting of the court, was not received until the next day, and therefore was too late.

Upon this question we think that the cases of Butler v. Farley, 99 Ga. 631, 25 S. E. 853, and Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Bailey, 115 Ga. 725, 42 S. E. 89, 61 L. R. A. 933, are controlling. The only legitimate deduction from these cases is that, while the notice may be sent by mail, it must at least appear that the notice was deposited in the post office at such a time as that in the ordinary course of mail it would be received by the addressee within the time prescribed by the statute. Indeed, the cases just cited lean strongly to the conclusion that notice by mail would not be sufficient, unless the letter containing the notice, even though posted in time to have reached the addressee by due course of mail within due time, did actually so reach him. However, we need not pass upon that question now, for it does not appear from this record that the letter was mailed at such a time as that it ought to have been delivered earlier than the morning of the 3d. This, as we have said, was too late.

Judgment reversed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1004*)—REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

The plaintiffs sued upon a promissory note. The defendants pleaded partial failure of consideration. Under the plea and the testimony the verdict against the defendants should in no event have been for less than $433. It was for only about one-third of that sum. Irrespective of other exceptions, the verdict must be set aside, upon the complaint of the plaintiff, on the ground that it is contrary to law and evidence.

Max E. Land and Walter F. Hall, for plaintiff in error. Hal Lawson, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This is a suit on a note for principal, interest, and attorney's fees. On the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount of the suit. In this court the plaintiff in error expressly abandons all the assignments of error except as to the direction of a verdict for attorney's fees. He contends that, under the plea and the evidence, the question as to whether he had been served with the statutory notice claiming attorney's fees was issuable, and that the direction of a verdict for attorney's fees was therefore erroneous.

The evidence on this subject, briefly stated, is as follows: The attorney for the plaintiff testified that he prepared a written notice in form for attorney's fees and gave it to his client, with direction to have it timely served on the defendant. The client testified that on the same day he received the notice from his attorney he delivered it to one Livingston, with direction to serve it on the defendant, and that Livingston immediately thereafter reported to him that he had served it on the defendant. Livingston also testified that he remembered serving on the defendant the paper given to him by the plaintiff, but did not remember the date on which he served it, and did not know what the paper was. The defendant testified: "I don't think Livingston served any notice of attorney's fees on me in this case. That is my recollection. I haven't any paper that he served on me, that I remember."

While the testimony of the defendant was vague, indefinite, and uncertain, it cannot be said that it was not sufficient to make the question of service of the notice of attorney's fees issuable, and, although fragile, is of sufficient strength to be submitted to the jury. The want of recollection by some men of the existence of a fact might be considered as weighty as the positive recollection of some other men that the fact did not exist. The weight of the testimony, whether positive or negative, is for the jury, and ordinarily they are not bound to accept positive in preference to negative testimony. Hunter v. State, 4 Ga. App. 761, 62 S. E. 466. Whether the defendant was served with the notice of attorney's fees should have been submitted to the jury.

The judgment is affirmed, on condition that the defendant in error write off from the judgment the amount of attorney's fees; otherwise, the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment affirmed, on condition.

MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 116, 177, 216*)—SAFE PLACE IN WHICH TO WORK—TEMPORARY STRUCTURES—FELLOW SERVANTS—NEGLIGENCE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—NEGLECT OF MASTER.

The master is not, under his general duty of respecting the servant's safety, held to the same quantum of care in the erection of platforms and scaffolds intended only for temporary use as he is in the building and maintenance of more permanent structures. If the servant is hurt by reason of the fact that, while he and fellow servants are attempting to handle a heavy object upon a temporary work scaffold consisting of planks laid loosely upon work horses, the fellow servants walked back upon that portion of the planks lying beyond the support of the work horses, so that the planks tilted up and knocked the servant off, his injury is to be attributed to the negligence of the fellow servants, or to one of the assumed risks of the service. In such a case the leaving of the planks unfastened is ordinarily not an act of negligence on the part of the master.

Error from City Court of Richmond County; Wm. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Richard Brooks against the Riverside Mills. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Brooks sued the Riverside Mills, alleging in substance that the defendant directed the overhead shafting in one of the loom rooms of its factory removed for the purpose of making some changes therein; that in order for the workmen to reach this shafting a temporary scaffold was provided, consisting of three work horses or benches placed in a line a short distance apart, upon which was placed a flooring of planks; that the plaintiff had been assigned by the defendant to work in the picker room, and on the day of the injury was called therefrom and directed to take his place on this elevated platform and assist in removing this shafting to the floor; that he and the other workmen had removed the shafting to the floor, where the necessary changes were made, and at the time of the injury were in the act of replacing the shafting into the hangers overhead; "that the platform aforesaid was longer than the shafting, and that portion of the platform which was immediately under the overhead hangers was beyond the middle of the said platform; that the plaintiff and one other hand was handling the one end of the shafting, and two or more hands were handling the other end of the shafting, carrying it to its position under the overhead hangers, to lift it into its place; that as soon as the hands having in charge the farther end from plaintiff of the shafting aforesaid passed beyond the middle of the said platform, carrying to the said farther end the greater weight, the planks, having been left negligently unsecured, flew up, plaintiff was knocked from his position on the platform to the floor, and the planks of the platform and the shafting fell on him, knocking him unconscious" and inflicting other enumerated injuries; that at the time this plaintiff received his injuries aforesaid he was in the careful discharge of his duties, acting under the orders of the defendant and was free from fault; that the injuries received as aforesaid were "due to the negligence of the defendant in neglecting and failing to provide for this plaintiff a safe place on which to work, and in assigning him to duty thereon without warning him of its dangerous character; that the plaintiff had no connection with the construction of the said platform, had no duty therewith, and was ignorant of its dangerous character, when he obeyed the order of the defendant to stand on said platform." The defendant excepts to the overruling of a general demurrer to the petition.

Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming and Jas. M. Hull, Jr., for plaintiff in error. F. W. Capers, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). We are of the opinion that this case falls within the rules announced in Daniel v. Forsyth, 106 Ga. 563, 32 S. E. 621, Ludd v. Wilkins, 118 Ga. 525, 45 S. E. 429, Bolden v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 130 Ga. 456, 60 S. E. 1047, and Quinn v. Allen, 1 Ga. App. 807, 57 S. E. 957, and that the general demurrer should have been sustained. It is distinguishable on its facts from those cases in which the servant has been allowed to recover for injuries received through defects in the construction of platforms and stagings intended for more than temporary use. There is no suggestion that the temporary platform erected in the present case was in any wise different from the ordinary temporary scaffold commonly used for the purpose of attending to some transitory overhead work. There is nothing intricate or hard to understand about a platform consisting of three work horses or benches placed in a line at a short distance from one another, with planks laid loosely thereon. Every man of ordinary experience and common powers of observation knows or can ascertain from superficial observation the nature and the dangers, if any, of this form of construction. It does not require any expert to know that, if the weight upon the platform is imposed upon that part of the plank which lies beyond the support of the work horse, the equilibrium is likely to be destroyed, so as to cause the planks to fly up.

No reason is alleged in the present petition why the master should have taken the unusual precaution of nailing down the planks, or why the servant should have had any reason to believe that the planks were nailed down. Planks upon temporary scaffolds of this kind are not usually nailed down. The natural inference arising in the mind of any man of ordinary intelligence and experience upon approaching such a platform is that the planks are unsecured, and this petition suggests no reason why the plaintiff conceived any other notion. It would be far-fetched, indeed, to say that the master ought to have foreseen that any servant would presume that the planks were nailed down. Indeed, it may be said with all fairness that the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was not the fact that the planks were left unsecured, for that was but a part of the natural order of things, but that the proximate cause of his injury was that his fellow servants, without exercising due caution, stepped back with their load upon that part of the planks which lay beyond the support of the work horse. The master of course, is not responsible for the negligence of fellow servants in cases of this kind. The plaintiff, as well as his fellow servants, should be held derelict, if they failed to observe and act upon familiar laws of nature applicable to the work at hand. See Worlds v. Ga. R. R., 99 Ga. 283, 25 S. E. 646.

If, as the plaintiff alleges, the planks were so placed on the work horses that the carrying of the greater weight to one end would cause the other end to "fly up," then the law of nature applicable is one which even children playing "seesaw" thoroughly understand and appreciate. For a further discussion of the subject, see Labatt on Master & Servant, § 614, note 1 (a).

Code 1895, § 3765. The omission of the pronoun "my" from the words "Witness ——— hand and seal" is without significance, and will be supplied by construction.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

Action in a justice's court by Claude Peteet, for the use, etc., against J. C. Anderson. The justice gave judgment for defendant, which was reversed on certiorari by the judge of the superior court, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

M. C. Few, for plaintiff in error. Percy Middlebrooks and F. C. Foster, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. This was a suit brought on a promissory note in a justice's court. A plea of the statute of limitations was filed by the maker. The justice, on inspection of the note sued upon, held that it was not an instrument under seal; and, as the suit was filed more than six years after the date of maturity of the note, he sustained the plea. This judgment was reversed on certiorari; the judge of the superior court holding that the note was an instrument under seal, and that the statute of limitations on specialties or instruments under seal was applicable. To this judgment the defendant in the suit brings error to this court.

It will thus be seen that the only question in the case is as to whether the note was an instrument under seal. The note is dated January 17, 1895, and due eight months after date. It is in the usual form of a promissory note and concludes as follows: "Witness ——— hand and seal. J. O. Anderson. [Seal.] ———. [L. S.]" It is contended by the plaintiff in error, the maker of the note, that the omission of the pronoun "my" between the word "witness" and the word "hand" proves that the intention of the maker was to make the instrument a simple promissory note not under seal; and it was contended by the defendant in error, the payee in the note, that the omission of the pronoun "my" was only a clerical oversight, and that the words "Witness ——— hand and seal," followed by the signature of the maker, with the word "Seal" in brackets appended to the signature, clearly make the note an instrument under seal.

A statute of this state (Civ. Code 1895, § 3765) expressly declares that "no instrument shall be considered under seal unless so recited in the body of the instrument"; and, construing this section, the Supreme Court has held in several cases that to constitute an instrument under seal there must be the recitation of that fact in some form in the body of the note, as well as the word "Seal," or "L. S.," at the end of the signature of the maker—in other words, that neither the recitation in the body of the instrument that the same is a sealed instrument, nor the mere addition of a seal of any character after the signature of the maker, is sufficient to render a promissory note a sealed instrument, but both the recital and the seal annexed to the instrument must appear. Jackson v. Augusta Southern Ry. Co., 125 Ga. 801, 54 S. E. 697; Chambers v. Kingsberry, 68 Ga. 828; Stansell v. Corley, 81 Ga. 453, 8 S. E. 868; Ridley v. Hightower, 112 Ga. 479, 37 S. E. 783; Echols v. Phillips, 112 Ga. 700, 37 S. E. 977. In Humphries v. Nix, 77 Ga. 98, it is held that "where, at the end of a note were the words 'Signed and sealed,' followed by the signature of the maker and a scroll for a seal, with the letters 'L. S.' written across it, this was equivalent to the words 'Witness my hand and seal,' followed in the same way, and the paper was a sealed instrument under * * * the Code."

We do not think that there can be any doubt that the note in question is an instrument under seal. The omission of the pronoun "my" after the word "witness" and before the word "hand," so as to make the entire sentence read "witness my hand and seal," is a palpable inadvertence, and the pronoun "my" can be supplied by construction. The original note is on a printed form, and the space for the pronoun is left blank for the contingency of single or joint obligors. The pronoun in the blank space would have given to the sentence grammatical accuracy, but its omission in no wise detracts from the legal significance of the words "Witness — hand and seal," appearing in the body of the note and followed by the signature of the maker, with the additional word "Seal" in brackets appended to the signature. In construing an instrument, the courts will give to the words used their usual and ordinary significance, without reference to grammatical construction. This is the conclusion from an examination of the note itself. If this conclusion needs any argumentative support, it may be found in the suggestion that, if the maker of the note had not intended it to be under seal, he would not have omitted the insignificant pronoun "my" when considered with the context of the execution of the instrument, but, by striking therefrom the words "Witness hand and seal" and the word "Seal," following his signature, would have left no room for construction.

The only question in the case being one of law, which must finally control, we affirm the judgment, with direction that the superior court enter a judgment on the certiorari in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note, principal, interest, and costs.

Judgment affirmed.

1. INDEMNITY (§ 14*) — CONCLUSIVENESS — PERSONS CONCLUDED — PERSONS VOUCHERD INTO COURT.

Where a judgment for damages has been recovered against a municipality for negligence in permitting a dangerous obstruction to be erected and maintained in the street, and the owner of the abutting property, who erected and maintained the obstruction, has been duly and timely vouched into court to defend the suit, in a suit by the municipality over against the vouchee, the judgment against the former is conclusive against the latter as to the right of the injured party to recover the amount of the verdict, and as to all defenses that either the municipality or the party vouched could have set up in the first suit, and which were actually set up and passed upon in that suit.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 808*) — INDEMNITY (§ 13*) — OBSTRUCTIONS IN STREETS — LIABILITY OF ABUTTING OWNER.

While a person injured by an unsafe obstruction placed over the sidewalk by an owner of abutting property may have a right of action against the city for negligence in allowing the obstruction on the sidewalk, this does not affect the liability of the owner responsible primarily for such obstruction. The owner's liability arises from his negligent conduct in erecting and maintaining the dangerous obstruction on the sidewalk. The city's liability arises from its negligence in not keeping its sidewalks in a safe condition. A party injured by such obstruction has a right of action against either the owner or the city, or both; and, if the city is forced to pay for the injury caused by the obstruction, it ordinarily has a right of action over against the owner.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 167*) — LIABILITY OF LANDLORD FOR DEFECTIVE REPAIRS BY TENANT.

The owner of property is liable for injuries caused by defective repairs made by the tenant in possession, where the law imposes upon the owner the duty of making such repairs, or where the tenant is authorized by the owner to make the repairs.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Albany; D. F. Crosland, Judge.

Action by the Mayor and Councilmen of the City of Americus against Mrs. G. V. Byne. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff in error was the owner of a building in the city of Americus, to which was attached a wooden shed or awning extending on and above the sidewalk. On December 22, 1905, a runaway mule hitched to a wagon ran against one of the posts of the shed or awning, knocking it out of place, and on instructions from the chief of police of the city the agent of the plaintiff in error who had the property in charge repaired the shed or awning, and on inspection by the chief of police it appeared to be in a safe condition. On the following day, without any cause so far as the evidence discloses, the shed or awning fell upon the sidewalk, injuring several persons, one of whom was the minor son of Henry Martin. Henry Martin, as next friend for his minor son, brought suit against the mayor and council of the city of Americus to recover damages sustained by him from the falling of the shed or awning, alleging that it was in a dangerous condition and likely to fall, which condition was known to the city, and charging that the city was negligent in allowing the shed to remain in a dangerous condition on and over the sidewalk of the city. The city served the plaintiff in error, as the owner of the building in question and the shed or awning attached, with timely notice of the filing of this suit, vouching her into court to defend the same. This she declined to do. The city of Americus defended the suit, and the trial resulted in a verdict against it for $300, which was fully paid and discharged by the city. The city brought suit against the plaintiff in error to recover from her the amount paid out by it on account of the judgment, and on the trial of this case a verdict was rendered in favor of the city. The defendant excepts to the judgment overruling her motion for a new trial.

S. J. Jones, for plaintiff in error. Maynard & Hooper and Pope & Bennet, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the above statement of facts, section 5234 of the Civil Code of 1895 entitled the city to a judgment against the plaintiff in error as the owner of the property, if she was in fact negligent in the construction of the shed or awning or was negligent in maintaining it in an unsafe condition. This section makes the judgment rendered against the city in the suit to recover damages, if the owner of the property which caused the damage has been duly vouched into court, conclusive against the owner so vouched as to the amount and right of the plaintiff to recover in the suit against the city. As stated by Judge Powell in McArthur v. Ogletree, 4 Ga. App. 429, 61 S. E. 859, this section of the Code is merely declaratory of the principle announced by the Supreme Court in the case of Western & Atlantic R. Co. v. Atlanta, 74 Ga. 774, which decision itself follows the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Chicago v. Robins, 2 Black, 418, 17 L. Ed. 298. This principle has also been fully discussed in the opinion rendered by Judge Powell in the McArthur Case, supra. See, also, in this connection, Taylor v. Allen (Ga.) 62 S. E. 291; Faith v. Atlanta, 78 Ga. 780, 4 S. E. 3. The law is therefore well settled in this state on the subject now under consideration.

The plaintiff in error as defendant in the court below, averred in her answer that she had not been duly and timely served with notice of the pendency of the suit against the city to recover damages, and had had no opportunity of appearing and defending the suit. There was no evidence introduced by her in support of this plea, and the positive testimony in behalf of the city established the fact that she was duly and timely vouched into court to defend the suit. This, therefore, left in the case only one question for the consideration of the jury, to wit, whether the plaintiff in error, as the owner of the property in connection with which the shed or awning was erected and used, failed to exercise ordinary care and diligence in the construction of the shed or awning, or in keeping and maintaining it in a safe condition for pedestrians who were entitled to the use of the sidewalk. She contended that although the shed or awning may have been defectively constructed, and defectively repaired after it had been injured by the running away of the mule attached to the wagon, yet it had been examined and approved by the chief of police of the city after the repair had been made, and therefore her duty with reference thereto was ended. And she further contended that the city was solely responsible for the falling of the shed or awning, in that the city negligently allowed negro boys to assemble under the shed, who had unlawfully pushed it down.

The verdict against the city in the suit for damages settled the question that the shed or awning was defectively constructed or repaired, and that the city was guilty of negligence in permitting it to remain over the sidewalk in such unsafe condition. It also settled the question that the injury to the plaintiff did not result from the unlawful conduct of the negro boys gathered on the sidewalk in pushing the awning down; for, if the jury had believed that the unlawful conduct of the negro boys in question had caused the injury to the plaintiff, the city would not have been liable. On this point the trial court held that, if the fall of the shed onto the sidewalk was caused by the negligent conduct of the negro boys, the landlord would not be responsible for it, and was not concluded as to this question by the verdict against the city; and the court admitted evidence as to this fact.

We do not think the owner of this shed or awning can escape liability for defective construction or defective repairs because a policeman of the city examined it after the repairs and it appeared to be in a safe condition. The duty was still upon the owner of the property to exercise ordinary care in inspecting the shed or awning, to find out if in fact it was in a safe condition. If the owner placed an obstruction over the sidewalk of the city, which was defectively constructed, or if she maintained it in an unsafe condition, she would be liable for any damages caused by such defective construction or condition, and the fact that the city may have been also negligent in allowing such unsafe obstruction to be erected over the sidewalk, or to remain there in an unsafe condition, would in no wise relieve the owner from liability for her own negligence. The plaintiff in error admitted that she erected the shed, and that when it was injured by the runaway mule and wagon she paid for its repair; and the issuable facts as to her were whether she had exercised ordinary care in its original construction and in its repair after the injury. Schneider v. Augusta, 118 Ga. 610, 45 S. E. 459.

She insists that she was not responsible for any defective repair of the shed, because her tenant had possession of the property and made the repairs. It may be true that a landlord will not be liable for injuries resulting from a nuisance maintained by his tenant on the leased premises, and with the creation of which the landlord had no connection (Gardner v. Rhodes, 114 Ga. 932, 41 S. E. 63, 57 L. R. A. 749); but in this case the landlord constructed the shed and authorized the tenant to repair it after it had been injured, and under these circumstances would be liable for her own negligence and that of her agent in doing the work of repair for her (White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204; Civ. Code 1895, § 3118).

The charge, when considered in its entirety, is without material error, but clearly and fully submits the law applicable to the issues, and the verdict is supported by the evidence.

Attachment proceedings by the Walter J. Wood Stove Company against S. D. Johnson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. D. Johnson, in pro. per. Francis L. Myles, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The Walter J. Wood Stove Company sued out an attachment against Johnson for the purchase money of a stove, under which attachment the stove was seized by a constable. Notice in writing of the pendency of the attachment and of the seizure of the property thereunder was served personally on the defendant 10 days before final judgment, as preliminary to a general judgment, according to the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 4557. Attached to this notice was a copy of the attachment proceedings, and a copy of the conditional contract of purchase, with a statement of the account, sworn to, showing the balance due thereon. There was no defense, and the justice, after the introduction of the papers showing the contract of purchase and the seizure of the personal property described in the contract under the attachment, and after hearing oral evidence as to the balance due, and evidence of the service of the notice on the defendant for a general judgment, rendered a judgment in rem for the amount proved to be due and a general judgment against the defendant for the same amount. The defendant thereupon filed his petition for the writ of certiorari, in which he attacked the validity of the attachment proceedings and the special judgment thereon, on the ground that there could be no seizure under this attachment, or special judgment thereon, until the personal property to which the plaintiff had reserved title had been reconveyed by him to the defendant; in other words, that section 5432, Civ. Code 1895, requires that a reconveyance be made before the seizure of the personal property under the attachment and a judgment thereon. He also alleged in his petition that the justice entered two judgments against him, when there should have been but one judgment, with direction to the constable to sell the personal property to satisfy the judgment. He further alleged that there was no proof before the magistrate authorizing him to enter either of the judgments rendered. The superior court, on hearing the certiorari, overruled it, and the plaintiff in certiorari excepted.

1. In the case of Rhodes & Son Furniture Co. v. Jenkins, 2 Ga. App. 475, 58 S. E. 897, following the decision of the Supreme Court in Cooper v. Smith, 125 Ga. 167, 53 S. E. 1013, this court held that the provisions of section 5432, supra, applied to a levy and sale of the property under a final judgment, and did not apply to an attachment and seizure of the property thereon; in other words, that the reconveyance or transfer of title by the plaintiff was only necessary to be made prior to the levy of the execution under final judgment.

2. Civ. Code 1895, § 4557, entitles the plaintiff in an attachment for purchase money to a general judgment against the defendant, in addition to a judgment on the attachment, when the provisions of the section with reference to giving the notice have been complied with by the plaintiff, as seems to have been done in this case.

3. This attachment proceeding was in justice's court, where there is no necessity to file a declaration in attachment; neither was the summons a necessary part of the attachment proceeding. It appeared before the magistrate that the attachment had been duly served by seizure of the property described therein, and that this property, when seized, was in the possession of the defendant. The original contract of purchase was proved. The balance due on account was also proved by the testimony of the plaintiff, and it was shown that the written notice required by the statute which entitled the plaintiff to a general judgment had been duly given to the defendant. Under these facts there was nothing to do but enter up judgment in rem for the amount shown to be due, and also a general judgment against the defendant for such amount. The judgment in overruling the certiorari must therefore be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

Error from Superior Court, Houston County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Rule between J. P. Cooper and others and F. M. King to distribute money raised by a levy on and sale of property of Glenmore Thorp. Judgment for King, and Cooper and others bring error. Reversed.

This case comes to this court upon exceptions to the direction of a verdict upon a rule to distribute money raised from the levy and sale of certain property, sold by the sheriff as the property of Glenmore Thorp. King had a distress warrant against Thorp for $90 and costs, and also a landlord's lien for supplies for $126.13 and costs. Cooper had a mortgage fi. fa. against Thorp. Cooper was respondent in the rule, and made by his pleadings the point that King's rent had been paid. Cooper made it appear in the testimony that he had paid to W. A. Davis & Company, at Macon, the rent note of $90 given by Thorp to King for rent; also that he had paid to Davis certain notes of Thorp, aggregating about $168. However, the testimony seemed to indicate that these notes last referred to did not represent the items upon which the landlord's lien for supplies was prosecuted. The plaintiff admitted on the stand that he had placed the rent note with

W. A. Davis & Co. for collection. The judge directed a verdict ordering the sheriff to pay over the money to King on his landlord's lien and distress warrant, in preference to the mortgage fi. fa. of Cooper. The record does not definitely disclose whether Cooper paid Davis & Co. the rent note before or after the distress warrant was sworn out.

R. N. Holtzclaw and J. P. Duncan, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Hall and M. Kunz, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. If King's rent was paid either to him or to Davis & Co., the agents with whom he had placed the note for collection, before the distress warrant was issued, no portion of the proceeds from the property sold should have been appropriated to the distress warrant. If this payment was made after the distress warrant was sued out, then King would have been entitled to receive on his distress warrant only the costs which had accrued on it up to the time of payment of the note. Payment to Davis & Co. was equivalent to payment to the plaintiff himself. Civ. Code 1895, § 3717. The court, therefore, erred in directing any portion of the proceeds to be appropriated to the principal sum due on the distress warrant.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION (§ 7*) — CRIMINAL PROSECUTION.

An affidavit, a warrant, and an accusation, in which it is alleged that a named person did "commit the offense of selling or otherwise disposing of mortgaged property," but not alleging any fraudulent or unlawful intent, charge no crime against the laws of this state, nor any criminal constituent element of an offense, and, therefore, constitute no legal basis of an action to recover damages for malicious prosecution.

Seaborn & Barry Wright, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Eubanks, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. This is a suit to recover damages for malicious prosecution, and comes before us on error assigned to the judgment of the trial court in sustaining a demurrer and dismissing the petition. The suit is predicated on the arrest and prosecution of the plaintiff on a warrant issued by a justice of the peace, based on an affidavit therefor, and on an accusation in the city court, charging that the plaintiff, in the county of Floyd, "on the _____ day of _____, in the year 1904," did "commit the offense of selling or otherwise disposing of mortgaged property." The petition, by amendment, further alleges that the plaintiff in the present case was arrested on this warrant and confined in the common jail of the county, that he thereafter waived commitment trial or preliminary investigation by the justice and was bound over to the city court under a $250 bond, and that subsequently an accusation was filed against him in the city court, "charging that petitioner did dispose of mortgaged property."

The view which this court takes of one controlling question in the case renders a decision on the others presented unnecessary. This controlling question is whether there was any criminal prosecution on which a suit for damages for malicious prosecution could be predicated. Section 8843 of the Civil Code of 1895 gives a right of action to recover damages for "a criminal prosecution maliciously carried on and without any probable cause," etc. Do the affidavit and warrant or the accusation in the city court, show that there was a prosecution for any criminal offense? It may be stated that an affidavit and warrant need not describe the offense with all the technical particularity of criminal pleading as in cases of indictment. But it should affirmatively appear by both the affidavit and the warrant, or the affidavit and the accusation, that some criminal offense against the laws of this state was charged therein as having been committed by the defendant, or at least that the acts set out in the affidavit and warrant or the affidavit and accusation, constituted the substance of some criminal offense, or, as Justice Atkinson expresses it, "some act amounting to a constituent element of such an offense." It is no offense against the criminal laws of this state "to sell or otherwise dispose of mortgaged property," and this could not amount to a criminal offense, unless the sale or other disposition of the personal property was made by the mortgagor before the payment of the mortgage debt, without the consent of, or with intent to defraud, the mortgagee, and loss was thereby sustained by the holder of the mortgage. Every one of these things must appear before the sale or other disposition of mortgaged personal property amounts to a criminal offense. It is clear, therefore, that the affidavit, warrant and accusation upon which the suit for malicious prosecution are predicated do not describe any criminal offense, in form or in substance, or any criminal constituent of an offense. It is not even charged in general terms that the act of selling, or other disposition of the personal property mentioned was fraudulent or unlawful.

While the sale or other disposition of mortgaged personal property is a necessary part of a fraudulent sale of such property, yet it cannot be said that the mere sale or disposition constitutes any criminal element of the offense. On the contrary, the sale or other disposition of personal property might in many cases be legitimate and for the benefit of the mortgagee, and could not amount to a crime, unless it was fraudulent and resulted in damage. Under the facts in this case, as set forth in the petition as amended, no criminal prosecution was maliciously instituted or carried on, because neither the affidavit and warrant nor the accusation set forth any crime or any criminal constituent of a crime; and therefore the appropriate remedy, if any, was for malicious arrest and false imprisonment.

For this reason the judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition must be affirmed. Satilla Mfg. Co. v. Cason, 98 Ga. 14, 25 S. E. 909, 58 Am. St. Rep. 287.

HAWKINS v. STATE. (No. 1,763.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 519*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Whether a confession was freely and voluntarily made, when issuable, should be submitted to the jury for determination; but, where the state's evidence shows that an alleged confession was not freely and voluntarily made, the court should not allow it to go to the jury. The alleged confession in this case, having been shown by the evidence for the state to have been induced by a well-founded fear of punishment, should have been excluded.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES.

On a trial for burglary, where the indictment charged the larceny of certain described articles, evidence tending to show a larceny by the defendant of other articles than those described in the indictment would not be admissible against him, unless the evidence also showed that the other articles were in the house when the burglary was committed, and were then stolen therefrom, or their larceny was in some way connected with the burglary and the taking of the property described in the indictment.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The evidence for the state shows, that the storehouse of the prosecutor had been burglarized, and that the property set out in the indictment, consisting of $7 in silver money, three pounds of cheese, and five pounds of crackers, had been stolen therefrom. Several days thereafter this boy attempted to open the cash drawer in another storehouse, and, for this attempt, was severely whipped by the owner of the store. Immediately after this whipping had been administered to him, the son of the prosecutor came into the store and proceeded then and there to administer another severe whipping to the boy, and, after he had finished, asked him if he had not broken his father's store open. At first he denied it, but after the two persons who had administered the chastigation had argued "a little bit with him" he finally said that he and his brother went into the store and took certain things, among them money. The evidence does not disclose the character of the argument which these two men used with the boy, except the whipping that they had both given him. Subsequently on the same day, while he was in jail, the prosecutor went to see him, and the boy again confessed that he and his brother had entered the storehouse and stolen some of the property described in the indictment. This witness testified that he did not think that "the whipping, or the influence of fear of a whipping, had anything to do with his confession in the jail"; but the son who had whipped him on the same day, and the sheriff who had arrested him, were present when he made this last confession.

1. The rule is that, where the state's evidence shows that an alleged confession was not voluntary, the court should exclude it entirely from the jury; but, where the evidence for the state and the defendant make the question as to whether it was freely and voluntarily made an issuable fact, the alleged confession should be allowed to go to the jury for the purpose of determining whether it was in fact voluntarily made. We think the state's evidence in this case clearly shows that the confession was not made without the "remotest fear of injury." It would seem that the confession that immediately followed the infliction of two severe whippings might reasonably be attributed to an apprehension on the part of the boy that he would be again whipped if he did not confess. It is true that the boy again confessed that afternoon in the jail to the prosecutor; but probably he had not entirely forgotten the whippings which he had received in the morning, and the fact that the prosecutor's son, who had whipped him, was present in jail when he made the last confession might have quickened somewhat his recollection of the morning's occurrence. Taking into consideration the boy's age, his lack of intelligence, and the two whippings which he had received, and remembering that this character of evidence should be received with great caution, a confession made under the circumstances was not only without any probative value, but should not have been allowed to go to the jury at all. Pen. Code 1895, §§ 1005, 1006; Dawson v. State, 59 Ga. 334.

2. Over the objection of the defendant, the state was allowed to show by the prosecutor that he had lost from his storehouse other property besides that set out in the indictment. There was no evidence that this other property had been taken from the storehouse the same night when the store was burglarized and the property described in the indictment stolen therefrom. Indeed, it is not clear from the evidence that this other property was stolen by any one, and certainly it does not appear in any manner that the defendant had anything to do with this larceny. If it had been shown that this other property was taken from the storehouse on the occasion described in the indictment, this evidence would have been an incriminating circumstance, and could have been shown, although it was not among the articles set out in the indictment. But, where the evidence fails to show that this property was taken from the storehouse at the same time that the property described in the indictment was stolen, the fact that it may have been stolen therefrom at some other time was entirely irrelevant, and did not in any manner tend to connect the defendant with the larceny of the articles described in the indictment. The admission of this testimony was, in our opinion, prejudicial error. This evidence and the alleged confession necessarily contributed in a very large measure to the conclusion of the jury that the defendant was guilty. Outside of this evidence, the case made by the state against the defendant was exceedingly weak; and it certainly could not be strengthened by a confession proved by the state's own witnesses to have been virtually extorted from a young and weak-minded boy under a well-founded apprehension of punishment, and by the irrelevant fact that on some other occasion than that set out in the indictment other property than that described in the indictment had probably been taken from the storehouse by the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Effingham County; P. E. Seabrook, Judge.

Action by J. F. Tuttle against George Wilson and Florence Wilson. Judgment for plaintiff, and George Wilson brings error. Reversed.

Strange & Cobb, for plaintiff in error. R. W. Sheppard, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. Tuttle sued Florence and George Wilson upon an open account for $67.60. The jury found in favor of the plaintiff the full amount claimed, less a conceded credit of $10. The account began in the year 1906, with an item, under date of January 18th, of balance due, $37.19. By an amendment the plaintiff recited that this amount had been agreed upon between him and the defendants as correct, and that his books had been subsequently destroyed, and it was impossible for him to list the items going to make up this total. The other items were regularly set forth. The defendants demurred to this first charge on the account, because it was not itemized; but, the amendment referred to above having been filed and allowed, the court overruled the demurrer. We think this ruling was correct.

We cannot, however, see on what basis the verdict against George Wilson for the full amount found can be sustained. The facts are rather meagerly and indefinitely set out in the brief of the evidence; but, as we understand the plaintiff's testimony, he made the following case: Florence Wilson, a sister of George Wilson, had opened up an account with the plaintiff, and having traded a certain amount, and having paid only $10, she was refused further credit. As we understand the matter, the balance due at this time constituted the item of $37.19, referred to above. George Wilson and his brother (since deceased, and therefore not joined in the suit) told the plaintiff, at this stage of the matter, to let their sister have such goods as she wanted, and they would pay for them in the fall of 1906. The plaintiff continued to sell the sister goods, not only throughout the year 1906, but also up to June 8, 1907. In the fall of 1906 the plaintiff presented his account to George Wilson, who then refused to pay it. He never told the plaintiff to let his sister have any goods in the year 1907.

The liability of George Wilson for so much of the account as was made prior to the time that he and his brother told the plaintiff to furnish goods to their sister must fail, by reason of the fact that it was not in writing; for, being a promise to answer for the then existent debt of another, it was within the statute of frauds. Certainly George cannot be held responsible for such goods as were furnished to his sister after his refusal to pay and his denial of liability in the fall of 1906; for this was necessarily in legal effect a withdrawal of any assent to being further bound for any goods to be sold to his sister. He might be held liable for such goods as were furnished between the time he gave the instructions to furnish his sister and the time when he gave the plaintiff notice that he would no longer be liable. The mere fact that they were charged on the plaintiff's books as being bought by Florence Wilson would not change George Wilson's liability in this respect. Flournoy v. Wooten, 71 Ga. 169.

Ordinarily we could make final disposition of the matter by giving direction for the writing off of the unauthorized portions of the recovery; but the record before us does not furnish a sufficient basis for the calculation, and hence it is necessary to grant a new trial that the error may be rectified.

Error from City Court of Abbeville; D. B. Nicholson, Judge.

Action by Wilcox & Parsons against the Garbutt Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hal Lawson, for plaintiff in error. Haygood & Cutts, for defendants in error.

HILL, C. J. Wilcox & Parsons brought suit against the Garbutt Lumber Company for a balance claimed to be due on a contract. The defense filed was that there had been a full settlement of all demands arising out of the contract sued on. The jury found a verdict for the full amount, with interest, and the defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled.

The case made by the evidence is substantially as follows: There was a dispute between the parties as to the correct amount due under the contract; Wilcox & Parsons contending that the amount was $125, and the Garbutt Lumber Company insisting that it was $75. After some correspondence between the parties on the subject, without an agreement as to the amount due, Wilcox & Parsons drew a draft on the Garbutt Lumber Company for $125, and delivered it to Wilkinson, cashier of the Citizens' Bank of Abbeville for collection. Wilkinson notified the lumber company by letter that he held the draft for collection, and received a reply from the lumber company denying the indebtedness of $125, but stating that it was willing to send check for $75, if this was satisfactory. Wilkinson notified Wilcox & Parsons that the lumber company would not pay the $125, but would pay $75. Wilcox & Parsons thereupon drew another draft through the bank on the lumber company for $75, and this draft was promptly paid. When Parsons, a member of the firm of Wilcox & Parsons, was informed by Wilkinson that the lumber company refused to pay the draft for $125, and would pay only $75 in settlement of the matter, he (Parsons) drew the draft for $75, and said that he would "see about the balance."

We think that Wilkinson was the agent of Wilcox & Parsons, and the information that he had that the lumber company refused to pay the $125 in settlement was information received by them. But this is immaterial, as Parsons, a member of the firm of Wilcox & Parsons, admitted that he had actual knowledge that the lumber company denied owing the $125, and would pay only $75 in full settlement. With this knowledge, Wilcox & Parsons drew the draft for the $75, and received and kept the money. The dispute as to the amount due was settled, and the debt was paid in full. If Wilcox & Parsons did not intend that the payment of the $75 by the lumber company should be in full payment of the debt, they should have refused the $75, and not have drawn the draft for this amount when it was offered by the lumber company in full settlement, and collected and retained the money. Bass Dry Goods Co. v. Roberts Coal Co., 4 Ga. App. 520, 61 S. E. 1134.

The verdict to the contrary was wholly unauthorized by the evidence and the law, and the judgment refusing a new trial must be reversed.

Where a judge, to whom a bill of exceptions is tendered, returns the same to counsel for correction, under Civ. Code 1895, § 5545, on the ground that it is not true, or that it does not contain all the necessary facts, and specifies his objections in writing as required by that section, this court will not issue mandamus against the judge to compel him to sign the bill of exceptions, unless counsel removes the objections specified by the judge.

Original petition for mandamus by D. F. Campbell to compel A. M. Foute, Judge of the City Court of Cartersville, to sign a bill of exceptions. Mandamus denied.

James B. Conyers, for petitioner. Watt H. Milner, Sol., opposed.

PER OURIAM. Campbell, through his counsel, tendered to the judge a bill of exceptions, complaining of the judge's refusal to grant him a discharge under a demand for trial, according to section 958 of the Penal Code of 1895. Within the time required by law the judge returned to counsel the bill of exceptions, together with the statement in writing that it did not contain all the necessary facts, and set forth a list of the facts which he says should have been incorporated in the bill of exceptions. Counsel for the plaintiff in error, insisting that these proposed corrections would be unfair to him and would not set forth the actual truth of the matter, has filed in this court a petition for mandamus, setting up what he claims to be the entire history of the case, including the written specifications returned by the trial judge in connection with the bill of exceptions, from which it appears that the judge did not refuse absolutely to sign the bill of exceptions, but, on the other hand, expressly stated that, when the revisions indicated were incorporated in the bill of exceptions, he would sign it.

The determination of what is true and what is not true as to matters occurring on the trial of a case, when it is sought to review the trial by a bill of exceptions, addresses itself exclusively to the presiding judge, and the court is by law compelled to take his statement as true. If the judge says that certain corrections are necessary to make the bill of exceptions speak the truth, we have no power to allow counsel to take issue with him, nor can we take issue with him ourselves. It is the duty of counsel to make these corrections and tender the bill of exceptions as corrected to the trial judge. If there are other and additional facts which counsel thinks should be stated in connection with the matters required to be stated by the trial judge, he may yet (for the time for the final return of the bill of exceptions has not yet expired) ask the judge to state these facts, and, if the judge considers them to be true, he will no doubt allow them to be incorporated in the bill of exceptions before it is finally signed; but, if he does not do so, this court cannot and will not interfere.

Mandamus nisi denied.

Error from City Court of Dublin; E. W. Jordan, Judge.

Action by J. P. Houser against the Farmers' Supply Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Houser sued the Farmers' Supply Company, a mercantile corporation, alleging that the corporation had agreed with him, if he would enter its employment and would become a stockholder therein, it would, in addition to paying him a salary, indorse his note at the bank for a sum necessary to pay for the stock, continuing the indorsement from time to time and from year to year for five years, at the end of which period there was to be a division of profits, through the declaration of an accumulated dividend; that at the end of the first year (December, 1902) the corporation refused to continue to indorse the note given for the procurement of the money under the circumstances just stated, whereupon it became necessary for him to make a new arrangement to get the money, by which the person from whom he got the funds was to obtain 4 per cent. interest in addition to one-half of the profits to be earned by his stock; that on account of the prosperity of the business the profits amounted to a considerable sum in excess of what the legal interest on the loan would have been. The alleged contract with the corporation was made through the persons who, on its organization, became president and general manager. The plaintiff was himself a director and vice president. No express power appeared in the charter authorizing the corporation to enter into any contract of suretyship and guaranty. The court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepts.

Peyton L. Wade, for plaintiff in error. J. S. Adams and W. C. Davis, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. While industrial and mercantile corporations are not wholly prohibited from making contracts of guaranty and suretyship, such contracts are closely scrutinized, and are not valid unless it appears that they were in direct furtherance of authorized corporate purposes. Ordinarily the officers of a corporation have no power to make a contract in its behalf guaranteeing a private debt of one of its stockholders. Brandt on Suretyship (3d Ed.) § 12, and note. The contract in the present case seems to have been ultra vires, and not binding on the corporation.

2. The nonsuit was proper for another reason. It appears that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. If he had any right of action, it arose immediately upon the corporation's breach of the contract. The plaintiff seeks to avoid the statute by saying that it did not appear, until the dividend was finally declared, how large his loss would be, or what his damages for the breach of the contract amounted to. It is true that, as a general rule, where the right of action on a claim depending on a contingency or condition does not accrue until the happening of the contingency, the statute does not begin to run until then. Allen v. Stephens, 102 Ga. 598, 29 S. E. 448; Busby v. Marshall, 125 Ga. 647, 54 S. E. 646. But the contingency or condition which gives rise to the right of action for the breach of a contract is the breach itself. In contemplation of law, injury immediately flows from every breach of contract to the person against whom it has been broken. If he cannot show special damages, he can at least recover general or nominal damages. Therefore for the breach of a contract a cause of action exists at once, and the statute of limitations begins to run, notwithstanding the fact that the full amount of the special damages which would ensue remains unknown and not definitely ascertainable until after the time when the statute has barred the action.

Nor is the plaintiff entirely precluded in such a case from recovering special damages, though the exact amount of them is not known at the time he begins his action; for, if the damages which are to ensue will flow proximately and directly from the breach, it is the duty of the jury, upon the trial of the case, to estimate such damages, and to award them according to the light to be obtained from the evidence and the probabilities arising therefrom. The case at bar is controlled by the cases of Lilly v. Boyd, 72 Ga. 83; Gould v. Palmer, 96 Ga. 798, 22 S. E. 583. The plaintiff seems to have suffered a hardship, but the law is against him on the facts of his case as developed at the trial.

Judgment affirmed.

LANHAM v. McWILLIAMS. (No. 1,603.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 114*)—HOLDING OVER AFTER TERM—EFFECT.

A lease for one year gave the tenant an option of claiming an additional term of 1, 2, 3, or 4 years, provided notice of his election be given the landlord 90 days prior to the expiration of the first year. No notice was given; but the tenant nevertheless continued to occupy the premises and paid rent, which the landlord accepted without question, objection, or explanation on the part of either party, for several months after the expiration of the first year. Held, both the landlord and the tenant are bound for an additional term of one year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 378; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 118*)—TENANCY AT WILL.

Where a lease for a certain term gives the tenant the option of claiming an additional term of one to four years, and the tenant continues in possession after the expiration of the first term under such circumstances as to show an election of an additional term of one year, there cannot be another election to extend the lease over the remaining three years; and continued occupancy after the expiration of the second term under a parol agreement creating an additional term of more than one year would create a tenancy at will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 410, 411; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. VERDICT CONTRARY TO LAW.

The verdict being contrary to law, a new trial should have been granted.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Floyd County; Harper Hamilton, Judge.

Action by O. H. McWilliams, survivor, against J. H. Lanham, survivor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

McWilliams leased a storehouse to Lanham for a period of one year, beginning September 1, 1905, at $125 a month, and the lease gave the tenant the option of claiming an additional term of from 2 to 5 years from September 1, 1905 (in other words, an additional term of 1 to 4 years from September 1, 1906, when his first term expired), provided notice of an intention to claim the additional term was given to the landlord 90 days prior to the expiration of the first year. Some time in the summer of 1906 the landlord went to the tenant and asked him what he intended to do about the lease, and the tenant gave an equivocal reply. No notice was given of an intention to claim any additional term; but the tenant continued to occupy the premises into the second year and to pay the same rent month by month, and the landlord accepted it without question. Thus the matter stood until some time in June, 1907. Just what happened after this time depends upon whether the landlord or the tenant was correct in his recollection of the conversations between them, as their evidence is squarely conflicting. On the one hand, the tenant testified clearly and unequivocally that in June, 1907, the landlord gave him notice that after the expiration of the second year he would increase the rent to $150 a month; that he refused to agree to pay such rent, and a parol agreement was made that the tenancy would be continued at the will of each party. The landlord denied making any such agreement, but admitted that he threatened to increase the rent, and also that he advertised the property for rent in August before the expiration of the second year. He stated that he was merely attempting to force the tenant to a clear and unequivocal election of just how long he intended to occupy the premises; that the tenant kept on evading the question, and insisting that, if "he would only sit steady in the boat and let matters rock along," everything would be all right; that at no time did the tenant state that he would quit the premises at the expiration of the second year, but, on the contrary, assumed the attitude of having a right to remain in possession of the premises for the full period up to 1910 if he chose so to do; that one time the landlord had an opportunity to rent the premises to a third person but the tenant objected, and the landlord then let the matter drop, thinking that the tenant would keep the premises for the full period mentioned above; that a little later he had a clear, unequivocal parol agreement with the tenant, whereby the lease was to be continued in force until September 5, 1910. In November, 1907, the tenant gave the landlord 80 days' notice, and then sent him a check for rent up to that time and surrendered the keys. The landlord sued out a distress warrant for rent for the two following months; that is, for December, 1907, and January, 1908. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the landlord, and the tenant excepts to the overruling of his motion for a new trial.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

W. W. Mundy and Dean & Dean, for plaintiff in error. John W. & G. E. Maddox, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). The motion for a new trial contains, among other grounds, an assignment of error complaining of the following excerpt from the charge of the judge to the jury: "I charge you that in the event a party passes into possession of property under a contract like this one, with the right of renewal, and continues in possession after the expiration of the first term, without any notice, the law then would bind him to the full term named in the contract. In other words, Lanham & Sons would be bound, under this contract, from September 1, 1906, to September 1, 1910, unless they have been released by the plaintiff in this case, or there had been some verbal change in the contract, or they have an agreement that there would be a tenancy at will. A continuance to occupy the building in question after the expiration of the two-year term provided for in the contract relied upon by the plaintiff would thereby extend the original contract and spread the same over a term of five years from the date thereof, unless said contract has, in some way, been changed or abrogated by the parties." It has been held that where a lease gives the tenant the right to an extension of his term for an additional period at his option, and the lease is silent as to notice being given to the landlord of the tenant's election to claim the additional term, the mere continuance in possession after the expiration of the first term without notice, and the payment of rent by the tenant and the acceptance thereof by the landlord, will bind both tenant and landlord for the additional term. Slater v. Kimbro, 91 Ga. 217, 18 S. E. 296, 44 Am. St. Rep. 19; Hamby v. Georgia Iron Co., 127 Ga. 802, 56 S. E. 1063; Walker v. Wadley, 124 Ga. 275, 52 S. E. 904; Cavanaugh v. Clinch, 88 Ga. 610, 15 S. E. 678. The reason for this is that the tenant has plainly shown by his conduct that he has elected to claim the additional term. He having a right to continue in possession of the premises lawfully in accordance with the provisions of the lease, it will be presumed that he has availed himself of this right, and not that he is continuing in possession unlawfully as a tenant at sufferance.

But these cases expressly recognize that there is a difference in the effect of holding over, where the lease provides that the tenant must give the landlord notice of his intention to claim the additional term, from what it would be if the contract contained no such provision. The stipulation for notice is primarily for the benefit of the landlord, so that he may be looking out for another tenant in the event there is no election to claim the additional term. The giving of the notice is a condition precedent to the tenant's right to claim the additional term; and his failure to perform it will forfeit this right to the additional term, unless the landlord waives its nonperformance. The tenant's failure to give the notice, combined with his knowledge of the fact that thereby he is forfeiting his right to the additional term, is a circumstance tending to show that he has decided not to avail himself of this right; and therefore in such a case usually there must be more than a mere naked holding over by the tenant to authorize the inference that he has elected to claim the additional term. There should be some additional manifestation of his intention to elect. Cooper v. Joy, 105 Mich. 374, 63 N. W. 414. If, however, the holding over is under such circumstances as plainly to show that the landlord has waived the condition as to notice, and that the tenant has elected to continue in possession under the lease, both parties are bound for the additional term. For example, if the lease provides that at the beginning of the second term the rent shall be increased, the mere failure to give notice becomes immaterial, if the tenant holds over and pays the higher rent and the landlord accepts it. The payment and the acceptance of the higher rent, combined with the holding over, show a clear mutual intention to continue the lease—an intention on the part of the landlord to waive the requirement as to notice, and an intention on the part of the tenant to claim the additional term—and both parties are accordingly bound for the additional term. Long v. Stafford, 103 N. Y. 274, 8 N. E. 522, 525; Insurance Co. v. National Bank, 71 Mo. 58.

Intent may be derived from silence, as well as from words, especially where silence is accompanied by expressive conduct; and even if the additional term is at the same rental, and without giving notice the tenant nevertheless holds over, and nothing is said or done by either party as to the failure to give notice, and the tenant, after the beginning of the second term, pays the rent, and the landlord accepts it, the evidence of such intention to waive on the part of the landlord and to elect on the part of the tenant, deduced both from silence and conduct, may be so clear that both parties become bound for the additional term. Probst v. Rochester Laundry Co., 171 N. Y. 584, 64 N. E. 504; Stone v. St. Louis Stamping Co., 155 Mass. 267, 29 N. E. 623; Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 342; 24 Cyc. 1003. In the present case, when in the summer of 1906 the landlord inquired of the tenant whether he intended to claim an additional term, and the tenant made an equivocal reply, but at no time gave notice that he intended to claim the additional term, the landlord could have dispossessed the tenant at the expiration of the first term, namely, September 5, 1906. The equivocal reply of the tenant was not an election, but rather a refusal to elect. The subsequent conduct of the tenant and of the landlord, however, was sufficient to show a waiver of notice on the one hand and an election on the other hand of an additional term.

But under the provisions of the lease the tenant had the privilege of claiming an additional term of from two to five years from the date of the beginning of the first term, and it therefore becomes necessary to determine which of these additional terms he had elected. The method by which the election was made shows that he had elected the shortest additional term to which he would be entitled. Falley v. Giles, 29 Ind. 114. His failure to give the prescribed notice primarily indicated that he had decided not to elect an additional term at all; but his subsequent conduct in holding over and paying rent under the circumstances indicated a change of mind. This change of mind is deduced largely from the fact that, since the tenant had a right to hold over lawfully in accordance with the provisions of the lease, it is to be presumed that his holding over was by virtue of this right and of the landlord's apparent willingness to waive the nonperformance of the condition as to notice. His occupancy after the first year is consistent with an election to renew for the shortest period, and at the same time this construction of his conduct gives due weight to the equivocal state of his mind, evinced by his failure to give the prescribed notice. Falley v. Giles, supra. Indeed, the conduct of the landlord a few months before the expiration of the second year indicates clearly that he so understood the tenant's election. His threat to increase the rent and his act in advertising the property for rent indicate that he knew the premises would be vacant at the expiry of the second year.

2, 3. The tenant having made this election, and the lease providing for only one election, his right to elect was exhausted, and there could be no further extension under this lease. Falley v. Giles, supra. The tenant's occupancy after the expiration of the second term, therefore, was not within the terms of this contract. Jones, L. & T. § 336. After both of the terms provided for by the original lease had expired, the parties could not by a parol agreement extend that lease over a further period, exceeding one year. Therefore, adopting the evidence of the landlord as the truth, the parol agreement made in October after the expiration of the second term in the preceding September, whereby it was agreed that the lease should be continued until 1910, had the legal effect of creating a tenancy at will. Hayes v. Atlanta, 1 Ga. App. 25(2), 57 S. E. 1087. The tenant having given the statutory notice to quit, the verdict of the jury finding him liable for rent after the expiration of 30 days is contrary to law.

This result makes it unnecessary to consider the inaccuracies in the charge of the judge. Judgment reversed.

MYRICK v. MACON RY. & LIGHT CO.

(No. 1,321.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether it is negligence for a passenger to be upon the platform of a moving train must depend upon the attendant circumstances of danger and the reason causing him to go upon the platform. So far from its being, as a matter of law, necessarily negligence for a passenger to be upon the platform of a moving train, it is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury whether his presence upon the platform is an act of negligence. The question of negligence cannot be said to be one of law unless, under the peculiar circumstances, the danger is so obviously great as that no one of ordinary prudence would, under any circumstances, subject himself thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1376-1379; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 347*)—INJURY TO PASSENGERS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Under the facts in evidence in this case, the cause was not one for the determination of the court, and should have been submitted to the jury. It was, therefore, erroneous to award a nonsuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1376-1379; Dec. Dig. § 347.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Macon; Robt. Hodges, Judge.

Action by Henry Myrick against the Macon Railway & Light Company. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

R. L. Anderson, for plaintiff in error. Roland Ellis, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. The court sustained a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence and awarded a nonsuit, and exception is taken to the judgment. The legal question presented is whether, under the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, the negligence of the plaintiff was so great as to preclude any recovery upon his part as a matter of law. It appears that the plaintiff, without any signal on the part of the conductor, or any knowledge on the part of the conductor, went out upon the platform of the street car, upon which he was riding a short distance, before the car had reached his destination, and while standing on the step with some bundles in his hands was thrown from the step of the car and injured. The evidence did not develop the fact that there was anything unusual in the speed of the car, except that the plaintiff testified that there was a sudden jerk or quickening of the speed as the car rounded the curve and just before his fall. As the court could not have held as a matter of law that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence from the mere fact that he was on the platform or on the step (Suber v. Georgia, Carolina & Northern Ry. Co., 96 Ga. 42, 23 S. E. 387, and Augusta Southern R. Co. v. Snider, 118 Ga. 146, 44 S. E. 1005), we assume that the learned trial judge based the nonsuit upon the idea that the plaintiff had no sufficient reason for going upon the platform at the time that he did, or that the danger was so obvious that the plaintiff's act defeated his cause of action.

We think that the question of negligence, as to a passenger upon the platform of a moving train, is as much a question of fact to be determined by the jury as any other phase of the subject which may be presented in any action for personal injuries. It is true that in reaching this conclusion we are confronted with two lines of decisions, apparently conflicting; but we think the proper rule was laid down in Suber v. Ga. C. & N. R. Co., supra, and Turley v. A. K. & N. R. Co., 127 Ga. 594, 56 S. E. 748, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 685. As said by Chief Baron Kelly in Siner v. Railway Co., L. R. 3 Exch. 150, 156: "A railway company is not entitled to expose any passenger to the necessity of choosing between two alternatives, neither of which he can legally be called upon to choose, namely, either to go on or to take his chance of danger and jump out; and if they do so their choice is made at their peril. I agree that, if it can be seen by the passenger that the act must be attendant with injury, it may then be fairly contended that he is not entitled to choose this obviously and certainly dangerous alternative." Judge Thompson, in his Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, referring to Baron Kelly's dissenting opinion, says it "is probably now recognized as the more correct exposition of the law than the views of the majority of the court in that case," and gives many citations of authority sustaining Chief Baron Kelly's holding. "The weight of modern authority seems to sustain the view that an attempt by the passenger to alight from a railway train while it is passing a place at which it should stop to enable him to alight, or at which it has failed to stop a reasonable time to permit him to leave it, will not, as a matter of law, be considered a negligent act, unless the attending circumstances so clearly show that he acted so imprudently or rashly that reasonable minds could fairly arrive at no other conclusion, and that the question whether the act of the passenger in so attempting to alight from the train was negligent—that is, whether he exercised for his safety that degree of care and caution which a person of ordinary prudence would be expected under like circumstances to exercise—must ordinarily be submitted to the jury." 3 Hutchinson on Carriers (3d Ed.) § 1179.

There can be no difference in the rule as affecting one who intends to board a train, and as to one who intends to alight therefrom, where the passenger is attempting to do something either toward taking passage upon a car or disembarking therefrom. But in the present case the plaintiff was not attempting to alight, for he had not quite reached his destination. His presence upon the step was, at most, but preparation to alight when the point should be reached at which the car ought to have been stopped; and, according to his statement, his being thrown from the car was not caused by any effort upon his part to alight, but by a sudden jerk or increase of speed. In the Suber Case, supra, Chief Justice Simmons draws the distinction between the cases of McLarin v. Railway Co., 85 Ga. 504, 11 S. E. 840, Coleman v. Railway Co., 84 Ga. 1, 10 S. E. 498, and Barnett v. Railway Co., 87 Ga. 768, 13 S. E. 904, upon which the learned counsel for the plaintiff in error relies, and in which it was held, as a matter of law, that the negligence of the plaintiff necessarily defeated recovery, and those cases (of which we think the case at bar furnishes an instance) in which the jury alone are to determine whether the act of the passenger, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, or on account of the reason for his act, was properly upon the platform of a passenger car, and whether his presence there is to be construed as negligence.

The evidence of the plaintiff, in the present case, authorized the inference that the defendant company was negligent in two particular respects: (1) In the failure of the conductor to give the necessary signal to stop the car, and the consequent failure of the motorman to diminish its speed, so that it might be stopped at the plaintiff's destination; (2) in the failure of the motorman to reduce the speed of the car preparatory to turning the curve, whereby the violent jerk which threw the plaintiff off the car was probably caused. We think that these inferences might be authorized, without intending to intimate that the jury would be compelled to infer that the defendant company was negligent in either of these respects.

If it be conceded that the defendant company was negligent in any respect, as alleged in the petition, the next question which arises is whether the plaintiff could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequence of the defendant's negligence. Nothing is better settled than that what does or does not constitute such negligence as will preclude a recovery is peculiarly a question for the jury. The rule more peculiarly applicable to the case now under consideration is that, "unless the danger is obviously great, the court cannot hold as a matter of law, that a given act constitutes such negligence as will preclude a recovery." Suber v. G., C. & N. R. Co., supra; Coursey v. Southern Ry. Co., 113 Ga. 297, 38 S. E. 866; Mack v. Savannah & Statesboro R. Co., 118 Ga. 629, 45 S. E. 509; Augusta Southern R. Co. v. Snider, 118 Ga. 146, 44 S. E. 1005; M. & B. R. Co. v. Anderson, 121 Ga. 686, 49 S. E. 791; Turley v. A., K. & N. R. Co., 127 Ga. 594 (2), 56 S. E. 748, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 685; Central of Ga. R. Co. v. Forehand, 128 Ga. 547, 58 S. E. 44. In these cases the question related to passengers upon railway trains; but if it be true that the mere presence of a passenger upon the platform of a train, or even his attempting to alight from a moving train, is not negligence per se, it would seem to be true a fortiori of a passenger on an ordinary street car, operated upon the streets of a city, and necessarily run at a lower rate of speed than the passenger trains of railroad companies. In Augusta Southern R. Co. v. Snider, supra, the Supreme Court held that the rule of negligence applicable to a passenger attempting to alight from a moving train is also applicable to passengers on the platform, not attempting to alight. This rule would seem to be peculiarly sound when applied to passengers upon street cars for the reason that, in a case where a passenger may intend to transfer from one line to another, he may not have determined the exact point at which he will disembark from one car to take another; and it may frequently be necessary for him to go upon the platform to ascertain the point from which he can most expeditiously reach his destination.

2. Under the undisputed evidence in the present case the passenger had notified the conductor that he desired to leave the car at a certain street corner where the cars stopped. The conductor was eating his dinner, and continued to eat until the car was near the passenger's destination; but no signal was given to the motorman to stop, nor any warning to the passenger that he should make preparation to alight. The passenger had a number of bundles, and went out on the platform, and thence to the step of the car. He had the right to presume that the conductor would even yet notify the motorman to stop at the proper place. While standing upon the step, and when within 23 feet of the usual stopping place, the car was suddenly jerked and its speed increased, and he was thrown to the ground, and, according to his testimony, painfully injured. Under the facts in evidence the cause was not one for the determination of the court, and should have been submitted to the jury. It was therefore erroneous to award a nonsuit.

Judgment reversed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)
LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 265*)—ACTION FOR RENT—EVIDENCE.

The relation of landlord and tenant, either by express contract or by legal implication, is an essential basis of a distress warrant. Therefore, where the undisputed evidence affirmatively shows that this relation did not exist, a judgment for rent was unauthorized.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Judge.

Action by W. A. Huff against Paul Hearn. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jno. R. L. Smith, for plaintiff in error.
T. J. Cochran, for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. The questions in this case arise on a distress warrant sued out by Huff against Hearn. The affidavit for the warrant contained the statement by Huff that Hearn "is justly indebted to him in the sum of $22.50 for rent of lands in the county of Bibb, and that said rent is now due and unpaid." Attached to this affidavit is a bill of particulars stating that Hearn was indebted to Huff "for trespassing upon, using, and occupying and cultivating two lots of land in Vineville." When the case was called for trial in the justice's court, Huff amended by alleging that he brought the suit for the rent "as agent for the use and benefit of the receiver of the federal court in the case of Bidwell et al. v. Huff et al." Hearn filed a counter affidavit. On the trial Huff testified in substance as follows: "The amount I claim is for using and occupying two lots of land, one for 2½ years, and one for 3 years. $27.50 is the reasonable rental value of the land for that time. I never did rent the land to Mr. Hearn, or consent to his using or occupying it; but his doing so was without my consent, over my objection and protest. During all the time he occupied and used it, it was in the hands of a receiver of the United States court appointed in the case of Bidwell et al. v. Huff et al. Mr. Clem P. Steed was the receiver. I was acting for the receiver in looking after this and other land during the receivership, and during the time Mr. Hearn used and occupied this land. Mr. Hearn went to see Mr. Steed about renting this land. Mr. Steed refused to have anything to do with him. He said he did not like his face and referred him to me. I refused to let him have the land, and in order to prevent him from occupying it I placed a wire fence around it. Mr. Hearn went and cut the wire fence, and used and occupied it anyhow. Since Mr. Steed died, Mallary and Cone have been appointed receivers of the property in his place, but I have not been agent for them." Hearn testified that he did not see, apply to, or negotiate with Steed, the receiver, about the land in question. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant filed a petition to the superior court for a writ of certiorari, and the writ was granted. On the hearing, the superior court overruled the certiorari, and held that there was no question of fact involved, and entered final judgment for the amount of the verdict in favor of Huff and against Hearn and his bondsman, with interest and cost. The specific assignments of error made in the petition for certiorari will be sufficiently indicated in the following opinion:

The essential basis upon which the right to a distress warrant arises is the existence of the contractual relation of landlord and tenant. Such relation must exist either by express or by implied contract. Section 3116 of the Civil Code of 1895 provides that, "when title is shown in the plaintiff and occupation by the defendant, an obligation to pay rent is generally implied; but if the entry was not under the plaintiff, or if possession is adverse to him, no such implication arises." The case of A. K. & N. Ry. Co. v. McHan, 110 Ga. 543, 35 S. E. 634, was an action for use and occupation of land of the plaintiff by the defendant, "without the consent of the plaintiff and without any authority whatever or right to the said use." The court says: "Under the allegations of the petition * * * the railway company was a trespasser, pure and simple; and, this being so, the plaintiff could not maintain against it an action for the use and occupation of the premises as upon an implied promise to pay rent." And in Allen v. Macon & Dublin R. Co., 107 Ga. 849, 33 S. E. 700; the court says: "The relation of landlord and tenant must exist between the parties; for by virtue of that relation alone can one of them be said to have contracted with the other to pay rent. In no sense is a trespasser the tenant of the owner of land tortiously entered and held adversely to him; and, however guilty of wrongdoing such trespasser may be, it is doubtful whether any court could be persuaded to go so far as to punish him to the extent of making him become the tenant of one with regard to whom he had at least acted consistently in refusing to recognize him as a landlord." In the instant case, according to the plaintiff's own testimony, not only had the defendant refused to recognize him as his landlord, but the plaintiff had absolutely refused to recognize the defendant as his tenant, had objected to and protested against his use and occupancy of the land in question, and had erected a wire fence for the purpose of keeping the defendant out. "The fundamental basis of a distress warrant is that the relation of landlord and tenant shall exist. Rent must be due. This can only be by contract, express or implied. An adverse holder of the land cannot be due rent." Cohen v. Broughton, 54 Ga. 296. And further on in the case just cited the court says, alluding to a distress warrant for rent, that "the writ is a harsh one, and has always been restricted to the case of a tenant by contract, and has never been extended to one holding adversely."

It being, therefore, well settled that the relation of landlord and tenant is essential to the maintenance of a distress warrant, it follows that any fact which precludes the existence of such contract, express or implied, prevents the maintenance of this remedy. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3115, 3124; Sims v. Price, 123 Ga. 97, 50 S. E. 961; Lathrop v. Standard Oil Co., 83 Ga. 307, 9 S. E. 1041; Cohen v. Broughton, supra. Certainly it cannot be claimed that under the evidence of the plaintiff there was any express contract creating the relation of landlord and tenant; and section 3116 of the Civil Code, under the facts, expressly negatives the existence of any implied contract creating such relation. According to the plaintiff, the title to the property was not in him, but was in the receiver in the United States court. The entry upon the lands by the defendant was not under him, but was expressly over his objection and protest, and the possession of the defendant was adverse to him, as well as to the receiver; in other words, relatively to the plaintiff and to the receiver, the defendant was nothing but a trespasser, and the relation of landlord and tenant, therefore, could not, under the law, have existed between him and the defendant, or between the defendant and the receiver, by the express terms of the section of the Code just cited. Besides, there was no evidence of any agreement fixing the amount of rent, nor any evidence on this subject from which a fixed amount could have been ascertained, and a distress warrant cannot be maintained upon a quantum meruit. Cohen v. Broughton, supra. We are clear that under the evidence this case is fully controlled by section 3116 of the Civil Code, above quoted, and the decisions of the Supreme Court cited in this opinion, and we therefore conclude that the judgment of the superior court in overruling the certiorari and in entering a final judgment against the defendant was erroneous.

Judgment reversed.

CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. v. MOBLEY et al. (No. 1,275.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 276*)—ACTION FOR DEATH—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The evidence authorized the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 284*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RULES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

The rules of the defendant company were not introduced in evidence. The trial judge properly restricted an instruction, which had been requested, that the plaintiffs could not recover if their deceased father had violated a contract by which he obligated himself under certain conditions to release the defendant from all liability, by adding a qualification in which the jury were instructed to inquire whether the stipulation of the contract by which the defendant sought to relieve itself was inserted for the purpose of bona fide enforcing the rules of the company, or merely for the purpose of avoiding liability which might arise from the violation of a rule, to the nonenforcement of which the company had consented.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1000; Dec. Dig. § 284.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 144*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—RULES—CUSTOMARY VIOLATION.

Proof that an employer, with full knowledge of the continued violation of rules imposed by him for the government of his employes, has acquiesced therein, will authorize the inference that the rule has been abrogated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 287; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 428*)—EMPLOYEES—INJURIES—VIOLATION OF RULES—NOTICE TO AGENT.

A corporation knows of the violation of its rules and acquiesces therein whenever the particular agent of the corporation who is charged with the enforcement of the rule in question knows of its violation and acquiesces therein. The knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the corporation, and, though it is the duty of the inferior agent charged with the enforcement of a rule to inform his superior thereof, a breach of this duty cannot affect the rights arising from his knowledge that the rule is being violated.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by Joseph Mobley and others, by next friend, against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. A. Hawkins and J. B. Hudson, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Hixon and Shipp & Sheppard, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. The assignments of error contained in the several grounds of the motion for new trial really present but four points—the sufficiency of the evidence, the right of an employe to rely for guidance upon the orders of his superior officer, the abrogation of the rules of a carrier by nonuser, and the question as to what officer of a railroad company must the knowledge of a uniform disregard of its rules be brought to effectuate an abrogation of the rules.

1. Upon the point as to the sufficiency of the evidence it appears, from the testimony in behalf of the plaintiffs, that their father was engaged by the defendant company as a switchman in its yards in the city of Americus. On the occasion when he met his death he was assisting in the shifting of certain freight cars. The yardmaster was temporarily absent, but in his absence the head switchman took his place and directed the shifting of the cars. Plaintiffs' father was ordered by the head switchman to go in between two cars while the engine was attached to them. After uncoupling the cars as directed, the deceased gave a signal which was repeated to the engineer by the acting yardmaster. Instead of obeying this signal, the engineer backed the train of cars down toward the deceased, whose foot got fastened in the switch frog; and, although he made efforts to extricate himself, he was run down by the heavily loaded cars and was so mangled that he died a very few moments afterwards. The witnesses for the defendant did not unequivocally deny that in the absence of the yardmaster Mr. Johnson, the head switchman, had authority to direct in the shifting and making up of trains. But the defendant relied upon a contract, signed by the deceased, in which he stated that he knew that the rules of the company forbade his getting between cars while they were in motion, or even while the cars were standing still, if the engine was attached to them. No rule of the company was introduced in evidence, and the deceased's understanding of the rule mentioned in the contract, to which reference has just been made, as stated by the yardmaster himself when upon the stand, was that, while he was forbidden to go between moving trains for any purpose, he was not forbidden to go between two cars for the purpose of coupling or uncoupling, if the train was standing still, although the cars may be attached to the engine.

The case, as presented by the plaintiffs, was one in which an employe was directed by his superior officer to do what he had contracted not to do, and while engaged in executing these orders was killed without fault upon his part, unless the jury had inferred that by the exercise of ordinary care he could have prevented his foot from being caught in the switch frog; and even upon this latter point there was evidence that the railroad company omitted to provide the frog with a block. The question was not whether the deceased had violated any of the printed rules of the company (for there is no evidence that he had ever seen a printed copy of the rules, or that any such are furnished to the employes of this defendant), but whether by the violation of his contract the plaintiffs are inhibited from recovering for his death. The jury would have had as much right to infer that the deceased received his knowledge of the rules which he bound himself to obey from the verbal explanation of the yardmaster and the construction placed by that officer upon the rules as to infer that he had been provided with a copy of the rules and derived his knowledge from their printed contents. The evidence authorized the jury to find that the contract did not defeat the power of the deceased's superior officer to order, nor the right of the deceased to obey instructions of this superior officer, or to find that, even if the rules were known by the deceased not to be subject to the construction placed upon them by his supposed superior officer, the rule, if such existed, had been abrogated by custom and with the acquiescence of the defendant. This being true, the verdict in favor of the plaintiffs is authorized by the evidence, and a new trial was not required, unless the finding was induced by an error of law on the part of the court.

2. We come, then, to consider whether the court should have qualified the defendant's request to charge by the modification of which complaint is made. In this qualification the court submitted to the jury the question as to whether the stipulation of the contract which referred to the rule was made in good faith by the company, with the intention that the rule should be enforced, or whether the stipulation was an unreasonable and impossible one, not made in good faith, but for the purpose of contracting against any liability which might arise against the defendant and in favor of the employe. For the reasons stated in Austin v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 3 Ga. App. 775, 61 S. E. 998, we think the modification and qualification which the judge placed in the requested instruction was appropriate and proper. The judge charged the jury, as requested, that if they believed from the evidence that the deceased by contract obligated himself not to go between cars while they were attached to an engine, and agreed to release and relieve the defendant from all liability for damages for any injury occurring to him while he should be between the cars so attached to the engine, and that he was thus so injured, and died from the injuries thus received, then his children could not recover damages for the homicide, but added: "If you deem that a reasonable rule and requirement was made in good faith by the company, and intended to be used and enforced by the defendant company, then it would be binding. On the contrary, if it was an unreasonable and impossible rule, and not made in good faith, not intended to be enforced, but made for the purpose of contracting against any liability that might arise against the defendant in favor of the employe, then it would be contrary to public policy and would not be binding, but would be null and void." The judge charged, further: "If that contract was a reasonable one and bona fide, and intended to be enforced at the time, and not made for the purpose of defeating any liability that might arise under the contract, and he was injured and died from the injuries thus received, then his children could not recover damages for his homicide under such circumstances."

The charge of the court was really more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to, inasmuch as no rules were put in evidence, and for this reason the court was not required to determine whether any rule of the company was reasonable or unreasonable. The only question before the jury, under the evidence, was whether the stipulation of the contract was an unreasonable or impossible one; and as, in this instance, the determination of this inquiry must depend upon pure questions of fact, we think it was properly submitted to the jury to say, from the evidence, whether it was unreasonable to require the deceased, as a switchman, not to go between cars, if it otherwise appeared from the evidence that it was a practice well-nigh universal for switchmen to go between cars; and it certainly was a question for the jury (if they found the stipulation of the contract to be unreasonable) to determine from the evidence upon that subject whether the rule, if such existed, was so generally disregarded that the stipulation in the contract was a mere subterfuge to avoid liability.

3. As we held in the Austin Case, supra, rules which have been adopted by a corporation (or any employer for that matter) for the government of its employes may be suspended or abrogated by continual acquiescence in their violation on the part of those officials of the corporation charged with the enforcement of rules, with full knowledge of the fact that the rule in question is being generally disregarded by the employes. The trial judge did not err in his instruction upon this subject, and the evidence was ample that, if there was a rule requiring those employes who were engaged in coupling and uncoupling cars not to go in between cars while the engine was attached to them, the rule was more honored in the breach than in its observance.

Plaintiff in error claims that the court could not properly have instructed the jury to consider the good faith of the defendant and its intention in taking the contract, for the reason that there was no evidence to authorize such a charge. We think the apparent disregard of the company's regulation furnished circumstantial evidence, which might be considered by the jury, as well as direct evidence; and if the knowledge of this disregard was brought home to the defendant it would be fair to infer that the company had no intention of enforcing the rule it is assumed to have adopted, and that the company itself regarded it as unreasonable and incapable of enforcement. A fact may be proven by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, and intention and good faith, as facts, are not usually susceptible of any other kind of proof than that which may be deduced from circumstances.

4. It is insisted, however, that for the company have such knowledge of the general disregard of its rule as that it can be inferred that it has acquiesced in the abrogation of the rule, knowledge of the general disregard of the regulation must be brought home to the president, general manager, or directors of the corporation. We do not agree to the statement as thus broadly made. It is true that the company must first know that its rules are being disregarded, and thereafter acquiesce in the disuser or nonuser of its regulations before it can be said that it has consented to the abrogation of a rule and waived its enforcement, as well as waived any rights which might accrue to it by the terms of the rule; but it is not essential that knowledge of consent to the abrogation of the rules of a corporation should be brought home to its official head. Corporations, being artificial persons, act only through their agents, and they gain information only in this way. It is sufficient, therefore, so far as the rights of any particular person are dependent upon the existence or the nonexistence or waiver of a corporate regulation, if the corporation's agent, charged with the enforcement of a particular regulation at a particular place, waives the rule or consents to its abrogation. As such agent, and being required to enforce the rule, it would be within the scope of his authority, so far, at least, as an employé who works under his direction is concerned, to waive the enforcement of the rule. We think, therefore, that the court properly refused to instruct the jury that "yardmasters, switchmen who act as yardmasters or as switchmen, conductors, engineers, or agents at certain stations, are not officers of the railroad company, and are not such superior officers of the company as to whom knowledge of continued violations of rules will be presumed, so as to abrogate the rule or rules, or to set aside a contract made by an employé."

The fifth ground of the amended motion is not approved by the trial judge, and is therefore not considered. Another ground depends upon the erroneous assumption that the rules of the company had been put in evidence, and was, therefore, properly overruled.

Judgment affirmed.

PACETTI v. CENTRAL OF GEORGIA RY. CO. (No. 1,680.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. PLEADING (§ 8*)—PETITION.

In a petition seeking damages on account of negligence, an allegation that the defendant "knew or ought to have known" of a matter, knowledge of which is essential to raise the duty and the consequent liability for neglect, is equivocal, and will be construed as asserting merely the conclusion of the pleader that the defendant had constructive knowledge. Such an allegation is permissible, however, when the petition alleges specific facts showing a relationship or a set of circumstances which impose upon the defendant a duty to anticipate or to know of the thing in question. The facts set forth in the present petition were adequate to show a violated duty of anticipation.

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 72*)—CARRIERS (§ 347*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—SUDDEN DANGER.

Persons confronted by a dangerous situation, or by an emergency or other circumstances likely to impair judgment and ordinary discretion, are not held to the same quantum of care as they would be otherwise. The question as to whether the plaintiff was guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat her cause of action for the defendant's negligence is issuable under the facts alleged in the petition.

3. PLEADING (§ 9*)—PETITION.

A pleader may, without subjecting his petition to demurrer, allege matters by way of general conclusion, where the specific facts upon which the conclusion rests are detailed with requisite definiteness.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Savannah; Davis Freeman, Judge.

Action by A. C. Pacetti against the Central of Georgia Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This case comes to this court upon the sustaining of demurrers, general and special, to the plaintiff's petition. The substance of the plaintiff's petition is that she went to the passenger station of the defendant in Savannah, in company with other relatives, to bid her brother adieu; that she and her immediate party were standing in the lobby of the station, near one of the gates which led from the general waiting room to the train shed. A set of gates constructed of transverse collapsible iron bars shut off the crowd in the waiting room from the train shed. It was a special occasion, and a large number of persons had gathered in the waiting room and were surging down in the direction of the gate, so that they might enter as soon as the guard stationed there should open the gate. A gentleman accompanied by two ladies shoved his way through the crowd and approached the gate. The guard made preparations to open it and permit the gentleman and the ladies to enter. The crowd to the rear of the plaintiff, seeing that the gate was about to be opened, and thinking that all who wished would be permitted to enter, surged forward and pushed against the plaintiff, and she was being pushed in the direction of the gate, when, for the purpose of lessening the blow which would ensue from the pushing of her body against the gate, she extended her left arm and hand and placed it against the gate. While the plaintiff's hand was thus on the movable framework of the gate, "in plain view of the gatekeeper," he opened it violently, and, as the bars closed up, her thumb was caught between two of the bars, as if between the blades of a pair of shears, and was severely cut, bruised, and crushed. She cried out, and the guard then closed the gate and released her thumb, and she pushed on through the gate.

The eighth paragraph of the petition, to which a special demurrer was sustained, is as follows: "Your petitioner shows that the said gatekeeper of said defendant company, in opening said gate while your petitioner was crushed up against the same, knew that to open the gate would be to inflict injury upon your petitioner. Said gatekeeper knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that your petitioner's hand was on the gate at the time the same was opened, and recklessly disregarded your petitioner's safety and welfare." It is also alleged in the petition, in general terms, that the plaintiff was in the exercise of due and ordinary care, and did not contribute to her injuries; also that she was at a place where she had a right to be and where the public was invited to come. The twelfth paragraph of the petition, to which a special demurrer was sustained, is as follows: "Petitioner further shows that the injuries which she sustained were due entirely to the negligence and want of care of said defendant company, in that (1) the said gatekeeper, as the agent and employé of said defendant company, knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known, that at the time he opened said gate your petitioner's body was crushed against the same, that she was unable to remove her hand from the surface of the gate or to prevent her body from pressing against the gate, because of the crush of the crowd to her rear, and, so knowing, the said agent and employé of said defendant company willfully did that which was calculated to injure and damage your petitioner; (2) in that the said defendant railway company did not afford to your petitioner that protection which is due to the public while lawfully on the ground around its station, but, on the contrary, negligently and carelessly permitted her to receive injury, as above described, at the hands of its agent, servant, and employé."

The special demurrers were as follows: "(1) Paragraph 8 of the petition, which alleges that defendant's gateman recklessly disregarded petitioner's safety and welfare, is the conclusion of the pleader; there being no facts recited in the petition to show that the defendant's agent willfully and knowingly injured said petitioner. (2) Subdivision 1 of paragraph 12 of the petition, which alleges that the defendant's agent willfully did that which was calculated to injure and damage petitioner, is the conclusion of the pleader; there being no facts recited in the petition to show that the action of defendant's agent was willful. (3) Subdivision 2 of said paragraph 12 of the petition, which alleges that the defendant did not afford to petitioner that protection which was due to the public around its station, but negligently and carelessly permitted her to receive injury, does not allege or show what duty or care was due to the petitioner under the law by the defendant, and because the allegation of said paragraph that she was negligently and carelessly permitted to receive injury is the conclusion of the pleader. (4) Defendant demurs specially to the last sentence of paragraph 7 of the petition, because the same does not state what assistance she called on the gateman to render her, and because the allegation therein that he treated her with indifference and seeming anger is the mere conclusion of the pleader."

The court sustained the first, third, and fourth special demurrers, and also the general demurrer, and dismissed the petition. To this ruling the plaintiff excepts.

Oliver & Oliver, for plaintiff in error. H. W. Johnson and Lawton & Cunningham, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under the allegations of the petition, the plaintiff was on the premises of the defendant as an invited guest, and the defendant owed her the duty of exercising toward her ordinary care and diligence to secure her safety. Mandeville Mills v. Dale, 2 Ga. App. 607, 58 S. E. 1060; Civ. Code 1895, § 3824; Rollestone v. Cassirer, 3 Ga. App. 161, 59 S. E. 442. The brief of the counsel for the defendant in error, and the opinion of the trial judge contained in the record, present the proposition that the petition is defective, in that the gateman's knowledge of the presence of the plaintiff's hand upon the gate is alleged in the alternative, that "he knew or in the exercise of ordinary care should have known that the petitioner's hand was upon the gate at the time the same was opened," and that this allegation, under a familiar rule of construction, will be held to mean simply that it was the gateman's duty to know, and not that he actually did know. See Southern Bell Tel. Co. v. Starnes, 122 Ga. 604, 50 S. E. 843; Babcock v. Johnson, 120 Ga. 1030 (6), 48 S. E. 438. It is true that when a petition, in alleging the element of the knowledge of the defendant or his agent as one of the ingredients of the negligence complained of, leaves it doubtful whether the knowledge was actual or constructive, the petition as a whole must set up such a state of facts as prima facie will show a duty (arising from the relationship existing between the parties as asserted, or from the particular circumstances surrounding the transaction) that the defendant or his agent should have known. In other words, to state it differently, in that class of cases in which the duty of anticipation is normally absent, the plaintiff, in order to assert a valid cause of action, must state unequivocally that the defendant had actual knowledge, or else must set up such a state of facts and circumstances as would take the case out of the normal, and raise the duty where it otherwise would not exist.

We think that the present petition does this. Normally, perhaps, a gatekeeper at a railway station would not be called upon to anticipate that any one standing near the gate would have his hands on it. But circumstances alter cases. Under the petition, this was not a normal or ordinary occasion. A crowd of people were surging down the lobby toward the gate. The plaintiff, in front of them, was being pushed against the gate. The conduct of persons jostled about in a crowd is not usually the same as it would be under normal circumstances. Gatekeepers, guards, trainmen, and others whose movements are to be performed in the range of a crowd of people, must of necessity use more caution than they would at other times. It is alleged that the plaintiff's hand was upon the gate in plain view of the gateman. The plaintiff's person was about to be crushed against the gate, and the crowd was pressing her on. It will not do to say that under such circumstances the gatekeeper acted prudently and without negligence in opening the gate without stopping to see whether he could do so without injury to the plaintiff or others who might be pressed up against it. If the allegations of the plaintiff's petition be true (and, of course, on demurrer, their truth is admitted), the gateman's conduct was not only negligent, but it was reckless.

2. It is said, however, that the plaintiff's cause of action fails because of her contributory negligence in placing her hand upon the gate. To our minds this is a more doubtful proposition than the one we have just discussed. It would seem that a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence would not place his hand upon a collapsible iron gate about to be opened, when the opening of it would probably inflict injury upon the hand. As we have said above, however, the plaintiff was not acting under ordinary circumstances. It became necessary for her to throw out her hands in order to keep her body from being crushed against the gate. We are unwilling to say as a matter of law that she went beyond the limits of common prudence in doing this. She may have reasonably believed that, if she threw her hand upon the gate in plain view of the gateman, he would desist from his previously manifested purpose of opening the gate until she had opportunity of extricating herself from the position in which the crush of the crowd had involved her. A person threatened with an imminent danger is not held to the same circumspection of conduct that he would be held to if he were acting without the compulsion of the emergency. A person has a right to choose even a dangerous course, if that course seems the safest one under the circumstances. Our conclusion is that the question of the plaintiff's contributory negligence is issuable, and, under the facts stated in the petition, it should be submitted to the jury.

3. As to the special demurrers: The first, which relates to the eighth paragraph of the petition, was not well taken. The facts alleged seem to support the conclusion asserted. The conclusion of the pleader is demurrable only when the facts alleged do not support it. For a like reason the sustaining of the second special demurrer was erroneous. We find no error in the court's action in sustaining the fourth special demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 20, 1909.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 668*)—FIRE POLICY—ACTIONS—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where a policy of fire insurance requires the insured to submit proofs of loss within a reasonable time, ordinarily it is for the jury to determine whether the proofs were submitted within such time; but, where the undisputed evidence demands a particular finding, it is not error for the judge to direct a verdict accordingly.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 102*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—DILIGENCE.

Proper diligence prior to the trial would have revealed the newly discovered evidence.

3. NO ERROR.

No error appears which would authorize the grant of a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by I. F. Peebles & Co. against the American Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

I. F. Peebles & Co., a partnership composed of I. F. Peebles and his mother, brought suit against the American Insurance Company on a policy of fire insurance covering a one-story brick building in the town of Butler, Ga., in which the plaintiffs carried on a general merchandise business. The fire, which resulted in the total destruction of the building, occurred on April 6, 1906, and originated in another part of the town. The day after the fire the insured gave the company notice in writing of their loss and requested the customary blanks on which to make formal proofs thereof. Receiving no answer to this letter, the insured wrote again, and finally went to the company's general manager at Atlanta and requested in person that the blanks be furnished. This was on July 11th, and immediately thereafter the blanks were filled out and submitted under date of July 18th. The policy contained a provision that the insured "shall give immediate notice of any loss thereby in writing to this company, * * * and within 60 days after the fire, unless such time is extended in writing by this company, shall render a statement to this company, signed and sworn to by said insured, stating * * * the interest of the insured and of all others in the property, the cash value of each item thereof, and the amount of loss thereon." The policy does not provide that a failure to submit proofs of loss within 60 days shall avoid the policy. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff directed by the court, and the defendant excepts to the overruling of its motion for a new trial.

Burton Smith and Lawton Nalley, for plaintiff in error. Ben J. Conyers and Walter T. Colquitt, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The first assignment of error raises the point that, since the insured failed to submit proofs of loss within the time stipulated by the policy, it was a question for the jury as to whether such proofs were submitted within a reasonable time. So far as material to a consideration of this point, the policy involved in the case of Southern Fire Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 622, 36 S. E. 821, 52 L. R. A. 70, 78 Am. St. Rep. 216, contains provisions similar to the one involved in the case at bar. In that case the Supreme Court held that a failure to submit proofs of loss within the time stipulated by the policy would not work a forfeiture, if the proofs of loss were submitted "in time for at least 60 days to elapse between the date upon which they were furnished and the expiration of the 12 months' limitation" within which suit should be brought on the policy. This time was fixed by the court as being a reasonable compliance with the stipulations of the policy; it being said by Judge Cobb that the policy would never be forfeited if the insured submitted proofs of loss within a reasonable time. What is a reasonable time must be determined in light of the peculiar facts and circumstances of each particular case. Where under the evidence reasonable men might draw different inferences or there is material conflict in the evidence, the determination of the question is for the jury. Brooks v. Boyd, 1 Ga. App. 65, 70, 57 S. E. 1093; Cin. Glass Co. v. Stephens, 3 Ga. App. 766, 60 S. E. 360. But, where the undisputed evidence clearly demands a finding that the proofs were submitted within a reasonable time, it is not error for the judge to direct the jury in accordance with the only legal result possible in the case. Abbeville Trading Co. v. Butler, 3 Ga. App. 138, 59 S. E. 450; Emerson v. Knight, 130 Ga. 100, 60 S. E. 255; Perry v. Macon Consolidated R. Co., 101 Ga. 400, 29 S. E. 304; Barnshaw v. United States, 146 U. S. 60, 13 Sup. Ct. 14, 38 L. Ed. 887. Applying this rule to the evidence in the case at bar, it was not error for the judge to instruct the jury that the proofs were submitted within a reasonable time. The fire occurred on April 6th. The very next day the plaintiffs notified the defendants of the loss, and requested blank forms, which were kept by the company and customarily sent to policy holders upon which proofs of loss are made. After waiting several days the plaintiffs wrote again, and were finally forced to make a trip to Atlanta in order to obtain the blank forms, and immediately thereafter filled them out and sent them to the company. In view of these facts it would have been illegal for the jury to have found that the delay on the part of the insured was unreasonable.

2. The policy contains a provision that it "shall be void * * * if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." Where the company claims a breach of this condition, the burden of so proving rests upon it. 2 Clement on Fire Insurance, 182; Indian River Bank v. Hartford Ins. Co., 46 Fla. 283, 35 South. 228 (3); Gate City Ins. Co. v. Thornton (No. 1,522) 63 S. E. 638; Morris v. Imperial Ins. Co., 106 Ga. 461, 32 S. E. 595. The insurance company did not introduce any evidence at the trial tending to show a breach of this condition. The evidence of the plaintiff on the question of ownership of the land, at the trial, was to the effect that I. F. Peebles & Co. had been in possession since 1895, claiming a fee-simple title, and that the deeds were not on record and had been lost. One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial is based on alleged newly discovered evidence tending to show that the land upon which the building stood was owned by I. F. Peebles, instead of I. F. Peebles & Co. Even if it should be established beyond question that one of the partners owned the lot individually and that the other had no interest therein, it is extremely doubtful whether this would show a breach of the condition, under the rule of strict construction which must be indulged against the insurer; for there is respectable authority for the proposition that, to hold the policy void because of this condition, there must be an ownership in some person who is not a party to the contract of insurance. Mascott v. Insurance Co., 69 Vt. 116, 119, 37 Atl. 255. The policy was to be void only if the building was on "ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." The moral hazard may possibly be increased where some of the persons insured are interested in the building and not in the land, because, where the ownership attaches both to the building and the land, the temptation to burn is lessened, since the owner might lose the value of the use of the land during the period of vacancy; and this reason might apply even in the case of a partnership. But we deem it unnecessary to decide the question just suggested.

The alleged newly discovered evidence would not authorize a new trial. It is not necessarily inconsistent with plaintiff's testimony at the trial, and is of slight probative value, consisting merely of a deed, dated in 1883, from Charlton G. Ogburn to I. F. Peebles, and a deed, dated November 23, 1907, from I. F. Peebles to Mrs. S. A. Peebles, his mother, conveying an undivided one-half interest in the land in question, together with the certificate of the clerk of the superior court to the effect that the latter deed had been lodged with him for the purpose of being recorded. The Ogburn deed has been of record in Taylor county, Ga., since 1883, and could easily have been discovered by the exercise of proper diligence prior to the trial. The deed from Peebles to his mother, given after the trial in the court below, is not inconsistent with the testimony, delivered at the trial, to the effect that the deed of I. F. Peebles & Co. to the property had been lost, and that the new deed was merely to take the place of the lost one. Furthermore, a proper notice to produce would have put the defendant in possession of the plaintiffs' muniments of title, and would have enabled the defense now sought to be raised to have been presented at the former trial. This court is now thoroughly committed to the proposition that new trials will not be given to litigants who have exercised post mortem diligence only. Murphy v. Meacham, 1 Ga. App. 155, 57 S. E. 1046; De Vane v. A., B. & A. R. Co., 4 Ga. App. 141, 60 S. E. 1079.

3. We have carefully considered each of the assignments of error, and have examined the authorities cited in connection therewith, but find nothing to authorize the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

On Rehearing.

It is proper, perhaps, that we should notice that ground of the motion for rehearing in which it is insisted that the judgment refusing a new trial should be reversed because of the error of the trial judge in directing the verdict, for the reason especially 'hat it is for the jury to say in every case whether the proofs of loss are filed within a reasonable time. It is insisted that the court has overlooked the ruling in Southern Fire Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 623, 36 S. E. 822 (52 L. R. A. 70, 78 Am. St. Rep. 216), in which it is held that "it was a question for the jury whether a reasonable time for furnishing the proofs had elapsed between the date the fire occurred and the date that the proofs of loss were submitted." And it is argued that (as the question as to what was a reasonable time was not submitted to the jury in the present case) to uphold the error of the trial judge in directing a finding upon that point would be to attempt to reverse the decisions of the Supreme Court and to permit judges to invade the province of the jury, thus opening wide the door to fact-finding judges. The fact that this court did not overlook the decision in the Knight Case is evidenced by the fact that it is cited in the original opinion as authority for our decision upon the point involved. We did not go very fully into the subject, because we apprehended that reference to the Knight Case itself would dispense with the necessity of repetition of the views therein expressed. For this reason, in quoting from the Knight Case that "what would be a reasonable time is to be determined by the particular facts of each case," we inserted as our own, after the word "facts," the words "and circumstances," instead of pursuing the text of the opinion in the Knight Case, and quoting the remainder of the sentence, holding that "in determining this question a valid stipulation in the policy that no suit should be brought thereon after the lapse of a given time should be taken into consideration." The reason why we say anything further at this time is in order that we may impress clearly our judicial judgment that all issues of fact are for the determination of the jury, and to point out that there is nothing in the decision in this case which contravenes this opinion, and nothing held in this case which is in conflict with our repeated rulings upon the same subject. So fixed is this rule in this court that we have universally held that as a matter of strict law the direction of a verdict in any case is error, but that it is harmless error, and not reversible, if a different finding from that directed could in no view be supported.

As has already been said in the opinion in this case, the verbiage of the stipulation in the policy in the Knight Case upon the subject of proof of loss, and the stipulation in the policy now under consideration, are practically identical. Each policy requires that suit shall be brought within 12 months; and the policy issued and now contested by the plaintiff in error contains a proviso that proof of loss must be made within 60 days, just as did the policy considered in the Knight Case. In the Knight Case it appeared that proofs of loss, as in the present case, were not submitted until after the expiration of 60 days from the date of the fire. The Knight Case was decided, and the judgment of the lower court reversed, upon another point; but, in so far as the decision in the Knight Case is controlling upon the point now before us, it was held that, unless there was an express stipulation to that effect, the mere failure to file proofs of loss within the period designated by the policy would not work a forfeiture, and that an express stipulation that failure to submit proofs within the time limited should forfeit the policy was required to effectuate that end. And the conclusion of the whole matter is that (varied by the peculiar facts and circumstances of each particular case) any time may be said to be a reasonable time for the filing of proofs of loss which would allow 60 days to elapse between the time of the submission of proofs and the commencement of suit within 12 months, as provided for by the policy. If we look only to the decision in the Knight Case as precedent, and the contract in the present case be construed, as such contracts always should be, most strongly against the insurer, then it would perhaps have devolved upon the insurer to show that the time within which the proofs of loss in the present case were furnished was unreasonable. But if the insured carries the burden, as we think he should, of showing that the proofs of loss, though not submitted within the stipulated time, were filed within a reasonable time, what issue of fact upon the subject of reasonableness was there to submit to the jury, and wherein was the direction of the judge harmful to the plaintiff in error?

There was no conflict in the evidence upon the subject. The insured promptly notified the company of the fire, and requested blank proofs of loss to be sent to them. The uncontradicted testimony shows that the company had these blanks, and that it was the custom of this and of other companies to forward their special blanks prepared by them to their patrons when fires occurred. The request of the defendant in error in this case was treated with silent contempt. A second request met with a like fate. As it is a universal custom for these blanks to be forwarded, and as their request for the blanks was ignored, in the absence of any proof to the contrary, what inference could arise under the testimony, except that the company waived the stipulation requiring the proofs of loss to be made within 60 days? It matters not whether the supposition was to be indulged that the company did not intend to pay the policy, or that it intended to pay the policy. The only reasonable inference which could arise from the neglect to comply with the request for the blank forms of proof of loss, which the company had prepared for the use of its patrons and had in wholesale quantities in its office, was that the company was not in any haste to adjust the claim, and, knowing that it had 60 days in any event after the receipt of proofs of loss before suit could be brought, was contended to let the proof of loss be deferred to such later time as might suit the convenience of the insured. Is it conceivable that any jury of plain, honest men would find otherwise than that the insurance company's refusal and neglect to furnish a particular patron with as slight a thing as a mere blank proof of loss (with which it was supplied in wholesale quantities, and which it and all other insurance companies are accustomed to furnish, as prepared each for itself, whenever a fire occurs) was a waiver of the stipulation (which does not necessarily amount to a forfeiture), and that the time of the proof of loss was waived?

The case is very similar to that of Merchants' & Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Vining, 67 Ga. 661 (1), and German-American Ins. Co. v. Davidson, 67 Ga. 11 (6). In the Merchants' & Mechanics' Insurance Co. Case, supra, the court held that: "Where the general agent of an insurance company refused to settle with a policy holder who claimed to have sustained a loss until the termination of certain garnishment cases, and refused to fix either the liability or the amount thereof, alleging such garnishments as a reason, such conduct amounted to a refusal to pay and a waiver of preliminary proofs, at least during the pendency of the garnishment cases." And in discussing the case Chief Justice Jackson says: "The important question in this case in respect to the charge of the court touching the refusal of the company to pay the policy, and thereby the waiver of the proof of loss, at least so far as not to defeat the recovery here because of the delay in making that proof, has been discussed and decided by this court this morning in the opinion pronounced by Judge Crawford, and hence it is unnecessary to do more than refer to that decision. It may be added to that argument that the terms of these two policies, both exactly alike, do not require the forfeiture of the policies, even if nothing equivalent to an absolute waiver had occurred, because the stipulation is that the company shall not be sued until 60 days after the proof of loss, and this suit has not been brought sooner than that time. But, when a man absolutely refuses to settle with another until the termination of another suit, it would seem that such refusal to settle is an absolute refusal to pay until that time has expired; and, as the proof was made in some two months afterwards to the general agent at Columbus himself, it is difficult to see how the defendant was hurt by any charge bearing on this point. The time when made is reasonable under all the facts, and it would have been a great wrong to allow the recovery to be defeated on such a point. A great wrong, or that which works a great wrong, without some show of reason, cannot be law."

In the Knight Case, as we understand it, it is held as a matter of law that any time which allows the company 60 days before the termination of the 12 months in which suit may be brought to contest the justness of the claim may be a reasonable time. There was, therefore, under the evidence, no issue of fact to submit to the jury upon the subject of reasonable time; but even if the Supreme Court had not ruled, as it has, upon the point, the uncontradicted evidence was such, we think, as to have permitted but one finding, and therefore, if there was an error on the part of the court in not submitting to the jury the determination of whether the proofs were submitted within a reasonable time, it was harmless, and not reversible error. Upon the authority of the Knight Case and the Merchants' & Mechanics' Insurance Co. Case, supra, as precedent, as a matter of law, the ruling of the trial judge was without error. Under the opinion of Chief Justice Jackson, which we have quoted, the conduct of the defendant in the present case, in regard to the request for its forms of proof of loss, was subject to no other construction than that it waived the stipulation within sixty days. Whether it waived proofs of loss or not, the unusual course of the company in neglecting to forward its blanks to the plaintiffs upon their request caused the delay, according to the evidence; and the conduct of the plaintiffs in subsequently coming to Atlanta for the blanks, in the absence of any evidence introduced by the defendant upon this point, could, in our judgment, lead a jury to no other conclusion than that the proofs of loss, in such form as required by the contract of insurance, could not reasonably have been presented sooner than they were submitted.

Another point urged in the motion for rehearing, and to which we did not refer in the opinion, though it was not overlooked in reaching our decision, was the exception taken to the amendment of the plaintiff, and the evidence thereunder in regard to the character of the house. As to this we need only say that, while the policy described the building as a brick building, and the evidence showed it to have been largely composed of concrete blocks, there was no error in the allowance of the amendment, or in the admission of the testimony in accordance with the amendment. It was not, as is insisted, a case where the company insured one building and is held liable for another of an entirely different kind. No written application for a policy was made by the insured. The agent of the company who wrote the policy saw the building before the issuance of the policy, and knew it was largely constructed of concrete blocks. There was nothing to deceive him as to the character of the building. It spoke for itself, and his knowledge was the company's knowledge. The company, therefore, had seen the building before they insured it, and knowingly and voluntarily assumed the greater risk, if a greater risk was in fact assumed. The amendment and the evidence was in accord with this undisputed state of facts.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al. v. PEEK.

(No. 1,331.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. TRIAL (§ 236*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

The charge of the court on the credibility of witnesses successfully impeached is in harmony with repeated decisions of the Supreme Court and this court, and is substantially in the language of Civ. Code 1895, § 5295.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 531, 532; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 23*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where a railway company and one of its agents were jointly sued by an employé of the railway company to recover damages for his false arrest and imprisonment on the charge of larceny in taking coal from the company's yard, evidence that for years the employés of the company, with the knowledge and consent of the company and the agent, had made a practice of taking coal from the company's yard, was admissible. This evidence illustrated both the question as to the animus furandi of the employé in taking the coal and the quo animo of the defendants in causing his arrest and imprisonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

3. SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

No error of law appears, and the verdict is supported by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by W. H. Peek against the Southern Railway Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for plaintiffs in error. Westmoreland Bros., for defendant in error.

HILL, C. J. Peek brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against the Southern Railway Company, and Dwyer as one of its servants or agents to recover damages for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution. The jury returned a verdict in his favor for $500 as damages for false imprisonment, and the defendants' motion for a new trial was overruled. Besides the general grounds, the motion alleges error in certain rulings on evidence and on certain portions of the charge.

As to the general grounds, it may be stated that the evidence fully supports the material allegations of fact in plaintiff's petition, to wit, that while he was engaged as an engineer in the company's yards in the city of Atlanta he was arrested without a warrant or legal authority by Dwyer, acting for the railway company, on the charge of simple larceny; that after his illegal arrest he was taken by Dwyer to the station house in the city of Atlanta and was there incarcerated for about eight hours, when he was taken before the recorder and was prosecuted by Dwyer at the instance and under the direction of the railway company on the charge of simple larceny, and after a full investigation he was acquitted and discharged by the recorder; that he had not committed the offense of simple larceny for which he was arrested, and his arrest was entirely without probable cause, and the detention of his person and his imprisonment was without warrant or legal authority. The facts upon which the charge of larceny was based were the taking by the plaintiff, Peek, of some coal which had dropped from coal cars into the yard of the railway company, and the taking of a "sack of shorts" which he picked up where it had fallen from one of the cars of the railway company, and which he had carried and placed in the inspector's house in the yard; and the material question was as to Peek's intention in taking these articles. He did not deny taking the articles, but did deny intent to commit a larceny in taking them. As to the coal, he proved that it had been a custom for years among the employes of the railway company to take up coal which had fallen from the cars, and that this practice was well known by the company, and no objection to the practice had been interposed by the company, and that in taking the coal he did so openly and followed the practice above stated; that this custom and practice was not only known to the company, but was fully known to the defendant Dwyer at the time of the arrest; and that, as to the sack of shorts that he had taken from where he found it in the yard, he placed it in the inspector's house for the benefit of the company. All these questions were settled by the jury in favor of the plaintiff, and unless the court committed some material error of law which contributed to the verdict it should not be disturbed.

There was an attempt on the part of the defendant to impeach Peek as a witness by evidence of general bad character, which attempt was met by Peek by counter evidence proving his general good character, and the evidence as to the general custom or practice by the employes of the railway company alluded to was admitted by the court over the objection of the defendant. The special assignments of error may be reduced to two, and will be considered in their order.

1. The first ground of the amended motion for a new trial objects to the following charge of the court: "If a witness is successfully impeached, then as to the matters with reference to which he is impeached, he should not be believed by the jury, unless his evidence is corroborated by other unimpeached evidence or circumstances proved to your satisfaction in the case." It is contended that this charge is error, because it limits the effect of the impeachment to matters with reference to which the impeachment is sought; that, while it is a question for the jury to determine as to the credibility of the witness whose evidence is impeached by proof of bad character or contradictory statements, the impeachment, if successful, goes to all of his evidence, and should not be limited to that evidence with regard to which he is charged with making contradictory statements. In addition to the excerpt above objected to, and in the same connection, the court charged that, if the witness swore willfully and knowingly falsely, his testimony should be disregarded entirely, unless corroborated by circumstances or other unimpeached evidence. The charge, as a whole, on the subject of impeachment of witnesses, is almost in the exact language (certainly with no material variance) of section 5295, Civ. Code 1895, and charges in similar language have been repeatedly approved by the Supreme Court and by this court. See, especially, the case of Sims v. Scheussler (No. 1,385, decided by this court March 22, 1906), 64 S. E. 99. We conclude that the charge excepted to is, therefore not subject to the criticism made that it "modified and restricted the rules of law governing the impeachment of witnesses to the prejudice of the defendants." It may be remarked in this connection that whether any witness had been successfully impeached was solely a question for the jury, and under the evidence submitted to them they could well have come to the conclusion that an attempt made to impeach any witness had not been successful.

2. The plaintiffs in error make several assignments of error, based on the rulings of the court in admitting evidence, over objection, as to the existence of a custom or practice on the part of the employes of the railway company and other people in taking up and carrying away, with the knowledge of the company and its agents, coal and other things found in its yard, and which had fallen from its cars; and error is also assigned upon certain portions of the charge to the jury as to the effect of such evidence, if they believed that such custom or practice existed and was known to the defendant company, or its servants or agents. The objection to this evidence and to the charge thereon are elaborated with great detail, but are embraced in the general statement that such evidence was immaterial and irrelevant, that there was no evidence that the existence of such a custom or practice was known to the railway company or its agents, and that, if such a custom or practice existed, it constituted no defense or justification that could be urged by any particular person. We think that the evidence which tended to show the existence of this custom or practice by the employees and others was clearly relevant and material, as illustrating both the question as to the animus furandi of Peek and the quo animo of the defendants in making his arrest. Peek did not deny that he had taken the coal from the yard. His defense was that he did not intend to steal it, and to prove such defense he set up this custom or practice. If it had existed for a long time, and was known to the railway company or to Dwyer, its existence would certainly tend to illustrate Peek's innocent purpose and intention in taking the property, and would tend to strengthen the truth of his contention that his arrest and imprisonment were unlawful and without probable cause; in other words, that in taking the coal he had committed no offense, and that this fact was well known to the defendants when they nevertheless arrested and imprisoned him. We therefore conclude that the court did right in admitting the evidence, and properly instructed the jury as to the manner in which such evidence should be considered by them.

From a careful consideration of the case, we are satisfied that no error of law was committed, that the verdict of the jury is supported by the evidence, and that the judgment refusing to grant a new trial should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

WALKER v. CITY OF ROME
(No. 1,429.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 363*)—BIAS OR PREJUDICE.
It is always competent, as illustrating the credibility of a witness, to show his animus as to a matter relevant to the controversy or his feelings toward either party to the cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1177, 1178, 1181; Dec. Dig. § 363.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 215*)—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF INDEBTEDNESS—ADMISSIBILITY.

A statement of an account, which contains or upon which is indorsed an acknowledgment of indebtedness, is admissible either as original proof or in corroboration of other testimony showing the defendant's indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 215.*]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 1035*)—INDEBTEDNESS—PROOF—MINUTES.

Proof of the indebtedness of a municipal corporation is not necessarily confined to the contents of its minutes. A creditor of a municipal corporation may prove his debt by evidence other than the minutes of the municipality, or even by credible testimony which is in direct conflict with the minutes. His right to recover cannot be defeated by the mere failure of the municipal corporation to keep correct minutes of its proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 1035.*]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 36*)—ABSORPTION OF MUNICIPALITY—LIABILITY FOR DEBTS.

Where two municipal corporations are consolidated and the new corporation receives assets of value, or where one municipality absorbs another and receives property and cash which is liable for the payment of the debts of the absorbed and dissolved corporation, the absorbing municipality becomes liable, at least to the amount of the assets it receives, for such pre-existing debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 105-111; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Floyd County; Moses Wright, Judge.

Action by Henry Walker in a justice's court against the City of Rome. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff sued out a certiorari, which was overruled by the judge of the superior court, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff in error, an attorney at law, brought suit in a justice's court against the city of Rome for services rendered as city attorney of the town of East Rome. It appears that in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 20, 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 1010), the town of East Rome was annexed to the city of Rome, and that the latter corporation assumed sovereignty over the former territory and the inhabitants of East Rome, and received, under the terms of the act of annexation, about $8,000 in solvent tax debts and in personal and real property, including about $280 in cash. The act of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 820) authorized the town of East Rome to employ counsel for the town. The evidence was undisputed that Mr. Walker, the plaintiff in error, was the regularly employed attorney of East Rome, and that as such he performed the services for which the suit was brought, and that under the direction of the finance committee of the council of East Rome he incurred the expense of the bill for typewriting and stenographic work which formed a part of the account sued upon. In the statement of account attached to the summons in the justice's court the plaintiff set forth his cause of action very fully. It was alleged that the city of Rome is indebted to the plaintiff because the debt "was assumed by the city of Rome under an express enactment contained in the act of August 20, 1906, amending the charter of said city," and that "the city of Rome, having taken over the territory of East Rome, became liable to plaintiff in the sum sued for; and it is also liable because sovereignty carries with it obligation. The city of Rome received from East Rome, under the scheme of annexation, a sum of cash, and personal and real property of East Rome, more than sufficient to pay said debt." The plaintiff then set forth in detail his services in preparing four resolutions, and the item of clerical work "ordered and had done in pursuance of" the last resolution mentioned. The account had entered upon it the approval of the chairman of the finance committee of East Rome. The defendant did not file any answer denying the justness and fairness of the plaintiff's claim, or any portion of it, and did not introduce any testimony. The jury found in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff certiorari; and the writ of error complains of the judgment overruling and dismissing the certiorari.

Henry Walker, for plaintiff in error. W. J. Nunnally, for defendant in error.

RUSSELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). We think the court erred in overruling the certiorari. Three errors were assigned in the petition for certiorari. In the first place it is insisted that the justice of the peace erred in permitting a witness to testify, over plaintiff's objection (that the testimony was irrelevant), that "plaintiff and said three councilmen actively opposed annexation at the polls and elsewhere." It is always competent and proper to show the animus of a witness as to a matter relevant to the controversy or his feelings toward a party to the cause. There was no error in admitting the testimony showing the feeling of the witnesses as to the matter which was the original bone of contention. A party cross-examining the witnesses of his adversary should be allowed the fullest right of thorough and sifting cross-examination, and the feelings or bias of a witness as to the subject-matter of controversy, or as to any party involved in the litigation is always the legitimate subject-matter of inquiry, because it may affect the credibility of such witness before the jury.

2. We think the court erred in excluding the original approved account from the evidence. Under the evidence of the clerk of the council at East Rome, the account when approved by the chairman of the finance committee, was a duly approved voucher. It was an acknowledgment by the debtor which, under the practice prevailing in that municipality, was entitled to payment. According to the evidence, the account was examined, found correct, approved, and directed to be paid. It was declared upon as a liquidated debt, and was relevant as evidence. As appears by the record, the objection urged at the time to the introduction of the voucher into evidence was irrelevancy, because "no evidence of any debt against East Rome." As has already been said, it was uncontradicted in the evidence (and the testimony had been admitted without objection) that Mr. Walker was the city attorney of East Rome, that he performed the services charged in the account, and the minutes of East Rome gave evidence of the fact that these services were accepted. Of necessity, an implied contract arose, by which East Rome was bound to pay the reasonable value of these services, which the proceedings of the council show had been accepted by the municipality. As heretofore stated, there was no denial of the justice of the claim or that the services were rendered; and for that reason, if the suit had been proceeding against the town of East Rome, the plaintiff should have recovered. The testimony which the court ruled out, so far as it relates to the approval of the account by the chairman of the finance committee, was strictly in corroboration of the testimony theretofore adduced in behalf of the plaintiff, being an admission of East Rome's liability for the amount stated, after it had been shown by the evidence that the defendant by having accepted the services, was liable for some amount.

3. A county cannot be held liable upon any contract which is not entered upon the minutes kept by the proper county authorities; and it is insisted, in the brief of learned counsel for the defendant, that inasmuch as there is no evidence from the minutes of East Rome, showing that a contract was made with Mr. Walker to act as city attorney, the plaintiff failed to make out his case against East Rome. The provision in regard to contracts which impose liabilities upon counties is a statutory requirement limited to counties. We know of no rule by which a municipal corporation is relieved from liability for the obligations assumed in its behalf, or for debts incurred in its behalf, by the properly constituted agent or agencies, or for services which have been accepted by the proper municipal authority, under an implied agreement to pay for the same; and certainly, where in the ordinary conduct of the business of a municipality debts are incurred in the purchase of supplies, or where in the procurement of services necessary for the ordinary administration of the business of the municipality an indebtedness is created, for which funds have already been raised and are in hand in cash sufficient for its payment, as appears in the present instance, there is lacking neither the proper authorization to create the debt nor the liability to comply with it. So far as the present case is concerned, the minutes of the council of East Rome show that that municipality, knowing that Walker expected pay for his services, received the benefit of them. But, even if the evidence for the plaintiff had depended entirely upon the oral testimony, we see no reason why he would not still be entitled to recover if the suit were proceeding against the town of East Rome. So far as a debt created by the properly authorized agent of a municipality is concerned, the creditor is not estopped from enforcing his contract because the contract which is the basis of the indebtedness has not been entered upon the minutes of the municipality. Proof of the indebtedness of a municipal corporation is not necessarily confined to the contents of its minutes. A creditor of a municipality may prove his debt by evidence other than the minutes of the municipality, or even by evidence in direct conflict with the minutes, if such evidence is credible to the jury. One who claims to be a creditor of a municipality must, of course, show that the agent by whom the debt was created had full authority to contract with him; but the right of a creditor to recover upon a debt due him by a municipal corporation cannot be defeated by its mere failure to keep correct minutes of its proceedings, or even if no record be kept at all. It is essential to the protection of every municipality that the minutes of the proceedings of its officials be kept; but this is rather for the protection of the municipality against the misfeasance of its own agents than to defeat the just claims of creditors to whom the city may properly have become indebted upon contracts legally made by agents of the municipality, authorized or required to make such contracts.

4. It being clear to us that the original liability of East Rome was established by the evidence, we come next to consider whether the liability of the city of Rome as defendant in the suit was established. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we think the circumstance that the clerk of the council of East Rome had delivered to the city of Rome $8,000 worth of real property, tax fi. fas., and cash, considered in connection with the resolution of the mayor and council of East Rome, taken from the minutes, is sufficient to establish the fact that annexation, by virtue of the act of 1906 (Acts of 1906, p. 1010), is an accomplished fact and that the town of East Rome, in accordance with the provision of that legislation, has been merged into the city of Rome, with the right of sovereignty in the latter over the inhabitants and territory formerly within the municipality of East Rome. In view of the language contained in the act of 1906, no other inference is suggested by the transfer of the assets of the town of East Rome. The effect of the act of 1906, then, was to repeal the act incorporating the town of East Rome and to deliver its assets to the city of Rome. As held in Broughton v. Pensacola, 93 U. S. 268, 269, 23 L. Ed. 896, Justice Field delivering the opinion of the court (and reiterated in New Orleans v. Clark, 95 U. S. 654, 24 L. Ed. 521), the rule as to public corporations is not different from that as to private corporations, where a merger or consolidation of two corporations is effected whereby one of them becomes possessed of the assets of the other. True, in the case of private corporations, the consolidation may be effected by the agreement of the corporations themselves, without the intervention of the state; whereas the consolidation of two public corporations, or the absorption of one municipality into another, can only be effectuated by the sovereign legislative power of the state. But, whether the corporation be public or private, if the effect of the consolidation is to dissolve or destroy one of the corporations previously existing, and, by reason of the merger, the remaining corporation becomes possessed of property or assets of the extinct corporation, it takes these assets and properly charged with the debts of the deceased municipality. The rule laid down as to private corporations, in Tompkins v. Augusta Southern R. Co., 102 Ga. 443, 30 S. E. 992, and in Hawkins v. Central of Ga. Ry. Co., 119 Ga. 163, 46 S. E. 82, is equally applicable to cases where one municipality absorbs another.

We do not say that, in the exercise of its broad powers to create and destroy municipalities at its pleasure, the Legislature might not provide to the contrary, by express enactment to that effect; but where, as in the act of 1906, supra, no provision is made upon the subject, the municipality which is given sovereignty over the territory and inhabitants of a former existing municipality, and receives funds which are charged with the payment of its debts, takes these assets charged with a trust which it is bound, ex æquo et bono, to discharge. There may have been no courtship and no romance attendant upon the ceremonial; but the act of 1906 effected a marriage between Rome and East Rome, and attached a liability "analogous to that of the husband for the debts of the wife under the old law of baron and feme." When the plaintiff, after having established the primary liability of East Rome, thereafter showed that the city of Rome had received $280 in cash which was subject to his debt and to no other, he was entitled to a verdict in his favor. The verdict rendered against him was wholly without evidence, and contrary to evidence, and should have been set aside.

Judgment reversed.

FINLEY v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(No. 1,007.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1909.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1176*)—DECISION—DIRECTIONS TO COURT BELOW.

The Court of Appeals is clothed with power to direct any order necessary for the proper adjudication of a cause. It may give any direction to a cause pending in the court below which may be consistent with the law and justice of the case, including the power of directing a specific final disposition of the case. But this power will not be exercised unless the discretion of the lower court has been improperly used, or not exercised at all.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4583, 4589; Dec. Dig. § 1176.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 8*)—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

It was not error to order a new trial. A verdict for damages rendered against two or more defendants as tort-feasors should be set aside when it is, as against any one of the defendants thus held liable, unwarranted by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 11; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 239*)—TORTS—JOINT TORT-FEASORS.

A plaintiff can sue one or more than one, or he can sue all, of several joint tort-feasors in the same action, and the jury, by its verdict, can bind one and relieve another, as the evidence may authorize; but if the verdict be rendered against all of the defendants, the judgment thereon is single, and must stand or fall alone. Such a judgment is in law a creature of such nature that it cannot survive the severance or amputation of any one of its members.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 417, 424; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 239*)—TORTS—JOINT TORT-FEASORS.

In an action brought against a defendant as a joint tort-feasor, a recovery may be had upon an allegation of negligence in which the other alleged tort-feasors did not participate; and where it is alleged that one of the defendants, by his servant, committed a tort and that two other defendants directed, counseled, caused, or procured this servant to commit the tort in the conduct of his master's business, upon proof of these facts, all or any one of them may be held liable. But, if the connection essential to hold the two others is not established—that is to say, if it is not shown that they directed, counseled, caused, or procured the servant to commit the tort—they may be discharged from liability, and the master alone be held liable for the wrongful conduct of his servant who committed the act.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by E. C. Finley, by his next friend, against the Southern Railway Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Burton Smith, for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster, Howell & Heyman, for defendants in error.

RUSSELL, J. Finley, a minor, by his next friend, sued the Southern Railway Company, together with Wadar Turner and Walter Hagan (who were the yardmaster and assistant yardmaster, respectively, of the defendant corporation), for $20,000. On the trial of the case the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $8,000, and upon motion the judge of the city court granted a new trial. The plaintiff excepted, and asks that the judgment granting a new trial, apparently on a point of law alone, be reversed, with direction to the lower court to pass upon the single question whether the verdict is supported by the evidence. The contention of the plaintiff is that the trial judge erred in his construction of the petition and in his application of the evidence thereto. It is insisted that the allegations of the petition were amply supported by the evidence, and that the verdict, which was set aside, was required by the evidence.

In granting the motion for new trial the trial judge passed the following order: "The only negligence complained of in this suit, and charged to have caused the plaintiff's injury, is that of the two individual defendants, and of the railroad company through their conduct. There is no complaint of the engineer's negligence. Such an allegation would have made a severable cause of action, and the court would not have charged that the verdict must be against all or none. Under the pleading the defendant railroad company was not called upon to defend as to the engineer's negligence. As I regard it, it is not a question of variance between the pleading and the evidence. The evidence was all admissible to show how the accident occurred, and it completely disproves the negligence alleged. I do not see how the plaintiff can recover on this pleading on the evidence in the record. I believe, for this reason, the law requires the grant of a new trial; and it is so ordered." The plaintiff insists that it does not appear from this judgment but that the court was satisfied with the amount of the verdict, and contends that the judge might approve the finding of the jury after the ruling by this court upon the law, and upon direction given by us that his discretion be exercised solely upon the point of the sufficiency of the evidence. To use the language employed by counsel for the plaintiff in his brief, it is proposed "that this court shall direct the court below to pass upon the verdict, subject to right directions received therefrom as to the law, and if, subject to these directions, he approves, the verdict be allowed to stand."

1. We entertain no doubt of the prerogative of this court, in a proper case, to make a tentative or even a final disposition of a case by appropriate direction. In fact, we have several times exercised the power. The constitutional amendment creating the Court of Appeals gave this court, as to the cases within its peculiar jurisdiction, the same powers as the Supreme Court within its peculiar jurisdiction. Among the powers of the Supreme Court, enumerated in Civ. Code 1895, § 5498, it is empowered "to hear and determine all causes, civil and criminal, that may come before it, and to grant judgments of affirmance or reversal, or any other order, direction, or decree required therein, and, if necessary, to make a final disposition of the cause, but in the manner prescribed elsewhere in this Code." Like authority is conveyed in section 5586 of the Civil Code in these words: "It shall be within the power of the Supreme Court to award such order and direction in the cause in the court below as may be consistent with the law and justice of the case." Indeed, this would seem to be a power inherent in all courts of review in the absence of statute. Following these Code sections this court has, in numerous cases, given direction touching the proceedings in the lower court, when we considered the direction to be in conformity with the law or in the interest of justice. See Askew v. So. Ry. Co., 1 Ga. App. 79, 58 S. E. 242; Jarrell v. American Machine Co., 2 Ga. App. 769, 59 S. E. 186; Dunn v. Western Union Tel. Co., 2 Ga. App. 845, 59 S. E. 189; Oglesby v. State, 1 Ga. App. 195, 57 S. E. 938; Hartman Stock Farm v. Henley, 4 Ga. App. 60, 60 S. E. 808; Dennis v. Schofield, 1 Ga. App. 491, 57 S. E. 925; Bashinsky v. Western Union Tel. Co., 1 Ga. App. 765, 58 S. E. 91; Cole v. State, 2 Ga. App. 738, 59 S. E. 24; Mandeville Mills v. Dale, 2 Ga. App. 607, 58 S. E. 1060. These rulings go back to Davis et al. v. Gurley, 51 Ga. 74, and Irwin v. Riley, 68 Ga. 606. See, also, Harvey v. Jewell, 84 Ga. 238, 10 S. E. 631; Morton v. Frick, 87 Ga. 230, 13 S. E. 463; Central Ry. & Banking Co. v. Kent, 91 Ga. 687, 18 S. E. 850; and Comer v. Dufour, 95 Ga. 376, 22 S. E. 543, 30 L. R. A. 300, 51 Am. St. Rep. 89.

In Central Ry. Co. v. Kent, supra, the court disagreed upon another point, and Chief Justice Bleckley dissented, entertaining the view that the evidence in that case warranted the verdict rendered; but there was no division upon the proposition that under the section of the Code above cited the court had the right to order the case dismissed. Following Judge Bleckley, we would be unwilling to set aside the verdict of a jury upon issuable facts, and, indeed, if in any case this is the only issue presented, we are without jurisdiction to do so. But in the Kent Case, supra, there was no division of opinion on the part of the Supreme Court as to the power of that court, in a proper case, to dismiss a cause from the lower court. In fact, at no time has the court questioned its constitutional right to direct a final disposition of a cause in the lower court. In Comer v. Dufour, supra, the facts being undisputed, the superior court was ordered to render a final judgment in favor of the defendant. And likewise we apprehend it to be within the appropriate jurisdiction of this court to exercise directory powers in any case where there is no issue of fact. See, also, Green & Colwell v. Hill, 101 Ga. 258, 28 S. E. 692; Gibson v. Wilkins et al., 110 Ga. 94, 35 S. E. 316; St. Amand v. Lehman, 120 Ga. 258, 47 S. E. 949; Brown v. Joiner, 77 Ga. 232, 3 S. E. 157; Ford v. Harris, 95 Ga. 97, 22 S. E. 144 (4); Sims v. Cordele Ice Company, 119 Ga. 597, 46 S. E. 841; Brown v. Bowman, 119 Ga. 153, 46 S. E. 410. As said by Judge Hall, in speaking of the Supreme Court in Harris v. Hull, Executor, 70 Ga. 838: "One great purpose in establishing this court was to terminate suits, and with this view it is made its duty, not only to grant judgments of affirmance or reversal, but any other order, direction, or decree required, and, if necessary, to make a final disposition of the cause (Code 1882, § 218 [Civ. Code 1895, § 5498]), and it is empowered to give to the cause in the court below such direction as may be consistent with the law and justice of the case. Code, § 4284 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5586). Litigation should never be protracted where this, with due regard to the rights of parties, can possibly be avoided. 'Interest reipublice ut sit finis litium' is a maxim so old that its origin is hidden in a remote antiquity, and the policy which it inculcates is so essential as not to admit of question or dispute."

Of course, this power, like the performance of any other duty of grave moment, is to be most cautiously exercised; but the framers of our organic law foresaw that cases might arise in which a court of last resort could well be intrusted with the power, not only of ordering amendments or directing their rejection in the court below, and of molding judgments by the application of the law to admitted facts, or of removing future ambiguity by construing and applying the law, but also of summarily directing in a proper case a final judgment in behalf of one of the parties to the cause. Without any purpose of discussing at this time the full and exact scope of this court's directory powers, it is sufficient to say that we deem that we have the power, in any case in which it appears that the trial judge has not exercised his discretion in the consideration of a motion for new trial, to order that that discretion be exercised, and we would feel it to be our duty to reverse the judgment of the lower court in the present case, if we were not satisfied that the trial judge exercised his discretion upon every point raised by the motion for a new trial. Furthermore, we are convinced that the judgment he rendered on the motion is right.

2. Recognizing the duty, the exercise of which has been invoked by counsel for plaintiff in error, we have carefully examined the record to ascertain whether, either through failure to exercise any part of his discretion or on account of misconstruction of the pleadings or misapprehension of the issues, the learned trial judge had erred in setting aside the verdict of the jury and in awarding a new trial. We do not understand that the plaintiff in error insists that the judge abused his discretion in passing upon the facts. The complaint is more especially addressed to the insistence that the judge erred in granting a new trial upon his construction of the pleadings and upon the ground that the finding of the jury was contrary to the charge of the court. We are of the opinion that the trial judge properly granted a new trial, though not for the precise reasons stated by him, and that he should have granted a new trial (even conceding the strongest contentions of the plaintiff in error to be well taken) for the reason, as stated in the judgment, that the verdict, as construed by the evidence in the case, cannot be supported by the evidence. It may be true, as insisted by counsel for the plaintiff in error, that what the judge meant by this was different from what we now mean; but in passing upon the first grant of a new trial by the lower court this court will be slow in limiting the meaning of the language employed in the grant of a new trial, and will sustain the grant if, upon investigation of the record, it is found that the judgment awarding a new trial is for any reason right.

This suit proceeded against three defendants. The verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff against all of the defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. Regardless of all other questions in the case, the judgment of the judge of the city court in awarding a new trial is right, because there is no evidence which would have authorized the jury to find a verdict against the defendants Turner and Hagan. Brownlee v. Abbott, 108 Ga. 761, 33 S. E. 44. The action in the Brownlee Case was trover, but under the decision in Mashburn v. Dannenburg, 117 Ga. 584, 44 S. E. 97, the same rule applies (as reasonably it must) to all actionable torts. In the Mashburn Case it is pointed out that the plaintiff may proceed against either one or all of several joint tort-feasors, and if he elects to sue more than one, and obtains a verdict against more than one, the verdict as to each must be authorized by the evidence. It is not alleged in the petition that either Turner or Hagan ordered the engineer of the defendant company to suddenly project his engine against the cars upon track No. 17, whereby the plaintiff was injured, nor is it proved that they either directed the movements alleged to be the cause of the injury or were present when it was done. The company might be liable for the negligence of its engineer in suddenly crashing his engine into a line of box cars, thereby causing a violent and dangerous collision. The company would be liable if under the general direction of Turner and Hagan, or either of them, this had happened through any inattention on their part in the conduct of the company's business; but Turner and Hagan themselves would not be individually liable unless they ordered the movement which caused the catastrophe. There is no evidence which authorized the finding of the verdict against these two defendants, and, as the lower court did not have the right to strike them either from the verdict or from the judgment, the court was required to set aside the verdict as to them, and also as to their codefendant.

From this it results that there is no reason why the judgment of the lower court should be reversed. If that court released Hagan and Turner from the jury's finding, as it should have done, the verdict's confining circle was broken as to all included therein. A single chain had fastened the three defendants together, and when the chain was broken, and two of the prisoners were released, the third was unconfined, regardless of whether a portion of the chain might still be on his person.

3. We think, however, that the court erred in charging the jury that this plaintiff must recover against all of the defendants or against none. Joint tort-feasors may be sued together, and recovery may be had against one or more of them, as the liability of each may appear from the evidence. One or more may be found liable. Others may be adjudged not guilty of the tortuous act alleged. Hollingsworth v. Howard, 113 Ga. 1090, 39 S. E. 465 (2); W. U. Telegraph Co. v. Griffith, 111 Ga. 558, 36 S. E. 850, and citations. A plaintiff can sue one or more than one, or he can sue all, of several joint tort-feasors in the same action, and the jury by its verdict can bind one and relieve another, as the evidence may authorize; but, if the verdict be rendered against all of the defendants, the judgment thereon is single, and must stand or fall alone. Such a judgment is in law a creature of such nature that it cannot survive the severance or amputation of any one of its members.

4. We are of the opinion, also, that the court erred in charging the jury that the plaintiff could only recover upon such acts of negligence as were shown to be chargeable to the servants Hagan and Turner. The court was right in charging the jury that the plaintiff could only recover upon the allegations of negligence set forth in the petition. But the defendant company, as a tort-feasor, though sued jointly with Hagan and Turner, might be liable for the negligence of some employé other than they, if, as is alleged in the petition, the negligence of the engineer contributed to the injury; and, though this statement might have been specially demurrable, the name of the engineer was not called for, and it is certain from the allegations of the petition that he was neither Turner nor Hagan.

We have referred to these two latter matters in order that upon another trial the jury may be properly instructed as to these points. But upon the main issue involved the court was not in error in awarding a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

On Rehearing.

The motion for rehearing invokes the exercise of this court's power to make a final disposition of a cause. It now is asked that this court direct the judge of the city court to dismiss the case as to Turner and Hagan, and let the verdict stand as against the defendant company, and that the judgment be reformed accordingly. The motion for rehearing is based upon the allegation that the court overlooked the case of Irwin v. Riley, 68 Ga. 605. We assume that the learned counsel for plaintiff in error intended to say that the court, perhaps, misconceived the decision in that case, for it is cited in the original opinion. In passing upon this case we dealt at some length with the question of the Court of Appeals' directory power, and think we made clear that this court possesses, in any proper case, the power to give final disposition to a case. We did not lose sight of the fact that it was within the power of the court to give the present case the disposition now sought by the plaintiff in error in his motion for rehearing, and while incidentally to our discussion of the subject, we quoted from the request of the plaintiff in error, as embodied in the brief, we did not mean to hold nor can it be inferred that the court did hold, that in giving direction to a cause the exercise of its power is limited to the request of either or both of the parties. The direction to be given should be that which is right and proper in the particular case.

After a careful consideration of the motion for rehearing this court reiterates its opinion, and holds that there is not only no reason why this court should direct a final disposition of the case, but manifest reasons why it should not overrule the discretion of the trial judge in granting a new trial. As heretofore pointed out, it appears that the judge of the city court exercised his discretion in passing upon the motion for new trial. The new trial ordered is the first grant of a new trial. We have not held, and cannot hold, upon review of the evidence adduced upon the trial, that a verdict is demanded against any of the defendants. We can only say, as we have previously said, that the evidence might have authorized a verdict against the Southern Railway Company, and did not authorize a verdict against the other two defendants. However, the testimony was not undisputed even as to the defendant that we held might have been liable, and in this view of the case how could this court hold, as a matter of law, that the trial judge was satisfied with the verdict, even as to the defendant the Southern Railway Company? We do not think it can be assumed from the judge's order granting a new trial that he was satisfied with the verdict, either in the conclusion reached or in the amount of the finding. The judgment of a trial court is to be measured by its correctness, rather than by the reasons assigned for its rendition. We cannot say that the verdict rendered against the Southern Railway Company was demanded by the evidence, and that the judge would have erred in granting a new trial if he had possessed the power (which this court has) to eliminate the other two defendants Hagan and Turner from the judgment. If we could say this, we would feel it our duty to direct that Hagan and Turner be stricken from the judgment, and that judgment be entered up in the city court against the defendant railway company in accordance with the finding of the jury against it. As we cannot say that the verdict was demanded as to any of the defendants in this case, to direct a judgment which would effect a final disposition of the case would be an arbitrary invasion and overruling of the discretion of the trial judge, which would not be proper on the part of this court, except in a case where the trial judge had palpably abused his discretion in granting a new trial, and where the finding reached was the only lawful conclusion from the evidence.

As we stated in the opinion, the judgment of a trial court granting a new trial will be affirmed, if it is right for any reason; and we cannot concur in the opinion that it is to be inferred, in a case where the jury finds contrary to the evidence, or contrary to the charge of the court (even though it transpires that the instructions of the court were erroneous), that for that reason the judge approves the verdict upon a particular part of the case or as to one of the parties to the cause. In the opinion of this court, regardless of the reasons which may have most influenced the trial judge in granting a new trial, and though this court has the power to finally dispose of any cause, we do not see (upon a review of the evidence in the record) that this case differs from any other in which there are issuable facts that a jury, and not this court, should determine; and certainly the rule is well settled that the first grant of a new trial, where issues of fact are involved, should not be disturbed by a reviewing court.

The motion for rehearing is therefore denied.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1176*)—DETERMINATION AND DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REVERSAL WITH DIRECTION.

"Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium." This case has been to this court three times. There is error in the record. The judgment will be reversed, but the issues will be restricted, and direction given for the summary disposition of the question remaining in the case.

Error from City Court of Miller County; C. C. Bush, Judge.

Action by J. Kelly against Judge Fudge.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes Judgment for plaintiff, and Fudge brings error. Reversed, with directions.

W. I. Geer, for plaintiff in error. P. D. Rich, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. This case has been here twice before. See Kelly v. Fudge, 2 Ga. App. 759, 59 S. E. 19; Fudge v. Kelly, 4 Ga. App. 630, 62 S. E. 96. It will be seen by reference to the previous decisions in the case that Fudge and Kelly swapped horses, and that Kelly claimed that Fudge committed a fraud on him by swapping him a horse which was subject to an execution under which it was subsequently seized. From the opinion of this court reported in 4 Ga. App. 631, 62 S. E. 96, it appears that the case was sent back because it did not affirmatively appear from the record that the process under which the horse had been seized was a valid lien thereon at the time of the seizure. In the trial now under review it appeared that Fudge bought the horse which was swapped to Kelly from one Williams, who in turn had bought it from Cowart, and that it was under a fi. fa. against Cowart that the property was seized after Fudge had traded it to Kelly. This execution would not have been an incumbrance against the property in the hands of Kelly, who was an innocent purchaser, unless there was a record of it on the general execution docket at the time of the trade. Whether it was so recorded or not does not appear from the record. The plaintiff, therefore, did not make out his case.

It appeared at the trial that the original fi. fa. had been lost. The proof on this question was sufficient to admit secondary evidence. Indeed, there seems to be substantially no question as to the existence of the fi. fa. The material question stands out: Was it duly recorded on the general execution docket? If it was, the verdict rendered by the jury in favor of the plaintiff should stand; if it was not, the verdict was wrong, for the horse which Kelly received in the swap is still his, wherever it may be, and is free from the incumbrance of the lien. Kelly has had two successive findings in his favor. There should be an end to the litigation. This court has power to give direction necessary to the focusing of the issues in the case and the ending of litigation. Civ. Code 1895, § 5586; Finley v. So. Ry. Co., 5 Ga. App. —, 63 S. E. 312.

We reverse the judgment, but give direction that if, within 10 days after the remittitur of this court is filed in the office of the clerk of the court below, the plaintiff's counsel shall present to the judge, and cause to be filed as part of the record, a certified copy from the general execution docket, showing that at the date Kelly purchased the horse the fi. fa. in question had been duly recorded thereon, and that it was not dormant, the judge of the city court of Miller county shall thereupon, without further trial of the case, enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant, in accordance with the verdict of the jury at the last trial; but, if the plaintiff shall not file this additional record within the time prescribed, we direct that a judgment be entered dismissing the plaintiff's action. The cost of bringing up this writ of error is taxed against the defendant in error.

Judgment reversed, with direction.

LEVERETT v. TIFT. (No. 1,632.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. CONTINUANCE (§§ 7, 29*)—APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 968*) — SURPRISE — DISCRETION OF COURT — REVIEW.

The court has full power to protect a party from surprises brought about by the production of papers by the opposite party under circumstances not reasonably to be expected, and, if necessary, may continue the case or suspend the trial in order to give the party so surprised an opportunity to present his case fairly. However, this right must be exercised with sound discretion, and, unless it appears that the continuance of the case would probably further the interests of justice, the court may decline either to suspend the trial or to continue the case. It does not clearly appear that the judge abused his discretion in the present instance.

2. EVIDENCE (§§ 370, 372*)—DEEDS (§ 193*)—RECORDED DEEDS — ANCIENT DOCUMENTS — FORGERY — BURDEN OF PROOF.

If a deed is recorded on proper probate, it is admissible in evidence without further proof of its authenticity, unless the party against whom it is tendered files an affidavit of forgery. If the deed is more than 30 years old, and is otherwise entitled to admission as an ancient document, it needs no further prima facie proof of its execution, whether it be recorded or not. The party against whom the deed is tendered may attack the deed for forgery without filing the usual affidavit, even if it is admissible in evidence as an ancient document and is recorded on proper probate; but the burden of proof is upon him. Although a deed more than 30 years old is for any reason not admissible as an ancient document, yet, if it is recorded upon proper probate, the party against whom it is tendered must file the affidavit of forgery, before the burden of proving the authenticity of the instrument is cast upon the party tendering it.

3. TRESPASS (§ 46*) — TRESPASS TO LAND — PRIMA FACIE CASE — DEFENSES.

In trespass cases, where the plaintiff has never been in possession and the action turns solely upon his title, the plaintiff may make a prima facie case by showing that both parties claim under a common grantor. The defendant may, however, defeat this prima facie case by showing paramount outstanding title in a third person, or by showing that the common grantor parted with his title by a conveyance superior to the plaintiff's title.

4. TRESPASS (§ 46*)—TRESPASS TO REALTY—DEFENSES.

In trespass cases of the kind mentioned in the preceding headnote, the defendant is entitled to a verdict whenever he shows that the plaintiff was never in possession of the property and that the true title is in another. It is not necessary for him to show that he himself has the true title.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Tifton; R. Eve, Judge.

Action by B. F. Leverett, as administrator de bonis non of Elijah Munkus, against H. H. Tift. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

B. F. Leverett, as administrator de bonis non of Elijah Munkus, sued H. H. Tift in trespass for cutting the timber upon lot of land No. 3 in the Second district of originally Irwin (now Turner) county. The case turns upon the title of the plaintiff, as the cutting was admitted, and there was a verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff made a prima facie case, by showing plat and grant from the state of Georgia to Elijah Munkus, together with a certified copy of his letters of administration. This plat and grant were dated March 25, 1841. It was shown, also, that the defendant had cut the timber under a chain of title originating in a forged deed purporting to have been made by Munkus to James A. Green on December 4, 1846, though, so far as the defendant himself is concerned, he seems to have acted in good faith and innocently; there being no intimation that he knew or suspected the forgery. At the trial, however, the defendant introduced a deed from Elijah Munkus to A. Cobb, dated September 2, 1843. It was duly attested and had been recorded just a few days before the trial. It is stated in the record that this deed was offered as an ancient document. The defendant attempted to show a chain of title from A. Cobb into himself, obtained by him, however, since the pendency of this litigation; but this chain was defective, because one of the conveyances purported to have been made by the heirs at law of one of the grantees into whom the title had been traced, and there was no sufficient proof that these persons were in fact the heirs at law of that grantee. It seems that this deed from Munkus to Cobb was found just a few days before the trial, and prior to that time the defendant had claimed solely under the chain of title which originated in the deed mentioned above as having been proved at the trial to be a forgery. Further facts necessary to an understanding of the points decided will be stated in the opinion.

Haygood & Cutts, for plaintiff in error. Tulwood & Murray and Hal Lawson, for defendant in error.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. When the defendant offered in evidence the deed from Elijah Munkus to A. Cobb, dated September 2, 1843, the plaintiff's counsel moved for a continuance on the ground that he was surprised, that he was for the first time confronted with this deed, and that the defendant had in signed writings filed in court admitted that he claimed title originating in a different manner. No statutory affidavit of forgery was filed, but the plaintiff's counsel stated in his place that he believed this deed also to be a forgery, and wanted further time in which to get proof of this fact. The judge, after inspecting the paper, and after comparing the signature of the official witness on this deed with the signature of the same witness on another deed contained in the chain of title and admitted to be genuine, declined to grant the continuance; and this action of the court is complained of in the motion for a new trial.

It was ruled in the case of Williams v. Rawlins, 10 Ga. 491, that either party in a case involving title to land is entitled to impeach by proof, and without making affidavit of forgery, the genuineness of any deed offered in evidence, and if the deed "be sprung upon the party by surprise, and he is not prepared with proof to assail it," a continuance may be granted upon suitable showing and necessary time given to procure testimony. That a continuance may be granted to either party by reason of surprises, brought about by the production of papers, the existence of which the movant for the continuance could not reasonably have anticipated, where the transaction smacks of surreptitiousness or unfairness, or there is reasonable ground to believe that the interests of justice require the continuance in order that the movant may have full and reasonable opportunity to prepare his case, is unquestioned. In addition to the case just cited, see Trustees v. Blount, 70 Ga. 779; Maynard v. Cleveland, 76 Ga. 52; Crawford v. Hodge, 81 Ga. 728, 8 S. E. 208.

Applications of this kind, however, are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial judge; and his action thereon will not be reversed, unless there has been an abuse of discretion. In passing upon such a motion the judge has a right to take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case. If the object sought through the continuance is to attack a paper for forgery, the movant should make it appear that there is at least some probability that his attack will be successful. There must be something more than a mere hope on the part of the movant's counsel that he will be able to discover some testimony not available to him at the time of the trial.

We cannot say that the judge abused his discretion in the present case. It is true that counsel for the movant stated that to him the deed looked like a forgery; but the judge himself saw the deed, saw the indicia of its genuineness, and was in better position than we are to determine whether there was any reasonable prospect that the movant might be successful in an attack upon it, if he were given the additional time for which he asked. The judge, as it turned out, was probably correct; for, although about three months elapsed between the date of the trial and the date when the motion for a new trial was heard, and although any new evidence showing the deed to be a forgery could have been brought to the attention of the court in one of the grounds of the motion for a new trial, no such evidence was presented, nor was its existence suggested.

2. Objection was made to the introduction of the deed from Munkus to Cobb on the ground that it was tendered as an ancient document, and it was not shown that possession had been held consistently with this paper, and therefore it was necessary for the defendant who offered it to make additional proof of its genuineness. We have referred to the fact that this deed was properly attested and recorded. By Civ. Code 1895, § 3628, it is provided: "A registered deed shall be admitted in evidence in any court in this state without further proof, unless the maker of the deed, or one of his heirs, or the opposite party in the cause, will file an affidavit that the said deed is a forgery, to the best of his knowledge and belief, when the court shall arrest the cause and require an issue to be made and tried as to the genuineness of the alleged deed." No affidavit of forgery was filed. Therefore there was no error in admitting the deed in evidence.

If the deed is recorded upon proper probate, and is not admissible as an ancient document, the filing of this affidavit casts the burden of proof upon the party offering the deed. If no affidavit of forgery is filed, the party against whom the deed is offered may nevertheless attack it; but in that event he assumes the burden of proof. This is also the rule where the deed, though more than 30 years old, is for any reason not admissible in evidence, without further proof, as an ancient document. If the deed is an ancient document, and the preliminary showing is made which entitles it to introduction in evidence as such, the filing of an affidavit of forgery will have no effect; for, though the deed may be attacked as a forgery, the burden of proving the forgery is upon the attacking party, and cannot be shifted by the filing of an affidavit. These are the necessary deductions from the following cases:

Knight v. Suddeth, 126 Ga. 231, 55 S. E. 81; McArthur v. Morrison, 107 Ga. 796, 34 S. E. 205; Patterson v. Collier, 75 Ga. 419, 58 Am. Rep. 472; Sibley v. Haslam, 75 Ga. 493. Therefore, if the plaintiff in this case was correct in his proposition that the deed was not admissible as an ancient document, and he desired to shift the burden of proof to the defendant, it was necessary for him to file an affidavit of forgery, since it was recorded on proper probate, and this, as well as the ancient character of the instrument, afforded prima facie evidence of its authenticity.

An attentive reading of the case of McArthur v. Morrison, supra, sometimes considered as authority for the proposition that an affidavit of forgery cannot be tendered to a deed offered as an ancient document, will show that it is authority only for the proposition that this affidavit cannot be filed in the event it appears that the deed is in fact admissible as an ancient document. Of course if a deed is shown to be entitled to admission as an ancient document without the filing of the affidavit of forgery would be utterly useless and unavailable as a method of attack, and this much the McArthur Case clearly holds. On the other hand, this case is not authority for the proposition that an affidavit of forgery may not be filed to a registered deed more than 30 years old, if it is not accompanied by those other indicia of genuineness precedent to its admission in evidence as an ancient document. In other words, a party tendering a recorded deed more than 30 years old has two ways of getting it into evidence—as an ancient document, or as a registered deed—and the party objecting must close up both these routes; otherwise, the deed goes in, and the burden rests on him who assails its genuineness.

8. The record also presents the point that since the defendant claimed the right to cut the timber under a chain of title emanating from a forged deed purporting to have been executed by the plaintiff's intestate, and since it was thereby shown that the plaintiff and the defendant claimed under the same common grantor, the defendant should not have been allowed to defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery by showing that the plaintiff's intestate had parted with his title; that, where the plaintiff and the defendant claim under a common grantor, the defendant cannot defeat a recovery by showing paramount outstanding title without connecting himself with it. Until the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Wall, 126 Ga. 172, 54 S. E. 944, was rendered, it was doubtful in this state whether the rule of estoppel, often applied in ejectment cases where both parties claim under the same common grantor, was applicable to trespass cases. The decision in that case very clearly and satisfactorily shows that the rule is applicable to the extent that the fact of the defendant's holding under the plaintiff's grantor is equivalent to a rebuttable admission of the fact that in this common grantor the true title once reposed, and that this admission is sufficient to make a prima facie case in behalf of the plaintiff, and to throw upon the defendant the burden of proving that the plaintiff who traces title to this same source by superior deed is not in fact the true owner of the land, or to show by some other means that he is not entitled to recover in the action. It is not authority for the proposition that the defendant may not show that the plaintiff is not the owner of the land, and therefore not entitled to recover, although he and the plaintiff claim under the same grantor, and the plaintiff's apparent title, as emanating from the common grantor, is the superior. The admission implied against the defendant when it is shown that he holds under a common grantor with the plaintiff binds him to no broader proposition than that the true title once reposed in this common grantor. It does not bind him to the proposition that the true title still remains in that common grantor or in his estate at the time of the bringing of the suit.

In the case of Morris v. McCamey, 9 Ga. 160, the defendant had caused a fl. fa. in his favor to be levied on the land upon which the trespass was alleged to have been committed, as the property of T. McCamey, and the plaintiff had become the purchaser of the property at that sale. The plaintiff, therefore, contended that the action of the defendant in causing the property to be levied upon as the property of T. McCamey was an admission on his part that the title was in T. McCamey, and that this admission estopped the defendant from insisting that there could be a paramount title in another as against the plaintiff who had bought at that sale. The court rejected the proposition and held that since in the proof it appeared that paramount title was in another, although the defendant did not connect himself with it, the plaintiff could not recover. That case is very analogous to the case at bar.

It would be an absurd proposition to say, if A. took a defective title emanating out of B., that B. or his administrator could part with that title and nevertheless recover in trespass from A. for injury or damage done to the property. Reduced to its last analysis, the plaintiff's proposition amounts to this: That although Elijah Munkus sold this land nearly 70 years ago, and parted with all his title and interest in it, the plaintiff, who has recently taken out letters of administration on his estate, can nevertheless sue and recover damages for the trespass committed upon this property, as to which neither Munkus nor his estate has had the slightest right or title for nearly three-score years and ten, simply because the deed by which Munkus sold the property was not recorded, and the defendant bought under a forged chain of title purporting to have emanated from the same source. Of course, the true owners, the subsequent grantees from Cobb, could sue for the trespass, and the defendant would be liable to them (unless he was able to show that the title which he produced at the trial connected with Cobb's title), and yet Munkus' administrator says he must be paid, too, as a penalty for the defendant's having bought a defective title purporting to have originated in his intestate. The law imposes no such penalty for buying even a forged title.

The position of the defendant is entirely consistent with the proposition promulgated in the case of Garbutt Lumber Co. v. Wall, supra. He admits that the true title once reposed in Munkus. He now says, to the complete defeating of the plaintiff's action, that it no longer reposes there. We do not understand the rule to be, even in ejectment, that the defendant may not defeat a recovery by showing that the common grantor parted with his title by a conveyance superior to the plaintiff's title, as well as superior to his own, though he may be forbidden to show that the true title never came into the common grantor.

4. The court fairly submitted to the jury the question as to whether the deed from Munkus to Cobb was genuine or not, and their verdict necessarily declared it to be genuine. The plaintiff's right of recovery, therefore, failed at this point, and alleged erroneous rulings made in admitting deeds by which the defendant attempted to connect himself with the title which Munkus conveyed to Cobb were wholly immaterial. In trespass, the defendant need not show title in himself, where the plaintiff has never been in possession and his action depends solely on his title. The defendant succeeds whenever he shows that true title was not in the plaintiff at the time of bringing suit. We see no reason for granting a new trial.

Judgment affirmed.

Where a written contract of conditional sale described the property sold as "one sorrel horse six years old, and one sorrel horse seven years old," on the trial of an action of trover by the seller to recover the one referred to as seven years old, brought against one who purchased such horse from the original buyer, held:

(a) It was not error to overrule a demurrer to the petition, to which was attached a copy of such written contract upon which plaintiff alleged that he relied to show title, nor to overrule an objection by the defendant to the admission in evidence of such written contract, on the ground that the property sued for was not sufficiently described therein. Thomas Furniture Co. v. NEW TRIAL (§ 70)—GROUNDS.

In an action brought by a laborer who had been engaged in digging a ditch for laying a sewer, the plaintiff contended that he was injured by reason of the fall of a scaffold erected over the place where he was at work, and on which it was his duty to throw dirt from the bottom of the ditch, in order that it might be thrown to another point by a laborer on the platform; that the platform, which was constructed under the direction of the master or his alter ego, was negligently constructed, nails of insufficient size being used for that purpose; and that this was known to the master, or should have been known by the use of ordinary care, and was not known to the plaintiff, who did not have equal opportunity with the master for knowing it, and could not discover it by the use of ordinary care. There was no complaint of any ruling of law made by the court during the trial; and, the evidence being sufficient to support the verdict found for the plaintiff, there was no error in overruling a motion for a new trial.

ATKINSON, J. On August 18, 1905, an act of the Legislature was approved to authorize the mayor and council of Marietta to order and have held an election to determine whether or not bonds should be issued for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a system of sewerage. Acts 1905, p. 983. On August 20, 1906, a separate act was approved, authorizing an election to be held to determine whether bonds should be issued for the establishing and maintaining of a system of waterworks. Acts 1906, p. 846. In pursuance of these acts both elections were held on November 16, 1908, being conducted by separate managers and with separate boxes, though in the same room. The vote was canvassed and declared by ordinance to have been carried in each case in favor of the issuance of bonds by two-thirds of the qualified voters of the city. Notice was given to the Solicitor General, and he instituted proceedings in each case to validate the bonds under the act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 82; Van Epps' Supp. Code, §§ 6074-6081). The city answered, admitting the allegations of the petition filed, and alleging that the necessary steps had been taken to make the issue of bonds legal in each case. T. M. Brumby intervened, and objected to the validation of each proposed issue of bonds. On the hearing evidence was introduced, and the presiding judge entered a judgment of validation in each case. The intervenor excepted. The two cases were argued together in this court, as they involved the same questions.

There is no doubt that, in order for a municipal corporation to be authorized to issue bonds, there must be a compliance with the essential provisions of the law. Without this there is no legal authorization. But there is a distinction between the mandatory provisions of the law, without a compliance with which no legal election can be held, and directory provisions in regard to the manner of conducting an election which is legally held, or in regard to the conduct of persons thereat. If an election is held without authority of law, or if prerequisites to the valid holding thereof are not complied with, it is void, and can confer no authority; but if there is lawful authority for the election, and the prerequisites to its being held have been complied with, and it is held at the proper time and place by persons qualified to hold it, mere irregularities in the manner in which it is conducted will not render the election void, or defeat it, if it is not shown that by that noncompliance the result is different from what it would have been had there been proper compliance with the law. Pol. Code 1895, § 112; Coleman v. Board of Education, 131 Ga. 643, 63 S. E. 41.

Section 378 of the Political Code provides that such an election "shall be held by the same persons, and in the same manner, under the same rules and regulations that elections for officers of said county, municipality, or divisions are held." The act of August 15, 1904 (Acts 1904, p. 519), establishing a new charter for the city of Marietta, provided that no persons, except voters approaching the polls for the purpose of voting, election managers and clerks, and county or municipal officers called in to preserve order, or persons passing along the highway on business, should be permitted to be within 50 feet of any polling place. It was also declared to be unlawful for any person to electioneer or in any way influence or try to influence any voter, or to speak to him on the subject of voting, within 50 feet of the voting place, except that managers in discharge of their duty might speak to a voter, provided they did not electioneer or seek to influence him; and it was made unlawful for any person to lead or carry a voter to the polls, or to accompany or follow him, either to influence his vote, or to see how he voted, or to see that he voted in any particular way; and it was declared that any person who should in any manner violate any of these provisions should be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction should be punished as prescribed in section 1039 of the Penal Code of 1895. Evidence was introduced to show that these provisions of the charter of Marietta were disregarded and violated by partisans on both sides of the contest; that the election was held in the council chamber, which was located in the courthouse, and that persons who favored one bond issue or the other, or who were opposed to both, acted in disregard of the statute referred to. Some evidence was also introduced tending to show that on some occasions, while the clerk of council, who was the regular registrar, was absent, some voters came to the office and were allowed by the city marshal to register. Only one name was mentioned as probably having thus registered; but there was some evidence indicating that a few additional persons had done the same thing, and also that on one occasion the marshal had gone to the store of a resident and permitted him to register there. It was not shown whether the person last mentioned favored the bond issues or not; or whether he voted in the election. It appeared that the other person named favored one of the issues and opposed the other; but it did not appear that he voted, though it was stated that he was present at the courthouse, taking an interest in how others voted. If there were others whose registration was irregular, it did not appear that they voted, or that they were disqualified from registering.

The intervener did not allege the absence of any of the prerequisites for the holding of the elections, but contended only that matters of the character above indicated rendered the elections void. Applying the rule which has been above stated, this contention cannot be sustained. If it were conceded that persons desirous of having the issues of bonds authorized or opposing such issues acted in violation of the provisions of the charter of the city of Marietta, and made themselves subject to prosecution for a misdemeanor, that alone would not render the election void. The act provides punishment for disobedience of its provisions, but does not provide that the entire election shall be nullified thereby; nor would this follow, at least unless it were shown that the result would have been otherwise save for such conduct. If it were held that a violation of the charter provisions by any person would of itself invalidate the entire election, this would put it in the power of any person who was opposed to the issuing of bonds to defeat the will of the qualified voters lawfully expressed by himself merely disobeying the law. Even a failure on the part of the managers to protest against such conduct, or to call upon proper authorities to suppress it, would not suffice to overturn the entire election, and defeat the will of the qualified voters, where it did not appear that the result would have been otherwise, had the directions of the statute been properly observed. See Cole v. McClendon, 109 Ga. 183, 34 S. E. 384; Chamlee v. Davis, 115 Ga. 266, 41 S. E. 691; Jossey v. Speer, 107 Ga. 823, 33 S. E. 718. The matters of which complaint was made were violations of directory provisions of the charter, but were not so mandatory or essential as ipso facto to render the election a nullity; and it is not shown that any harm was done, or that the result would have been different, had the directions contained in the charter been observed.

It was contended in the argument before this court that inasmuch as section 378 of the Political Code provided that elections must be held "under the same rules and regulations" as were provided by law for the holding of elections for officers of the municipality, and section 379 only authorized the validation of bonds when the provisions of section 378 had been complied with, this would require strict observance of the provisions of the charter of the city of Marietta regarding elections, hereinbefore recited, before the court would be authorized to validate the bonds. We think the reasoning already stated is a sufficient reply to this contention. The statute contemplates that an election for the issuance of bonds should be valid if held in such manner as that it would be valid if it were being held for municipal officers. Whatever be the law requiring strict conformity with mandatory rules governing elections for the issuance of bonds, there is no reason why a bond election should be invalid on account of a disregard of merely directory provisions of election laws, where such would not render an election for municipal officers invalid. The ruling here made does not conflict with the ruling with regard to "strict construction," as made in Bowen v. Greensboro, 79 Ga. 709, 4 S. E. 159, Mayor of Athens v. Hemerick, 89 Ga. 674, 16 S. E. 72, City of Dawson v. Waterworks Co., 106 Ga. 732, 32 S. E. 907, Davis v. Dougherty County, 116 Ga. 491, 42 S. E. 764, City of Thomasville v. Thomasville Light Co., 122 Ga. 401, 50 S. GROOVER v. ASH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§§ 33, 498*)

—DISCHARGE OF SURVIVING ADMINISTRATOR

—OBJECTIONS—LIABILITY TO ESTATE OF DECEASED ADMINISTRATOR—VENUE.

Where the surviving administrator of an estate makes to the ordinary final returns, which the latter approves, and in such returns full commissions are charged and allowed for all services rendered such estate by the surviving administrator and his deceased coadministrator, and makes application for his discharge as such administrator, the representative of the estate of the deceased coadministrator has no right to maintain a caveat to such application and prevent such discharge because the surviving administrator has not paid to the estate of the deceased coadministrator the proper amount of such commissions for services rendered by the latter.

(a) The liability of such surviving administrator to the estate of the deceased administrator for such of the commissions as may be due such estate for services rendered by the deceased administrator is a personal liability.

(b) Where the proceedings on such application and caveat were pending on appeal in the superior court of the county wherein the surviving administrator did not reside, an application by the representative of the deceased coadministrator to enjoin such pending proceedings, and to recover from the former the amount of commissions due for such services rendered by the latter, was properly dismissed on demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bulloch County; B. T. Rawlings, Judge.

Action by S. C. Groover, administrator, against J. A. Ash, administrator. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Brannen & Booth, for plaintiff in error. Travis & Travis, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff in error is the present representative of the estate of J. L. Oliff, deceased, and as such seeks, in an equitable petition in Bulloch superior court, to collect from the defendant, a resident of Effingham county, certain commissions alleged to be due the plaintiff's intestate for services rendered the estate of W. M. Foy, on which his intestate and the defendant were coadministrators. After the death of the plaintiff's intestate, the defendant, as surviving administrator, made final returns on the estate of which these two were joint administrators, which returns were allowed by the ordinary. In these returns the defendant credited himself with commissions amounting to several thousand dollars, and credited the plaintiff's intestate with only a small amount, and then he filed his application for discharge as administrator. To this application a caveat was filed by the representative of the deceased administrator, alleging that the bulk of the services rendered the estate was rendered by the plaintiff's intestate, and that he was entitled to two-thirds of the commissions charged by the defendant in the final returns, which caveat proceedings are now pending on appeal in the superior court of Bulloch county. The present petition set up the grounds stated in the caveat, and sought to enjoin the proceedings thereunder until the defendant made a final settlement with the petitioner for the amount due his intestate, and prayed that he be awarded a judgment for two-thirds of the commissions shown and allowed in the said final return. To the order of the court sustaining a demurrer and dismissing the petition, the plaintiff filed exceptions.

It will be seen from the foregoing statements that the plaintiff, who is seeking to enjoin the proceedings wherein the defendant made application to be discharged as administrator, and to which the plaintiff filed a caveat on the ground that the defendant owed the plaintiff's intestate two-thirds of the amount of commissions charged by the defendant in his final return, is endeavoring to obtain a judgment therefor in the injunction proceeding. The plaintiff made no application to the ordinary to award to the estate of the deceased administrator compensation out of the estate for services rendered, as was the case in Owen v. Walker, 26 Ga. 347. The plaintiff makes no complaint that the proper amount of compensation has not been awarded for services rendered by both administrators. The meaning of his allegations is that full and proper compensation has been awarded for all services rendered by both administrators, and his only complaint is that the amount of $4,088.14 claimed by the defendant for himself and the amount of $191.75 allowed to the estate of plaintiff's intestate by the defendant in his final returns, as their respective shares of the commissions, are out of proportion to the amount of services respectively rendered by them, and that, as the plaintiff's intestate performed two-thirds of the services rendered the estate by the administrators, the plaintiff should recover two-thirds of the total commissions allowed, in view of Civ. Code 1895, § 3486, wherein it is provided that, "If there are more administrators than one, the division of the commissions allowed them, among themselves, shall be according to the services rendered by each." It does not appear that the plaintiff, or his intestate, were parties to any proceeding to award any specified amount of commissions to plaintiff's intestate and a specified amount to the defendant. It does not appear that the plaintiff is barred from suing the defendant and setting up a claim against him for a part of the amount awarded the defendant for services rendered by him. The fact that the return made by the defendant charges a certain amount as due the plaintiff's intestate for services rendered by such intestate and a certain amount to the defendant does not serve to bar the plaintiff from suing the defendant to recover from him such part of the amount awarded to the defendant as may be a just proportion due the plaintiff's intestate according to the amount of services rendered by him.

It appears from the allegations of the plaintiff's petition, and from the final returns made by the defendant attached thereto, that the estate has been fully administered. The commissions due for all services rendered the estate by both administrators have been charged in the returns, and the accounts between the administrators and the distributees of the estate in this final return are balanced. The division of the commissions between the two representatives of the estate is a matter of no further concern, either to the creditors or to the heirs. After commissions have been allowed by the ordinary in the final return of the surviving administrator for all services rendered by him and his deceased coadministrator, the court of ordinary is not the proper forum for the surviving administrator and the representative of the deceased coadministrator to settle their disputes over a proper division of the commissions allowed. The commissions allowed have been detached or separated from the corpus of the estate, and cease to be assets of the estate, so far as concerns the parties entitled to such commissions. The estate has no more concern or interest in what division is made of such commissions between the two representatives than has a debtor, who pays to one member, or the surviving member, of a partnership, a debt which he owes the partnership, in a dispute between the partners as to how such amount should be divided between the partners. Where the proper amount of commissions for services rendered by all the representatives of an estate has been charged in the final returns by the surviving administrator, and allowed by the ordinary, such amount is not thereafter held in trust for the estate. The parties at interest should settle the matter justly among themselves, and if they cannot, and litigation is necessary, the court of ordinary is not the proper forum in which to litigate.

Under the allegations of the petition, where such surviving administrator and the representative of his deceased coadministrator cannot settle among themselves the amount which each should receive, the latter has the right to sue the former for the amount that should be paid to him out of the commissions allowed. In Wickersham's Appeal, 64 Pa. 67, it was held: "One of two executors filed an account in which were charged full commissions. He was cited in the orphans' court to pay the other executor his proportion. Held, that the orphans' court had no jurisdiction." And on pages 68, 69, it was said in the opinion: "The money claimed was not in the orphans' court, but in the hands of one over whom the orphans' court had no jurisdiction as to the matter in controversy. It is not the money of the estate the appellee holds. His coexecutor is not a distributee of the estate on account of commissions earned. His compensation does not stand on the same footing as a creditor's. If it did, it would be subject to abatement, like other debts, in case the estate were insolvent. This is never the case, as we all know. I will not say that the orphans' court might not apportion the commissions allowed between coexecutors and administrators; but if it be not done, and one receives all, the remedy of the other is in the common-law courts on the implied assumpsit raised by the possession of the money. It would be a novelty to witness a contest between the executors in the orphans' court in regard to mutual claims against each other, for money jointly earned and received, after the whole estate has been settled and the money all distributed to those entitled as distributees. That would be legal, although novel, if we were to sustain the principles of this appeal. Of course, if this were the law, then one executor would be obliged to file an account in the orphans' court, not with the estate, but with his coexecutor, and it would have to go through every process that executors' accounts are liable to." In Re Carter's Estate, 132 Cal. 113, 114, 64 Pac. 123, 124, the following language was used: "The appellant's first claim is to the effect that he had a contract with his coexecutor and the devisees, whereby he was to receive all the commissions allowed to the executors. There is some evidence on both sides of this claim; but the court holds the matter to be one of no importance. What particular contracts may have been entered into between these parties as to the apportionment of the executors' commissions is a matter which should be heard in another forum. The hearing of a final account by the probate department of the court is not the place to settle disputes of this character. These parties are not entitled to litigate a question of that kind upon the hearing of the settlement of a final account. The existence of that character of a contract, or its validity after being made, are matters of no interest to the estate, and must be heard and determined at some other time and in some other proceeding." In this connection, see, also, Huff v. Thrash, 75 Va. 546, 549, 550; Bellamy v. Hawkins, 16 Fla. 733; Mount v. Slack, 39 N. J. Eq. 230.

Under the allegations of the plaintiff's petition it appears that the estate has been fully administered and the full amount of commissions has been awarded in the final returns of the surviving administrator for all services rendered by both representatives of the estate, and the plaintiff has no right to prevent the discharge of the surviving administrator, which should be granted in order to finally close up the administration of the estate. Where there are two administrators, and they have the estate in hand in cash, and the commissions for services rendered by both are charged and audited in the final return, and allowed by the ordinary, the commissions due both are paid by the estate; and the fact that one of the joint administrators has in hand the money which pays the commissions due both only creates an individual liability on his part to his coadministrator for the latter's part of the commissions. The surviving administrator had the entire estate in his hands, and had the right in his final returns to charge up the full amount of commissions due him and his deceased coadministrator. When he did this the amount retained and charged as the full and proper amount of commissions due him and his deceased coadministrator ceased to be assets of the estate; and the surviving administrator was liable as an individual, and not as an administrator, to the estate of plaintiff's intestate for the latter's share of the commissions. For this reason, the sureties on the bond of the surviving administrator would not be liable for the commissions due the estate of the deceased administrator by the surviving administrator.

The plaintiff's remedy to obtain a share of the commissions properly belonging to the deceased administrator is to bring suit against the surviving administrator in his individual capacity. It follows, from what has been said, that the plaintiff has no right to enjoin the trial of the case wherein the surviving administrator is seeking a discharge, because no sufficient reason is offered why such discharge should be blocked. The only grounds claimed why the superior court of Bulloch county should take jurisdiction being based on the plaintiff's alleged right to enjoin the caveat proceeding pending in that court on appeal from the court of ordinary, and as no such right exists, the superior court of that county has no jurisdiction of a suit to recover the commissions alleged to be due the plaintiff's intestate by the defendant in error, who resides in Effingham county; and the court committed no error in dismissing the plaintiff's petition on the demurrer filed.

court, was an entry stating that a copy had been served upon one of the attorneys of record for the defendant in error, signed by a member of the bar who did not appear to be an attorney of record in the case. When the case was called for argument, a motion was made to dismiss the writ of error for want of proper service of the bill of exceptions. Thereupon the attorney who had made the entry on the bill of exceptions made an affidavit stating that he had served a copy of it upon one of the attorneys for the defendant in error on a day named, which was within 10 days from the date of the judge's certificate; and a motion was made on behalf of the plaintiffs in error to be allowed to attach such affidavit to the bill of exceptions as proof of service. Held, that the latter motion must be denied, and the writ of error dismissed. *Plummer v. Error from Superior Court, Newton County; L. S. Roan, Judge.

Action by W. A. Curtis and others against the Town of Mansfield and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Doyle Campbell and Middlebrook, Rogers & Heath, for plaintiffs in error. R. W. Milner, for defendants in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiffs filed their application against the defendants for an injunction, which was refused, and to this order the plaintiffs filed their bill of exceptions, in which it is recited that an injunction was prayed against "the town of Mansfield from paying out, and the Mansfield Lumber & Construction Company from receiving, the proceeds of the sale of $6,000 of bonds of said town, upon the grounds that the issue of said bonds was illegal and void, and that the judgment of the court validating the same was void, for the reason that the court which validated said bonds had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter. There were other grounds than these set out in plaintiffs' petition, but they were abandoned on the hearing of the case by plaintiffs' counsel, as stated in the order of the court refusing the injunction." The following also appears in the bill of exceptions: "To this judgment of the court plaintiffs in error excepted, and now except and assign the same as error, upon the ground that said judgment was contrary to law, inasmuch as the court which validated said bonds was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter and said judgment was void, and the election for issuing said bonds, as well as the issuing of the same, was ultra vires and void, and in violation of the Constitution of Georgia (section 5909 of the Civil Code of Georgia of 1895); and for these reasons the court committed error in not granting the injunction as prayed for." It is stated, in the judgment of the court refusing the injunction, "that every question made by the pleadings in the case had been covered and passed upon by former judgments of this court in cases between the same parties, to wit, by a judgment rendered August 8, 1908, and by a judgment of September 3, 1908; plaintiffs' counsel not now insisting upon these same questions in this case, and having abandoned all questions except the sole question of the jurisdiction of the court, the superior court of Newton county, to render a judgment validating the $6,000 of bonds mentioned in plaintiffs' petition. Plaintiffs' counsel contended that said judgment of validation was void for want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter by said court, in that and because there was no recommendation by the corporate authorities of Mansfield for a special act to hold this election, and no special law was passed by the Legislature authorizing the holding of an election to issue these bonds as provided in section 5909. Plaintiffs' counsel conceded that the proceedings for the validation of the bonds, with respect to all matters of notice, service of notice, and other requisites to a proper judgment of validation, were regular, and that an election was had, but insisted that the election was illegal for want of a law authorizing the election, and for that reason alone the court was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter in validating said bonds."

One of the defenses set up by the defendants was as follows: "Defendant has complied with every requirement of that act [validation act of 1897 (Laws 1897, p. 82)], and the bonds are legal and binding and cannot be attacked by the plaintiffs, having been duly validated as alleged by plaintiffs." It appears from the record that an election was held and declared to have resulted in favor of the issuance of the bonds, and that thereafter the bonds were confirmed and validated by the judgment of the court in proceedings which were admitted to have been regular in every respect and to have conformed to all the requirements of the validation act of 1897. It has been held that the judgment of a superior court validating an issue of bonds by a municipality is conclusive, as to the city, its citizens, and every one else, "that the city has the legal right to incur a debt of the amount and for the purposes indicated in the notice of the bond election, that the assent of the qualified voters has been obtained for issuance of bonds in the manner required by law, and upon all other questions which the Constitution and laws require to be determined before authority is conferred upon a municipality to incur a debt." Baker v. Cartersville, 127 Ga. 221, 58 S. E. 249. The court rendering the judgment complained of in this case is the court which, under the general validation act of 1897, has authority to validate any proper issuance of municipal bonds by the town of Mansfield. If a recommendation by the municipal authorities and a special act of the Legislature were necessary before an election for bonds could be legally had, whether or not such a recommendation was made and such act passed were matters to be determined by the court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction under the general act above referred to, upon the hearing of the validation proceedings, before rendering a judgment on the question as to whether or not the bonds should be validated. In the present case the plaintiffs are seeking, in a collateral attack, to have that judgment declared void for lack of jurisdiction of the court rendering it over the subject-matter. The pleadings in the validation proceeding nowhere appear in the record, and therefore it cannot be said that the judgment of validation, or the record upon which it was founded, shows on its face that there was any want of jurisdiction in the court to render that judgment. This court has no jurisdiction to have the pleadings in that case sent up for examination, as they do not constitute any part of the record in the present case. In making the present collateral attack on the judgment of validation, it is essential to its maintenance that the plaintiffs affirmatively show, either from the judgment itself or the record upon which it was founded, that the court lacked jurisdiction to render it. In the absence of such affirmative showing on the part of the plaintiffs, it will be presumed that the court had jurisdiction to render the judgment. In the case of Medlin v. Downing Co., 128 Ga. 115, 57 S. E. 232, it was held: "The court of ordinary is a court of general jurisdiction; and, unless the want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record, its judgments cannot be collaterally attacked." Also see Jones v. Smith, 120 Ga. 642, 644, 48 S. E. 134, 135, where it is said: "Where the record is silent, the presumption is that all necessary jurisdictional facts appeared, and no collateral attack can be made upon the judgment." Also see Dunagan v. Stadler, 101 Ga. 474, 479, 29 S. E. 440. Even if an act of the Legislature authorizing the election was essential to its validity, and the court had no jurisdiction to validate the bonds when no such act existed, the judgment of the court validating the bonds cannot be attacked collaterally, when it does not appear on the face of the judgment, or the record of the proceedings for validation, that the court was without jurisdiction to render the judgment.

Error from Superior Court, Dodge County; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by the Swift Fertilizer Works against L. N. Peacock. Judgment for plaintiff for a part of its claim, and it brings error. Reversed.

J. P. Highsmith and Tye, Peeples, Bryan & Jordan, for plaintiff in error. D. M. Roberts & Sons, for defendant in error.

HOLDEN, J. The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant on notes given for the purchase money of guano, bought from the plaintiff at $21.25 per ton, alleging that the defendant owed it the full amounts appearing on the face of the notes, less a credit of $255 for 12 tons of guano at the contract price, which the plaintiff failed to accept and receive upon its arrival. The defendant in his plea admitted the giving of the notes; but he contended that he should have credit thereon for $425, the contract price for 20 tons at $21.25 per ton, instead of $255, the contract price of 12 tons, which latter amount was credited on the notes; that these 20 tons were shipped to one Walker and received by him too late for use, of which fact he notified the plaintiff, and that he could not accept the goods, and requested it to return "his notes for correction"; and that "plaintiff, after receiving defendant's notice, took charge of the goods and actually sold them out." Upon the trial the jury allowed a credit on the notes for the contract price of 20 tons, and found for the plaintiff the balance sued for. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the plaintiff excepted.

1. It appears from the testimony that the defendant bought from the plaintiff 40 tons of guano at $21.25 per ton, and gave his notes therefor. He ordered 20 tons to be shipped to one Walker. There is no evidence that the defendant did not deliver the guano to the carrier in time for it, in the ordinary course of transportation, to have reached Walker in ample time for use on the crops for the year for which it was intended. The notes were dated May 2, 1904. It appears from letters from the defendant to the plaintiff that he mailed the notes to the plaintiff on May 14, 1904. The shipment, which, according to a statement of Walker, was made March 26, 1904, did not arrive until May 9, 1904, and Walker wrote to the defendant he could not use the guano. The defendant sent the plaintiff a copy of this letter, and wrote as follows: "Eastman, Ga., May 14, 1904. Swift Fertilizer Works, Atlanta, Ga.—Gentlemen: Enclosed find letter received from J. L. Walker in regard to car of fertilizer I ordered from you some months ago.

I mailed you three notes this morning, and since mailing same I received Mr. Walker's letter. I expect you to make claim against road for same, as it got to Mr. Walker too late for any use. Hoping that you will rectify this matter at once, I am very truly yours, L. M. Peacock." Walker used six tons of the guano on his crops, and sold two tons. The plaintiff took possession of the remaining 12 tons. The plaintiff having credited the defendant with the purchase price of 12 tons, and he contending for a credit of the price of 20 tons, it will be observed that the difference between the amount claimed by the plaintiff and that admitted by the defendant to be due consists of the purchase price of 8 tons, the amount which Walker used or sold. Walker was the person to whom the defendant ordered the 20 tons shipped, and to whom it was shipped and delivered. Walker took possession and disposed of 8 tons of the guano, and after this the plaintiff took possession of the remaining 12 tons and gave the defendant credit for the contract price thereof. As Walker, the person to whom the defendant ordered the goods shipped and delivered, and to whom they were shipped and delivered, put it out of the power of the plaintiff to get the 8 tons, the defendant cannot complain that the plaintiff does not give him credit for the purchase price thereof. When Walker disposed of the 8 tons and put it out of the power of the plaintiff to get possession of the same, it was the same thing as if the defendant had done this; and when the defendant, through the consignee, disposed of the 8 tons, and the plaintiff took possession of the remaining 12 tons, the proper and only legal adjustment of the matter between the parties is that the defendant should only have credit for the purchase price of the 12 tons returned, and is liable to pay for the remaining 8 tons. The complaint of the defendant in his letter to the plaintiff was that the guano reached Walker "too late for any use." It appears, however, it did not reach Walker too late for the use of 8 tons. The defendant, through the consignee to whom he directed the goods shipped, received and used the 8 tons of guano; and, if he is indebted therefor to any one, we see no reason why he is not thus indebted to the defendant, instead of the plaintiff. The plaintiff did not consent for Walker to use any of the guano after receiving the letter herein copied. After this letter was received, Walker stated in writing to the plaintiff that he had disposed of 8 tons, and notified the plaintiff where the remaining 12 tons were stored. The plaintiff found only 12 tons, which it took. The other 8 tons it could not take, because Walker, the person to whom it was delivered by direction of the defendant, had disposed of that amount, and the plaintiff should not be held responsible therefor. The court committed error in refusing to grant a new trial.

2. The plea filed by the defendant was not subject to the demurrer filed thereto, and the court committed no error in overruling such demurrer.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concur.

HOLLOWAY v. MACON GASLIGHT & WATER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 14, 1909.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 206*)—WATER COMPANIES—LIABILITY FOR LOSS BY FIRE.

A waterworks company, operating under a franchise which gives to it the right to use the streets, etc., of a city for the purpose of laying its mains, etc., and carrying on its business, and which enters into a contract with the municipality to supply it, in its corporate capacity, with a sufficient supply of water from the city hydrants to extinguish fires, and to furnish private consumers, at fixed tolls, with water for domestic and manufacturing purposes, is under no public duty to a resident of the city to furnish the municipality with water to protect his property from loss by fire, and consequently cannot be held liable to him, in an action of tort, for fire loss sustained by him by reason of its failure to supply the city with water with which to extinguish the fire which consumed his property.

Case certified from Court of Appeals.

Action by J. D. Holloway against the Macon Gaslight & Water Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error to the Court of Appeals, which certified the case to the Supreme Court. Judgment rendered.

The question in this case was certified to this court by order of the Court of Appeals, which is as follows:

"J. D. Holloway v. Macon Gaslight & Water Company.

"In the foregoing case, pending in the Court of Appeals, said court desires the instruction and decision of the Supreme Court as to the following question of law necessary to the proper determination thereof, to wit: Does a petition set out a good cause of action which alleges: That the defendant is the Macon Gaslight & Water Company, which is a public service corporation engaged in furnishing water to the city of Macon and to the inhabitants of that city for toll, and which has a monopoly of such business in said city. That the city itself and the inhabitants thereof are now and for the past four years have been utterly and entirely dependent on the defendant for water supply. That on November 26, 1891, the defendant entered into a contract with the city of Macon respecting the furnishing of water to said city for a period of 20 years, which has not expired. (A copy of said contract, omitting certain immaterial parts, is hereto attached as a part hereof and marked 'Exhibit A.') That by the terms of said contract the defendant agreed to furnish water to said city for its benefit and for the benefit of its inhabitants for fire protection and for other purposes, it having therein been agreed by the defendant as follows: 'The party of the second part [the defendant herein mentioned] agrees to supply the party of the first part [the mayor and council of the city of Macon] with water in sufficient quantities and at all times for fire protection.' That the city of Macon has continuously paid the defendant, from revenues derived from the taxation of its citizens, for the services so contracted to be performed by the defendant. That on November 19, 1907, petitioner was a citizen and taxpayer of the city of Macon, and owned and possessed a certain described house and contents, all of the value of $2,100, in said city, located in the area which defendant undertook to supply with water under said contract, and on said date a neighboring dwelling house caught fire from causes unknown, but through no fault of petitioner. That said fire spread and was communicated to petitioner's house and the contents thereof, so that they were burned and destroyed, to his loss in the sum of $2,100, despite petitioner's best efforts to prevent the spread of said fire. That before the fire was communicated to petitioner's house the fire alarm had been given, and the city fire department had responded and reached the scene of the fire. After they reached the scene of the fire they connected the hose with the water plug of the defendant, with the view of extinguishing the fire and preventing damage to petitioner's property, which could easily have been accomplished if the defendant had maintained at that time in its supply pipes the pressure it had agreed at all times to maintain. That at said time there was no appreciable pressure of water in defendant's pipes, and not sufficient supply of water to enable the fire department to employ a steamer to extinguish or confine the fire. That despite the presence, willingness, and efficiency of the fire department, the house and contents burned. The defendant knew that neither the petitioner nor the fire department had any other supply of water than that the defendant had agreed to furnish. That the petitioner was without fault in the matter. That during all the times mentioned the defendant was enjoying valuable franchises in its corporate existence and business, notably the occupancy of the public streets with its water mains, on condition that it should perform the services undertaken under the contract. That the said contract was entered into by the defendant with the city of Macon by virtue of an act of the General Assembly approved September 29, 1891, amending the charter of the city of Macon, and said contract was designed for the service and protection of the taxpayers of the city of Macon, as well as of the city itself. That by reason of said act of the General Assembly and of said contract defendant was obliged to perform a public duty and an express statutory duty toward the inhabitants, property owners, and taxpayers of Macon, and this duty the defendant did not perform, as averred above, to the special hurt, injury, and damage of petitioner. That defendant's negligence and breach of duty to petitioner consisted in its failure to have in any of the plugs near petitioner's said property an adequate supply or pressure of water for fire protection, and in failing to have the supply and pressure called for by said contract. That there was not at said plugs, and in the mains leading to said plugs, sufficient water to cause a flow at the plugs, and defendant did not have at its plant a sufficient head of steam to give a flow of water. It is therefore ordered that a copy hereof, together with a transcript of the record, be certified to the Supreme Court."

Exhibit A, being the contract between the city of Macon and the Macon Gaslight & Water Company, is as follows:

"State of Georgia, County of Bibb.

"This indenture, made and entered into this 25th day of November, A. D. 1891, by and between the mayor and council of the city of Macon, Ga., party of the first part, and Macon Gaslight & Water Company, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Georgia, party of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the agreements and stipulations hereinafter set forth, and for certain sums of money to be paid as hereinafter provided, and by the authority conferred upon the said city of Macon by an act of the General Assembly which became a law on the 29th day of November, 1891, the following mutual agreements are entered into:

"Section 1. The party of the second part agrees to furnish the party of the first part with water in sufficient quantities and at all times for fire protection, sprinkling streets, flushing sewers, and the various other purposes in the city offices, police barracks, market, and engine houses, and to supply the citizens of Macon for domestic and manufacturing purposes, during the continuance of this contract, at prices not to exceed the following rates: To the city in its corporate capacity, 200 fire hydrants similar to those already in use, at the rate of $40 per hydrant per annum. For each additional hydrant $37.50 per annum until the number rented by the city shall reach 300, when the price for all shall be reduced to $37.50 per hydrant per annum. * * * The citizens for domestic or mechanical purposes shall be charged not more than the following rates: Private dwellings for domestic purposes only, through a single opening of one-half inch diameter, per annum, $6. * * *

"Sec. 2. It is mutually agreed that the said party of the first part shall pay for such water so supplied only as it is received, equal quarterly payments in the months of January, April, July, and October of each and every year, and that no indebtedness is incurred by said city of Macon by this contract, other than that which may arise from failure on the part of the said mayor and council to comply with their contract. * * * And for any failure on the part of the party of the second part to furnish the water for the purposes herein specified it shall forfeit the rentals for double the time during which said failure have occurred: provided the temporary failure of supply in a portion only of the city, caused by breaks, repairs, or extensions, shall not be considered a failure as above, nor for failure caused by the act of Providence.

"Sec. 3. The party of the second part agrees to furnish water as clear and as pure as can be obtained in sufficient quantity in practicable reach of the city; and, if any part or all of such supply is taken from the Ocmulgee river, it shall be taken from a point well above the sewerage pollution, and shall be thoroughly filtered.

"Sec. 4. It is hereby agreed by the parties hereto that, at any time during the continuance of this contract, the mayor and council of the city of Macon shall have the right to purchase the system of waterworks used in supplying the city, together with all rights, franchises, and good will, at a price to be agreed on at the time of sale. * * *

"Sec. 5. Since the present works of the party of the second part have not the capacity to supply more than the present demand, the said party of the second part agrees to increase the pumping capacity to 5,000,000 gallons per day, and to increase the capacity of its mains by reinforcing those already in use by connecting with them larger pipes at various points, so as to secure better pressure and distribution, or erect filters of modern pattern and ample capacity to supply the needs of the city, and so arranged that they can be increased in the future as the demand increases.

"Sec. 6. It is further agreed between the parties hereto that, as the population and territory to be protected increases, the said party of the second part shall extend its mains and erect hydrants along such streets as may be demanded by the party of the first part: provided the guaranteed income from consumers shall equal 6 per cent. upon the cost of such mains, and the said party of the first part agrees to rent a fire hydrant in addition to those already rented for 500 feet of main so extended; it being understood that the extensions so to be demanded must be along continuous lines of streets, and not more than 10,000 feet or two miles of such extension shall be demanded in any one year, except with the consent of the said party of the second part.

"Sec. 7. For the purpose of carrying out the terms of this contract, it is agreed by the parties hereto that the use of the streets, lanes, alleys, and public grounds, as they now exist or hereafter may be altered, opened, or extended, shall be granted to the party of the second part during the continuance of this contract, for the purpose of excavating trenches and laying down or changing mains, valves, pipes, and conduits: provided, always, that in so excavating trenches and laying down or changing pipes, etc., that the grade of the street shall be adhered to, that the public work shall not be unnecessarily impeded or obstructed, and that the roadway shall be left in practically as good condition as it was before such excavating. * * *

"Sec. 8. As the safety of the property of the citizens is largely dependent upon the proper and efficient management of the waterworks, and to that end rules and regulations are necessary to be observed, it is hereby agreed by the parties hereto that the right of the party of the second part to enter into the premises of the citizens, by its authorized agents, during the business hours of the day, for the purpose of inspecting the water fixtures used by its customers, is recognized, and its right to shut off the water from any section of the city to make repairs and extensions, after notice, where practicable, but without notice in emergency, as well as its right to refuse to supply customers who neglect to pay for their supply, or who refuse to have fixtures repaired to prevent waste, or who persistently waste the water after five days' notice, and in accordance with the published rules of the party of the second part. And it is agreed that the said rules made for the management of said works from time to time, as are usual in waterworks management, and not in conflict with the city's ordinances or the laws of the state, must be observed. And to the end that the property and rights of the waterworks may be protected and waste of water prevented, the following ordinances shall be passed by the party of the first part and become a part of this contract."

Here follow a number of penal ordinances protecting the property and franchises of the company.

The act of the General Assembly approved August 29, 1891 (Acts 1890-91, vol. 2, p. 566), referred to in the petition and exhibit as certified by the Court of Appeals, was, by its title, "An act to amend the charter of the city of Macon and the several acts amendatory thereof, so as to authorize the mayor and council of the city of Macon to construct a system of waterworks in said city at a cost not to exceed $412,000, to issue bonds to the amount of $350,000 for the purpose of constructing said system of waterworks for said city, and to provide for the construction of a portion of said system of waterworks from the revenues derived from the sale of water therefrom, and to authorize the said mayor and council to make a contract with the Macon Gaslight & Water Company for the furnishing of water to said city, with the privilege of purchasing the waterworks used by said Gaslight & Water Company in supplying said city; to provide a commission for the negotiation and sale of said bonds, and for the construction and management and control of said waterworks; to grant certain powers and rights to said commission; * * * to provide for an election for the purpose of procuring the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the city of Macon to the issuing of said bonds; to prescribe a method of registration for said election, and for other purposes." The act, after conferring authority upon the city of Macon to construct a system of waterworks and to issue bonds, if authorized by the result of the election, as provided in the title of the act, toward payment for the same, and after creating "the Water Commission of the City of Macon" and prescribing the powers of such commission, among them being authority to sell the bonds if they should be issued in accordance with an election as provided for, in its fourteenth section contained the following provisions:

"That at any time after the passage of this act, and before the election herein provided for shall be held, the mayor and council of the city of Macon shall have authority to make and enter into a contract with the Macon Gaslight & Water Company, for supplying the city with water for a period not to exceed twenty (20) years. * * * There shall be embodied in said contract the privilege to the mayor and council to purchase the system of waterworks used in supplying the city, at any time during the period for which said contract is made, at a price to be agreed upon at the time of sale between the parties to said contract. * * * [And] before said purchase shall be made, the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the city of Macon shall be obtained, in the manner now or which may hereafter be provided by law, to the incurring of the indebtedness for the purchase of said waterworks. When such contract is made, * * * there shall be embodied in said contract a scale rate, showing the price to be paid by private consumers of water; and the mayor and council shall require a bond with good security, in the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, for the faithful carrying out of said contract by the Macon Gaslight & Water Company; provided, that while said contract shall be made by the said mayor and council of the city of Macon with said Gaslight & Water Company, in the event that the provisions in this act to issue bonds for the erection of a system of waterworks by a commission, as herein provided for, shall receive the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of the city of Macon, as provided in section 13 of this act, then said contract shall no longer be of force and effect, but shall discontinued and be inoperative as though never made. If the provisions of this act, as to the issue of bonds, shall not be ratified by the said votes as required, then said contract shall still remain and continue in full force and effect."

The act then provides that if no contract be entered into prior to the election for bonds, or if such election should not result in favor of the issuance of bonds, then the mayor and council shall have authority to make a contract with the water company for the period of 20 years for supplying the city with water, under the same terms and conditions and stipulations as contained in the act in reference to a contract made prior to such election.

FISH, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The great weight of authority is to the effect that a resident of a city cannot recover of a waterworks company damages for loss by fire occasioned by the failure of such company to furnish, in accordance with its contract with the city, a sufficient supply of water to extinguish the fire. *Fowler v. The Kentucky and North Carolina cases have been criticised in many of the cases wherein the doctrine above announced has been recognized and applied, and the reasoning in the Mugge Case and that of the majority of the court in Guardian Trust Co. v. Fisher, 200 U. S. 57, 26 Sup. Ct. 186, 50 L. Ed. 367, which seems to have been followed in Mugge's Case, is criticised in the editorial note on the last-mentioned case in 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171. There is nothing new to be added on the subject, and it would be supererogatory to set forth the reasons given by the various courts in sustaining the doctrine and of those repudiating it. Moreover, the question certified must, in our opinion, be solved by following a former decision of this court in Fowler v. Athens City Waterworks Co., supra, where it was held: "Against a water company which is under a contract obligation with the municipal government (but no legal duty otherwise) to furnish a supply of water for use by the municipality in extinguishing fires, a citizen and taxpayer, whose property has been consumed by reason of a breach of such contract obligation, has no right of action; there being no privity of contract between the citizen and the water company, and mere breach (by omission only) of a contract entered into with the public not being a tort, direct or indirect, to the private property of an individual."

In that case, as we have ascertained from an examination of the original record of file in this court, the mayor and council of the city of Athens entered into a contract with one Robinson in 1882, whereby Robinson undertook that he would furnish at all times, for a consideration mentioned in the contract, all the water necessary for fire purposes; that he would establish fire hydrants to the number of 55, and would guarantee at all times a sufficient pressure to throw from any of these hydrants, through a 1-inch nozzle and 50 feet of 2½-inch hose, five streams of water to the height of 65 feet. He further agreed to furnish consumers other than the city with pure and wholesome water at a rate not exceeding that in a list appended to the contract and made a part thereof. By the terms of the contract the city was to have the right to purchase Robinson's waterworks when the same should be completed, or at the end of each 10 years thereafter, at a price to be fixed by arbitrators to be selected as provided in the contract. The city in the contract expressly granted to Robinson and his successors or assigns the exclusive right to erect and maintain waterworks as contemplated in the contract, "and also the free and unrestricted right and privilege at any and all times to lay, construct, maintain, repair, and tap all mains, pipes, hydrants, and other fixtures and appurtenances in, upon, under, and through any and all streets, avenues, lanes, alleys, roads, and bridges within said city." It was also stipulated in the contract "that it [the city] will pass, and at all times during the continuance of this contract maintain and enforce, such ordinances as may be necessary and proper to enable said contractor to construct and control his works and protect the same."

It will be seen, therefore, that the decision in that case, when construed in the light of the facts upon which it was predicated, is controlling in the present one; for the court there not only held, treating the plaintiff's action as being one ex contractu, under the contract between the city and the waterworks company, that he could not recover, as there was no privity of contract between him and the company, but it also clearly and distinctly held that he could not recover if his action against the company were treated as being one ex delicto—that is, upon an alleged tort arising from a breach of a public duty which the company, under its contract with the city, owed the plaintiff. What was said by Chief Justice Bleckley in denial of the right of the plaintiff to recover, upon the facts alleged in his petition, if his action were treated as one sounding in tort, was by no means obiter; for it is clear, from reading the statement of the case by him and the opinion which he delivered therein, that the court did not undertake to determine whether the petition was intended to set forth a cause of action arising ex contractu or a cause of action arising ex delicto. But the court, without construing the petition the one way or the other, simply but decisively determined that, whether the petition sounded in contract or in tort, it failed to state a cause of action, as the plaintiff could not recover on contract, because he was no privy to the contract which the city made with the waterworks company, and he could not recover in tort, because, under the facts alleged, there was relatively to him no breach of a public duty by the water company. With reference to this last-mentioned view or construction of the petition, the learned Chief Justice said: "There being no ground for recovery, treating the action as one ex contractu, is it better founded treating it as one ex delicto? We think not. The violation of a contract entered into with the public, the breach being by mere omission or nonfeasance, is no tort, direct or indirect, to the private property of an individual, though he be a member of the community and a taxpayer to the government. Unless made so by statute, a city is not liable for failing to protect the inhabitants against destruction of property by fire. Wright v. Augusta, 78 Ga. 241, 6 Am. St. Rep. 256; Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, vol. 7, p. 997 et seq. We are unable to see how a contractor with the city to supply water to extinguish fires commits any tort by failure to comply with his undertaking, unless to the contract relation there is superadded a legal command by statute or express law."

As will have been seen, the material facts in the case at bar are practically the same as those in the Fowler Case. While Robinson, the contractor in the Fowler Case, was an individual, and his successor and assignee, the Athens City Waterworks Company, does not appear to have been incorporated, and the contractor in the case now in hand was a corporation, this difference certainly would not alter the principle to be applied in the present case; nor would such principle be affected by the fact that in the case before us the contract between the city of Macon and the waterworks company was expressly authorized by the act of 1891, amending the charter of the city of Macon, whilst in the Fowler Case it does not appear that express legislative authority was given to the city of Athens to enter into the contract therein involved. Such city did not need express authority to make the contract; for it is well settled that under the "general welfare clause," usually found in the charters of towns and cities, such municipalities have the authority to enter into contracts and to exercise the power of taxation, within the limits fixed by the Constitution, for the purpose of providing their inhabitants with water for domestic use, as well as to provide the city with water to protect its inhabitants from loss by fire. City Council of Dawson v. Dawson Waterworks Co., 106 Ga. 696, 32 S. E. 907, and cases cited. The "general welfare clause" was contained in the charter of the city of Athens. The same right to use the streets of the city for the purpose of laying water mains, etc., was given to Robinson, under the contract he made with the city of Athens, as was given to the waterworks company in the case in hand, under the contract it entered into with the city of Macon, and the obligations to be performed by the contractors in each of the cases were of the same character. To our mind, therefore, the Fowler Case is, as we have already said, absolutely controlling in the present case, and requires that the question certified to this court by the Court of Appeals shall be answered in the negative; that is, that Holloway's petition set out no cause of action against the Macon Gaslight & Water Company. Here, as there, there was a "violation of a contract entered into with the public, the breach being by mere omission or nonfeasance," which "is no tort, direct or indirect, to the private property of an individual, though he be a member of the community and a taxpayer to the government."

The plaintiff in error relies upon Freeman v. Macon Gaslight & Water Co., 126 Ga. 843, 56 S. E. 61, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 917. It was there held: "When a private corporation, in the exercise of a franchise granted by a municipality, pursuant to a statute which confers upon it the right to use the streets of the city on condition that it will therein lay its mains and furnish the municipality and its inhabitants with a supply of water at fixed tolls, engages in the business of supplying the general public with water, it becomes liable as a public service corporation for its wrongful act in cutting off the supply of water which it is under the duty to furnish one of its patrons as a member of the public at large." This ruling, when applied to the facts of that case, is not contrary to what was held in the Fowler Case. Indeed, Mr. Justice Evans, who delivered the opinion, expressly states therein: "What we have said in no way conflicts with the principle decided in Fowler v. Athens City Waterworks Co., 83 Ga. 219, 9 S. E. 673, 20 Am. St. Rep. 318. There the water company was sought to be held liable to a private citizen because of a failure to perform a duty owing to the municipality, under a contract with it to furnish it an adequate supply of water for fire protection. The city, in the exercise of its governmental functions, undertook to afford its citizens adequate fire protection—not by itself laying mains and maintaining a water supply plant, but by hiring one Robinson to do so." The ruling in the Freeman Case was to the effect that when the water company, under the franchise which it had accepted and the contract which it had made with the municipality, engaged in the business of supplying the public at large with water for certain purposes, it became a public service corporation, and, as such, was under a public duty to Freeman, one of its customers, and a member of the public at large served by such company, to furnish him, as a private consumer, a sufficient supply of water in accordance with the contract, and that the breach of such duty, by wrongfully cutting off his supply of water, was a tort, for the commission of which it was liable to him in damages.

It will be readily seen that the facts in the Fowler Case and those in the case with which we are now dealing are quite different from the facts in the Freeman Case, and involve the application of different principles of law. In the Freeman Case the duty which the water company assumed, by accepting its franchise, entering into the contract with the municipality, and engaging, as a public service corporation, in the business of supplying the inhabitants of Macon with water for domestic purposes, was a public one, which it owed to Freeman as a member of the public at large. As a public service corporation, operating under a franchise which gave to it the right to occupy and use the streets, etc., for the purpose of laying therein its mains, etc., and carrying on its business, and engaging in the business of supplying the public at large with water at fixed tolls, it owed certain public duties to Freeman and every other member of the community standing in the same relations to it, the breach of which constituted a tort. While the contract between the city and the water company in the present case is the same as the one involved in that case, the breach of duty relied on here is not the same as the breach of duty relied on there. The water company, as a public service corporation, did not, under its contract with the city of Macon, nor, so far as appears in this case, in the conduct of its business, undertake to supply the public at large with water from the city hydrants for the purpose of extinguishing fires, nor did it undertake to supply Holloway, the plaintiff in error, with water for fire protection. As to a supply of water from the city hydrants for fire protection, all that the water company undertook to do was to furnish such water to the city in its corporate capacity; and whatever breach of duty it may have committed by its failure so to do upon the occasion of the fire in question was a breach of the duty which it owed to the city, and not a breach of any public duty which it owed to Holloway and other members of the public at large of the city of Macon.

THOMPSON v. WALKER et al.

WALKER v. THOMPSON. (Nos. 1,583, 1,649.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 125*)—DUTY TO HAVE PREMISES IN CONDITION FOR WHICH RENTED.

It is the duty of the landlord, when he rents a tenement at full price for a term to begin in the future, to have it, on the day when the term is to begin, in a condition reasonably suited for the purposes for which it is rented, unless the circumstances surrounding the transaction are such as to indicate a contrary intention in the minds of the contracting parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 441-443; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 125*)—TENANT'S OBLIGATION OF PREMISES.

A landlord leased to four persons a tenement for a period of three years, and took from them a joint covenant to redeliver the property in good condition of repair at the expiry of the lease. On the same day he executed another lease to three of the same persons that were the tenants under the first lease for a term to begin immediately after the termination of the first lease. By reason of the failure of the tenants under the first lease to comply with their covenant to keep it in repair, the tenement was not in suitable condition on the day when the second lease was to begin. Held, that the tenants under the second lease could refuse to enter and could claim a rescission of the contract; that they would not be estopped from taking this action by the fact that they were parties to the broken joint covenant made by them themselves and another in the first lease; that the landlord's right of action was upon that covenant; and that in an action thereon he could recover, not only the value of the repairs, but also for the damage done through the destruction of the second lease.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Atlanta.

Action by J. B. Thompson against B. F. Walker and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error, and defendant Walker assigns cross-error. Affirmed on the main bill, and cross-bill dismissed, with direction.

Westmoreland Bros. and Horton Bros. & Burress, for Thompson. E. V. Carter and E. M. & G. F. Mitchell, for Walker and others.

POWELL, J. On April 8, 1901, Thompson leased a certain tenement in the city of Atlanta for the purpose of a livery and feed stable to Booth, Walker, Wilson, and Harper for the term of three years, commencing on May 1, 1901, at the price of $300 per month, payable monthly. On the same day he executed a lease to the same persons, with the exception of Booth, for the same tenement from the date on which the first lease ended, namely, May 1, 1904, to May 1, 1906. These leases were under seal and were signed by the landlord and the tenants. Rent notes under seal were also taken for monthly payments. In each of the leases it was provided that the tenants should keep up the repairs and should deliver the tenement back at the end of the respective terms in the same good order and repair as when first received. The notes and the leases all appear to be joint undertakings of the tenants, there being no words showing a several undertaking in any of the instruments. On May 1, 1904, at the expiry of the first lease, Walker, Wilson, and Harper, the tenants under the second lease, declined to take the tenement on the ground that it was untenable. When two of the rent notes became due, those for May and June, 1904, Thompson sued upon them. The jury found in favor of the defendants. It was issuable whether the building was untenable on May 1, 1904; but the verdict will be taken as settling as a fact that it was untenable.

The contention of the plaintiff is that it was the duty of the tenants to keep the premises in repair; that if the premises were untenable on May 1, 1904, it was not his fault, but the fault of these defendants, together with their joint promisor, Booth; that the present defendants, being parties to the covenant in the first lease, could not set up their failure to have the building in repair as a reason for not taking the premises under the second lease. The judge charged the jury in substance that it was the duty of the landlord to have the premises in tenantable condition on May 1, 1904, and that if he did not do so it was not obligatory upon the defendants to enter or take possession under the second lease, and that the plaintiff could not, as against the defendants, set up the failure of the previous tenants to comply with their covenant to keep the premises in repair. If he was right in this instruction, the verdict should stand; otherwise, it should be set aside.

Walker, one of the present defendants, signed the note sued on "B. F. Walker, Agt." In the lease set up in the pleadings and in the proof he is described as agent for Charles E. Walker. He attempted to plead that he is not individually bound on the contract, but that Charles E. Walker is bound. The court struck the plea. He excepted pendente lite, and has filed a cross-bill, which is also before us for consideration.

1. In legal contemplation the two leases, being joint, and not severable, or joint and severable, were separate, distinct, and independent contracts. The covenant of the three defendants and another was juridically distinct from the covenant of the three alone. If the plaintiff had sued for a failure to keep the premises in repair, in accordance with the covenant in the first lease, and had failed to make Booth a party to the suit, he could have excused his failure only by showing that Booth was dead, or that he could not be found and served. Gill v. Mizell, 43 Ga. 589; Graham v. Marks, 95 Ga. 38, 21 S. E. 986; Rogers v. Burr, 105 Ga. 432 (3, 4), 446, 31 S. E. 438, 70 Am. St. Rep. 50. In other words, the joint liability of A. and another is, as against A., a different liability from the liability of A. alone, and the one cannot be used as the legal equivalent of the other, though ultimately, at the end of some particular case the practical liability may turn out to be the same. Joint promisors are not, by virtue of the relation, agents of each other, and even if they, as among themselves, are equally liable upon the promise, there is no real community of interest; for by enforced contribution each may be made to answer for his respective share. Per Lord Mansfield, in Whitcomb v. Whiting, Douglas, 652; Rogers v. Burr, 105 Ga. 448, 31 S. E. 438, 70 Am. St. Rep. 50.

2. On May 1, 1904, it was the duty of the landlord to have the tenement suitable for the purposes for which it had been rented, or at least as suitable as it was on the day the lease was executed; and the defendants had a right to refuse to enter under the lease if the landlord failed in this respect. White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204. As a means of complying with this duty on his part he had taken a covenant from the four joint promisors—the tenants under the lease expiring that day—that they would leave the premises in that condition. This was an independent covenant on the part of these four joint promisors. Lewis v. Chisolm, 68 Ga. 40. Now, if this covenant had been the covenant of the three present defendants, they would not be heard to set up, in an action by the landlord against them, that the premises were not in suitable condition; for to allow them to assume such a position would be to allow them to take advantage of their own wrong. But the wrong of these three and another as joint promisors is not the wrong of these three disassociated from the fourth man.

Whatever appearance of injustice may arise from the application of this rule is dissipated when we look a little further into the resulting position in which the judgment in the present action places the parties. As against the present defendants, their successful assertion of the proposition that the tenement was not suitable for occupancy on May 1, 1904, creates an estoppel to deny these facts in any future suit. The landlord has his right of action against these three and the other joint promisor upon the broken covenant in the first lease. They (at least, all of them but Booth) will not be permitted in an action upon the covenant to say they did not fail in keeping it. Haber-Blum-Bloch Co. v. Friesleben, 5 Ga. App. 123, 62 S. E. 712. Whatever damages the landlord may have sustained by reason of the fact that the breach of this covenant caused a destruction of the first lease are recoverable in the action upon the covenant. Hence it seems to us that so far as Thompson is concerned it matters little apart from the question of costs, whether the present judgment be affirmed or reversed. Whatever natural justice there may be in the plaintiff's contention that the defendants cannot take advantage of their own wrong is preserved to him, notwithstanding the result reached by this court in the present case is that the verdict in favor of the defendants is allowed to stand. If the action had been in the superior court, equitable pleadings might have been filed, making Booth a party, and the whole matter thus might have been ended in one action; but the jurisdiction of the city court is so limited as to prevent this being done. The judgment on the main bill of exceptions will be affirmed.

We will not inquire into the merits of the cross-bill, but will dismiss it, with direction that the action of the court complained of shall not hereafter operate as a res adjudicata or an estoppel upon the parties.

Judgment affirmed on main bill of exceptions; cross-bill dismissed, with direction.

LOEB v. STATE. (No. 1,686.)

(Court of Appeals of Georgia. April 15, 1909.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 59*)—PARTIES TO OFFENSES—"PRINCIPALS"—MISDEMEANORS.

There are no accessories in misdemeanors. All who procure, counsel, command, aid, or abet the commission of a misdemeanor are regarded by the law as principal offenders and may be indicted as such. The indictment may be joint against all those connected with the criminal enterprise, or it may be several against any one of them.

(a) Whether the indictment is joint or several, any particular defendant accused therein of having committed the misdemeanor may be convicted by proof either that he directly and personally enacted the criminal transaction, or that he procured, counseled, commanded, aided, or abetted the criminal transaction as to another, who was the direct and immediate actor.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1129*)—WRIT OF ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—NECESSITY OF OFFER.

An assignment of error upon the court's refusal to allow counsel to ask of a witness a question is not in form, unless it shows that the judge was informed at the time of the ruling of the nature of the answer anticipated.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§§ 167, 168*)—CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY—PERSONS RESPONSIBLE.

The defendant was indicted for the illegal sale of liquor. There was no proof that he himself had made any sales in the county of the prosecution; but there was testimony from which the jury was authorized to find that he had hired another person to sell for him in that county, and also that he had sold to another person liquors knowing that the latter was buying them for the purpose of illegal resale, and that he (the defendant) had otherwise aided and abetted this person in running a place of business where liquors were illegally sold in that county. Held, that the defendant was properly convicted.

Error from Superior Court, Morgan County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

D. C. Loeb was convicted of a violation of the local option law, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Loeb was indicted by the grand jury of Morgan county for a violation of the local option liquor law which was in effect in that county in the year 1906. The case was transferred to the county court for trial, and was heard before Hon. Samuel H. Sibley, judge of the county court of Greene county, presiding on account of the disqualification of the local judge. The indictment charged that the defendant "did sell and barter for valuable consideration alcoholic, spirituous, malt, and intoxicating liquors, and intoxicating bitters and other drinks which, if drunk to excess, will produce intoxication." The defendant was convicted and he applied for a certiorari. The judge of the superior court refused to sanction the petition, and to this ruling the defendant brings error.

The testimony of the state was to the effect that Loeb, who was general manager of an incorporated liquor business, carried on in Atlanta under the name of the Lomax Distilling Company (the only persons connected with the business being himself, one Teitlebaum, who performed the services of a bookkeeper, and certain porters and other menial employes), went to the house of a negro named Martin Wyatt, residing in the lower portion of Morgan county, and employed him to sell liquor in that county. According to Wyatt, who was sworn as a witness, the exact language used by Loeb was: "I want to get you to sell some liquor." Wyatt had never met Loeb before, and suggested to him that the sale of liquor was against the law. Loeb replied that he would fix that so Wyatt would not be hurt; that he would get a license which would protect him; and Wyatt consented to sell the liquor. A few days later the negro received a barrel of whisky, a cask of cased whisky, and also a case of rye liquor. With this he set up a bar in his home and began regularly the business of selling liquor. Loeb promised to make it right with the negro as to what he should receive as compensation, promising, among other things, to get him a suit of clothes, and told him to send the money to him in Atlanta. During the short while the business was carried on, several hundred dollars worth of liquor was shipped out to the negro. It was sent to him, not at Rutledge, which was his nearest railroad station, but to Covington or Social Circle, points considerably distant from his home. The proceeds from the sale of this liquor, with the exception of about $130, which was on the defendant's person when he was arrested, was either sent or carried to Loeb in Atlanta. Prosecutions were instituted against the negro, and when he was arrested he asked the officers to notify Loeb. Loeb came and got the unsold portions of the liquors which still remained at the negro's house. Loeb procured and sent to the negro, about the time the first shipment of liquor was sent him, a United States internal revenue license. This liquor was shipped out in the name of the Lomax Distilling Company. The negro on one or more occasions had gone to the place of business of the Lomax Distilling Company at Atlanta and left instructions as to what liquors were to be sent out and also had made payments of money there.

The defendant denied that he was in any wise responsible for the sales made by the negro. He set up that the only transactions he had with the negro were that he from time to time, as agent of the Lomax Distilling Company, sold him liquor, the sales being made in Atlanta, where at that time it was lawful to sell it; that his trips to the negro's home in Morgan county were for the purpose of collecting money from him, and that when the negro was arrested he seized the remainder of the stock on hand merely to protect his house for the unpaid balance of the purchase price; that the negro was in no sense his agent; that he was not instrumental in procuring him to sell liquor.

Teitlebaum, the bookkeeper of the Lomax Distilling Company, testified for the defense that the negro, Martin Wyatt, came to Atlanta and stated that he wanted to buy some liquor, and that he (Teitlebaum) told him that he would have to wait and see Mr. Loeb; that the negro arranged with Loeb to buy a certain amount of whisky and paid $30 in advance on it; and that afterwards, from time to time, the negro ordered whisky from the Lomax Distilling Company as any other customer would have done. He denied that Loeb, or the Lomax Distilling Company, procured a federal license for the negro, but admitted that he knew Loeb furnished the negro money with which to pay for the license, stating at one place in his testimony that the license was mailed to the negro, and in another that the negro went to the office of the internal revenue collector and procured the license. The cash advanced to him for this purpose was charged to him on the books of the Lomax Distilling Company.

The negro testified that Loeb furnished, not only the liquor, but also the drinking glasses and the other paraphernalia with which the business was carried on; but Loeb denied this. The testimony of the negro as to his original conversation with Loeb, and as to several other material facts in the case, was corroborated by the testimony of a negro woman who lived at his (Wyatt's) house. There was also testimony as to an admission by Loeb that he had bought and sent the revenue license to Wyatt for the reason that, if the revenue officer should inspect his books and see the amount of whisky that Wyatt was handling, it would get him into trouble.

The defense introduced testimony tending to impeach Wyatt by proof of his general bad character; and the state introduced proof in reply showing his good character and worthiness to be believed on oath. The further facts necessary to an understanding of the points presented will be stated in the opinion.

E. H. George and Middlebrook, Rogers & Knox, for plaintiff in error. Jos. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., A. G. Foster, Sol., and F. C. Foster, for the State.

POWELL, J. (after stating the facts as above). When the negro, Martin Wyatt, was about to testify for the state that the defendant had employed him to sell whisky, beer, etc., and that he, in pursuance of this arrangement, had sold the liquors for the defendant, the defendant's counsel objected to the testimony, on the ground that the indictment alleged that the defendant himself sold the liquors personally, and did not allege that he sold them by an agent or employé; that to prove a sale through an agent or employé would show a fatal variance from the manner in which the offense is charged in the indictment. The court overruled the objection, and in the petition for certiorari this is made a ground of error. In the argument counsel has strenuously stressed upon us the proposition than an indictment should set forth the offense with such particularity that the defendant will be informed with reasonable certainty of the nature of the charge against him, and will be protected from surprise brought about by the fact that the state on the trial will offer testimony to convict him by proof of a transaction not naturally indicated by the language of the indictment; that a defendant charged directly with the sale of liquor would hardly expect the state to attempt to make out this crime by proving that some other person made the actual sale, while he (the defendant), though many hundred of miles away, procured, counseled, commanded, aided, or abetted it to be done. The insistence, however, is not a new one. It has been presented to the courts before a number of times, and, despite its plausibility and its apparent reasonableness, has been almost uniformly rejected.

In the case of Kinnebrew v. State, 80 Ga. 236, 5 S. E. 56, in which the defendant was charged with the illegal sale of liquor and the proof was that the sale was made by his clerk in his absence, the same proposition now asserted by the plaintiff in error was there contended for, and Chief Justice Bleckley, speaking for the court, said: "The reply we make to the learned historical argument with which the able counsel for the plaintiff in error favored us is that, had we been here 'in the beginning,' and had he been here to make it, we should probably have yielded to it; but a contrary construction has so long prevailed, and so many hundreds, if not thousands, of cases have in the superior court practice been rested upon it, nothing but the clearest light of truth would now justify a repudiation of the common-law rule."

In the case of Hately v. State, 15 Ga. 346, it was held: "He who procures, counsels, commands, or incites his clerk or agent to commit a crime, in his absence, is guilty as an accessory before the fact, and cannot be convicted on an indictment which charges him with having jointly with his clerk committed the offense as principal." In the Kinnebrew Case, supra, this holding is declared to be obiter and unsound, and it is held that the common-law rule that there are no accessories in misdemeanors, but all are principals, is still of force in Georgia, and that the defendant may be convicted of a misdemeanor, under an indictment charging him with committing the act, committing it as principal, though the proof shows that he did not personally commit it, but was connected with it in some relationship which would make him an accessory if the offense had been a felony. This rule has been applied in a large number of cases. See Mims v. State, 88 Ga. 458, 14 S. E. 712; Parmer v. State, 91 Ga. 152, 16 S. E. 937; Forrester v. State, 63 Ga. 350; Rooney v. Augusta, 117 Ga. 709, 45 S. E. 72; Statham v. State, 84 Ga. 25, 10 S. E. 493; Kessler v. State, 119 Ga. 301, 46 S. E. 408.

Hardship may sometimes come from the operation of this rule. It is nevertheless the law. We may say, in passing, however, that the trial judges can largely guard against injustice being done under the operation of the rule; and we have no doubt that if, on the trial of a case, it should appear that the defendant had honestly and earnestly attempted to inform himself of the particular transaction for which he was being prosecuted, and the state's counsel had declined to let him know specifically what transaction he would be called upon to defend, and that the defendant was really taken by surprise at the nature of the testimony introduced against him, the judge would, by some means—postponing the trial, continuing the case, or otherwise—give him an opportunity to get his proof. In the present case there is not the slightest suggestion that the defendant did not know what transaction he would be called upon to defend. Indeed, it is candidly admitted that he did know.

2. There is also an assignment of error complaining that the court sustained an objection to a question asked by the defendant's counsel of a witness for the state. Since the question on its face does not appear to have related to a matter relevant to the investigation, and since the court was not informed at the time of what testimony counsel expected to elicit in answer to the question, according to repeated rulings of this court and of the Supreme Court, the exception is not meritorious.

3. Exception is taken to the refusal of the court to give to the jury a number of instructions duly requested in writing. We have examined all of these requests, and have compared them with the full charge of the court, which is also contained in the record. In our opinion they do not require discussion at length, but may be disposed of by the general statement that they are not meritorious, for one or the other of two reasons—either that the judge fairly and fully covered them in the general charge, or else that they were not sound as propositions of law applicable to the case.

4. Exception is taken to the following charge of the court to the jury: "If you find, under the evidence in the case, that illegal sales of liquor were made in Morgan county by some other person than the defendant, but that the defendant did knowingly aid and abet these sales, or that, being absent at the time they were made, he did yet procure, counsel, or command another to make them, he would be held responsible as a principal, and would be guilty under this presentment for selling liquor in Morgan county." We think that this was a pertinent apposite charge, stating the law applicable to the case under investigation. There was no evidence that Loeb himself personally sold liquor in Morgan county; but it was not necessary that this should be shown, in order for the defendant to have been lawfully convicted. If the jury believed the testimony of the negro, Martin Wyatt, that Loeb hired him to run the business and to sell the liquor as a mere employé, the defendant should have been found guilty on the theory that he procured or commanded the sale. If Loeb induced Wyatt to sell liquor illegally, whether as his agent or on his own account, he was guilty on the theory that he counseled the crime. More than this, if he knew that the negro was engaged in selling liquor illegally in Morgan county, and nevertheless gave him, loaned him, sold him, or otherwise furnished him liquor, or glasses, or other paraphernalia with which to carry on the business (and a substantial portion of this is practically admitted by the defendant's own testimony), he was guilty on the theory that he aided and abetted the crime. Indeed, we can accept the contention of the defendant that the negro Wyatt, the state's chief witness, is the veriest liar in all the land, and yet the conclusion that the defendant is guilty is almost irresistible.

Loeb, seeing and knowing of the large amount of liquor that this negro was buying and having shipped to him, seeing and knowing that he had procured a federal license as a retail liquor dealer in the county of Morgan, naturally knew therefrom, as a man of ordinary intelligence, that the negro was violating the law—that he was engaged in the illegal sale of liquor; and one who knowingly furnishes the proprietor of a "blind tiger," or other place where liquors are illegally sold, the liquors with which to run that business, whether such furnishing be by sale, gift, or in any other manner, bears to the illegal act of the proprietor of the place a relationship which, if the offense were a felony, would make him an accomplice, and which, since the offense is a misdemeanor, makes him a principal.

The fact that the defendant acted as the agent of the Lomax Distilling Company made no difference. The law does not look to the civil relations existing between the parties, in determining criminal responsibility in such cases. The defendant had no larger immunity from criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting Wyatt's act, by reason of the fact that he did the acts of aiding and abetting as the agent of a corporation, than he would have had if he had done so on his own behalf. All who knowingly participate in criminal transactions are, in misdemeanor cases, equally guilty, whether they participate as chief or principal actor, or as a mere accessory in the broader sense of the word—whether on their own behalf or as agent or employé of another. The aiding and abetting is what counts.

"Aid" is a plain, homely word, with a meaning well and generally understood. "Abet" smacks more of technical terminology; but it is almost synonymous with "aid." The two words together "comprehend all assistance given by acts, words, or encouragement, or by presence, actual or constructive." Ralford v. State, 59 Ala. 106, 108. "The word 'abet' includes knowledge of the wrongful purpose of the perpetrator, and counsel and encouragement in the crime." People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50. As Judge Sibley so succinctly expressed it in his charge to the jury: "The law in criminal cases does not take accurate note of the civil relations of principal and agent. Many of the principles relative to that relationship which are applied in civil transactions do not apply in criminal matters; for instance, it would not be a defense for a man, in doing any act for which he would be criminally responsible, that he did it simply as the employé or representative of some other person, if at the time he was of sound mind and of an age capable of committing a crime, and acting under no compulsion or coercion. In this case it would not be a defense that the defendant was simply acting as the representative or employé of some other person. The law does not undertake to weigh nicely and precisely a civil relation that may be shown to exist between the defendant and that other person, but puts it under the rule of law I have just stated."

It is wholly immaterial whether Wyatt was Loeb's agent, or whether Wyatt was the principal and Loeb merely knowingly assisted him. We recall what Judge Bleckley said in Forrester's Case, 63 Ga. 350, where the defendant declined to sell liquor himself, but allowed his negro servant, Mary, to sell it in his kitchen: "In the defendant's kitchen, by his servant, in his presence, and with his co-operation through the responses, 'Go to Mary,' and 'Give the money to Mary,' the traffic was carried on. There is little doubt that the defendant is the deity of this rude shrine, and that Mary was only the ministering priestess; but if she was the divinity, and he her attending spirit to warn thirsty devotees where to drink, and at whose feet to lay their tribute, he is amenable to the state as the promoter of forbidden libations. Whether in these usurped rights he was serving Mary, or Mary him, may make a difference with gods and goddesses, but makes none with men."

5. There are a number of assignments of error in addition to those which we have discussed in terms. We do not deem it profitable to set them out in extenso. None of them raise points that would be especially valuable as precedents. We have given them all careful consideration. None of them present any reversible error. The defendant was fairly tried and legally convicted.

Judgment affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 59*)—PARTIES TO OFFENSES—"PRINCIPALS"—MISDEMEANORS.

In misdemeanors, all who perpetrate, aid, or abet the offense are principals.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 159*)—FURNISHING TO MINOR—EXPRESS COMPANY.

If a person sells intoxicating liquor to a minor and ships it to him by a common carrier, and the carrier or its agent has information as to what is contained in the package and delivers it to the minor, the person selling, the carrier transporting, and the agent delivering, and all others who actively aid or abet the transaction, are guilty, as principals, of a violation of Pen. Code 1896, § 444, which forbids the selling or furnishing of intoxicating liquors to minors. If, however, the carrier, or its agent, does not know that the package contains intoxicating liquors, and there is in the circumstances nothing from which the jury would be authorized to infer guilty knowledge against them, a verdict finding the carrier guilty of the offense is as a matter of law contrary to the evidence.

Error from City Court of Quitman; J. G. McCall, Judge.

The Southern Express Company was convicted of furnishing a minor intoxicating liquor without the consent of his parent or guardian, and it brings error. Reversed.

Stanley S. Bennet and McDaniel, Alston & Black, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Edmondson, Sol., for the State.

POWELL, J. The indictment was returned by the grand jury of Brooks county jointly against H. J. Sandlin, a saloon proprietor, the Southern Express Company, a common carrier, and Hewitt, its agent at Dixie, Ga., charging them with furnishing or causing to be furnished to one Curtis Crane, a minor, certain intoxicating liquors without the written consent of his parent or guardian. The case was transferred to the city court of Quitman, and the express company alone was put upon trial. Many exceptions of law are taken, but we think it is necessary to reverse the judgment for lack of evidence to support the conviction. Crane, the minor, sent the money for the liquor to Sandlin at Valdosta, and Sandlin in turn delivered the liquor to the express company in a plain package, without anything to indicate its contents and paid the charges thereon. Hewitt, the agent at Dixie, without knowing what was in the package, and so far as the record shows without suspecting it to be whisky, delivered it to the minor.

Under these circumstances Sandlin was guilty of furnishing liquor to the minor at Dixie, the place at which the delivery took place. Newsome v. State, 1 Ga. App. 790, 58 S. E. 71. The express company, if it had delivered the liquor knowing it to be liquor, or under such circumstances as to imply guilty knowledge against it, would have been guilty also, having aided and abetted the unlawful act of Sandlin; for in misdemeanors all who aid and abet the commission of the offense, as well as those who immediately perpetrate it, are principals, and may be severally or jointly indicted as such. Southern Express Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 58 S. E. 67; Loeb v. State (this day decided) 64 S. E. 338. We pointed out in the Newsome Case, supra, that, on account of the fact that the minor cannot appoint the express company directly or by implication as its agent to receive and transport the liquor for him, the relation of that company to the transaction is that of aider or abettor to the act of the barkeeper, if what was done by the express company was knowingly done.

While a person may be guilty, either as actual perpetrator or as aider or abettor, of selling liquor to a minor, although he does not know the person to whom it is sold or furnished is a minor, yet we know of no rule by which he can be convicted upon such a transaction, where he was ignorant of the fact that what was being sold or furnished was liquor. To this extent, at least, guilty knowledge is necessary. Knowledge of the agent of the express company would be its knowledge. In this case no such knowledge is shown. We do not say, nor does able counsel for the plaintiff in error contend, that knowledge may not be implied by the jury from circumstances, such as the character of the package or the particular marks upon it or other similar things. In this case, so far as the record shows, neither the express company nor its agent had guilty knowledge as to the contents of the package, and the verdict is therefore, as a matter of law, contrary to the evidence.

Judgment reversed.

WILLIS et al. v. KALMBACH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 18, 1909.)

1. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 38*)—CONSTRUCTION—VALIDITY OF STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Nothing short of a plain and palpable repugnancy between the Constitution and a statute will warrant the courts in holding the statute void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§§ 26, 48*)—OPERATION OF CONSTITUTION—LIMITATION OF POWER—STATE CONSTITUTIONS.

As to matters not delegated by the state to the federal government, the legislative power of the General Assembly is without limit except in so far as it is restricted, expressly or by strong implication, by the state Constitution; every presumption being in favor of the constitutionality of a statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 80, 46; Dec. Dig. §§ 26, 48.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 25*)—LOCAL OPTION ELECTIONS—RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—"ALL ELECTIONS."

The Constitution of 1776 permitted persons having certain interests in real estate to vote for delegates to the General Assembly. The Constitution of 1830 permitted any white male citizen 21 years old or more, who was entitled to vote under the previous Constitution and laws, and every such citizen having a certain estate, to vote for members of the General Assembly. The Constitution of 1850 permitted every white male citizen having a certain residence to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people, and the Alexandria Constitution of 1864 contained a similar provision (article 3, § 1). Const. 1869, art. 3, § 1, authorized every male citizen resident for a certain time to vote upon all questions submitted to the people, which by the amendment of 1876 was changed to authorize such persons to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people, and Const. 1902, art. 2 (Code 1904, p. cxxi), relating to the elective franchise, by section 18 (Code 1906, p. cxxi), authorized every male citizen 21 years old resident for a certain time to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people; some of the provisions of the article not being self-executing. Const. Schedule, § 18 (Code 1904, p. cclxxviii), provides that in all elections held after this Constitution becomes effective, the qualifications of electors shall be those required by article 2 of the Constitution. The Ward act (Act Gen. Assem. Feb. 25, 1908; Laws 1908, p. 83, c. 73) provides that at any local option election held on or before the second Tuesday in June any person shall be qualified to vote who is otherwise qualified and has personally paid all state poll taxes assessable against him during the next preceding three years. Held, in view of the history of the constitutional provisions relating to suffrage, especially of the change in the Constitution of 1869, giving a right to vote upon all questions submitted to the people and the subsequent elimination of that provision, and in view of the principal purpose of the constitutional convention of 1902 which was to eliminate ignorant suffrage, and of the purpose of a constitutional schedule, that section 18 of the Schedule making the qualifications of electors in "all elections" those of article 2 meant all elections ordained by the Constitution or mentioned in the Schedule itself, which did not include local option elections provided for by the Ward act, so that that act did not contravene section 18 of the Schedule; the General Assembly having power to fix the suffrage qualifications in such election.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 188*)—CONSTRUCTION—LANGUAGE—ORDINARY MEANING.

In interpreting writings, the words must be construed with reference to their plain and ordinary meaning, giving every word its due effect, if possible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 266; Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

5. STATUTES (§ 206*)—CONSTRUCTION—CONSTRUCTION AS WHOLE.

Every part of an instrument, such as a statute, must be construed with reference to the whole instrument so as to make it harmonious and sensible as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 268; Dec. Dig. § 206.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 10½*)—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL SCHEDULE—PURPOSE.

The office of a constitutional schedule is to provide for a transition from the old to the new Constitution and obviate inconveniences which would otherwise arise from a change in government, its purpose not being to cure defects or supply omissions in the Constitution, though, if it plainly shows an intention to place any of its provisions beyond legislative control, such provisions are as binding as the Constitution itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 10½.*]

7. ELECTIONS (§ 11*)—SUFFRAGE—PROVISIONS OF FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

The object of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, so far as it relates to the right to vote, was, by its express provisions, to secure the right to vote at any election for President and Vice President, the executive and judicial officers of the state, or the members of its Legislature, and the purpose of the fifteenth amendment was to secure the right of citizens to vote in the elections enumerated in the fourteenth amendment, which did not contemplate an election such as a local option election; these provisions being the only limitation upon the state's power to regulate the right of suffrage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

Harrison, J., dissenting.

Error to Corporation Court of Fredericksburg.

Petition by Kalmbach and others against Willis and others. Judgment for petitioners, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

R. E. Byrd, Wm. H. Mann, F. M. Chichester, and B. P. Willis, for plaintiffs in error. St. Geo. R. Fitzhugh, A. T. Embrey, and C. O'C. Goolrick, for defendants in error.

KEITH, P. Upon the petition of the requisite number of persons, an election was ordered by the corporation court of the city of Fredericksburg to take place on the 5th day of May, 1908, upon the question "for licensing" or "against licensing" the sale of intoxicating liquors within the limits of the said city. At the election held in obedience to this order 351 ballots were cast against and 320 in favor of licensing.

On May 14, 1908, a petition, signed by 24 persons, was filed, praying that the election be declared illegal, null, and void, upon the following grounds:

"(1) Because the persons petitioning for the election had not paid their poll taxes, as required by law, six months prior to the presentation of the said petition to the corporation court of Fredericksburg, and none of them were exempt from the payment of capitation taxes as a prerequisite to voting, and hence none of them were qualified voters authorized to sign said petition.

"(2) Because about 80 per cent. of the persons voting at the election were not qualified voters, none of them having paid their poll tax six months prior to the date of the election; they not being exempt from such payment.

"(3) Because the act of the General Assembly approved February 25, 1908, known as the 'Ward Act' (Lays 1908, p. 83, c. 73), is unconstitutional and void, inasmuch as the said act provides that at any local option election held on or before the second Tuesday in June any person shall be qualified to vote who is otherwise qualified to vote and has personally paid at least six months prior to the second Tuesday in June of that year all state poll taxes assessed or assessable against him during the three years next preceding that in which such special or local option election is held."

A number of citizens who had voted against license were made parties defendant, and filed their answer, denying all the material allegations of the petition; and, the case coming on to be heard upon the petition, the answer, and the testimony of witnesses, an order was entered holding the Ward act passed February 25, 1908, to be in plain conflict with the Constitution of Virginia, and that the election held on May 5, 1908, was null and void.

To that judgment a writ of error was allowed by this court.

The only question insisted upon in the argument before us, and the only one which we shall consider, is as to the constitutionality of the act of Assembly approved February 25, 1908, and commonly known as the "Ward Act."

Counsel for plaintiffs in error have warned us of the evils which must flow from an affirmation of the judgment of which they complain, while counsel for defendants in error forebode consequences no less mischievous should the judgment be reversed. In this dilemma we cannot do better than to concede that the case is one of grave importance, and that any conclusion we may reach will be attended by serious results to the interests involved.

To pass upon the power of the Legislature and determine whether a statute which it has enacted is a valid exercise of its power, or is to be deemed null and void on account of its repugnancy to the Constitution, is a duty of the utmost delicacy. From the earliest exercise of this power by the courts down to the latest expression upon the subject they have with one voice declared that while the power was essential in a government in which the people, who are the source of all power, have seen fit to restrain the various governmental agencies, which they have established, by an organic act or Constitution emanating directly from themselves, nothing short of a plain and palpable repugnancy to the Constitution of the statute whose validity is called in question can warrant a court in holding a statute to be null and void.

Another principle of equal authority is that: "As to matters not ceded to the federal government, the legislative powers of the General Assembly are without limit, except so far as restrictions are imposed by the Constitution of the state in express terms or by strong implication. The state Constitution is a restraining instrument only, and every presumption is made in favor of the constitutionality of a state statute. No stronger presumption is known to the law. In order to warrant the courts to declare a state statute unconstitutional, the infraction must be clear and palpable." Whitlock v. Hawkins, 105 Va. 242, 53 S. E. 401.

As is said in Prison Association of Virginia v. Ashby, 93 Va. 667, 25 S. E. 893: "The Legislature of the state has plenary legislative power, except where it is restricted by the Constitution of the state or of the United States, and the courts have no power to declare its acts invalid merely because they regard the legislation as unwise or vicious."

And in Button v. State Corporation Commission, 105 Va. 634, 54 S. E. 769, it is said that acts of the Legislature "are always presumed to be constitutional, and can never be declared otherwise, except where they clearly and plainly violate the Constitution.

All doubts are resolved in favor of their validity, and, in resolving doubts, the legislative construction put upon the Constitution is entitled to great consideration, though it will not be given a controlling effect." See, also, Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Grat. 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367.

The principles enunciated in these decisions are fully recognized and firmly established.

By article 2, § 18, Const. 1902 (Code 1904, p. ccxi), it is provided that: "Every male citizen of the United States, twenty-one years of age, who has been a resident of the state two years, of the county, city, or town one year, and of the precinct in which he offers to vote, thirty days, next preceding the election in which he offers to vote, has been registered, and has paid his state poll taxes, as hereinafter required, shall be entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people. * * *

The remaining sections of that article merely serve to provide the means by which the voter may be secured in the exercise of his right, and the public may be protected against fraudulent and illegal voting.

This article prescribes the qualifications for voters for members of the General Assembly and all officers elective by the people. That, and none other, is its purpose and extent.

It will be well to consider the suffrage provisions of former Constitutions of this commonwealth.

In the Constitution of 1776 it was provided that "the right of suffrage in the election of members to both houses shall remain as exercised at present"; and, turning to Hening's Statutes at Large, vol. 8, at page 306, we find that "every person shall have a right to vote at any election of burgesses, for any county, who hath an estate of freehold for his own life or the life of another, or other greater estate" in land as therein prescribed—thus incorporating into the Constitution the right of suffrage as it was at that time exercised by virtue of the statute law.

By the Constitution of 1830 (article 3, § 14) "every white male citizen resident therein aged 21 years and upwards being qualified to exercise the right of suffrage according to the former Constitution and laws, and every such citizen being possessed or whose tenant for years or at will or at sufferance, is possessed of an estate of freehold of the value of $25 * * * shall be qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly."

Under the Constitution of 1850 (article 3, § 1) "every white male citizen of the commonwealth who has been a resident of the state for two years, and of the county, city or town where he offers to vote for twelve months next preceding an election—and no other person—shall be qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly and of all officers elective by the people."

A similar provision occurs in the Alexandria Constitution of 1864 (article 3, § 1) and by that of 1869 (article 3, § 1), known as the "Underwood Constitution": "Every male citizen of the United States who shall have been a resident of this state twelve months and of the county, city or town in which he shall offer to vote three months next preceding the election shall be entitled to vote upon all questions submitted to the people at such election."

It is to be observed that down to 1850 the qualification of voters applied only to the election of members of the General Assembly. At that time, however, the number of officers to be chosen by direct vote of the people was greatly increased, and provision was then made that the electorate created by the Constitution should be qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly and for all officers elective by the people. It is a striking circumstance that the Constitution of 1869 provided that the electorate which it created should be "entitled to vote upon all questions submitted to the people at such election," and that within seven years after its adoption that Constitution was amended and the language of the Constitution of 1850 upon this subject was restored. Acts 1875, p. 82, c. 87; Acts 1876, p. 87, c. 88.

We think it plain that, if the question before us were to be determined by reference to the second article of the Constitution, there could be no doubt that the Legislature, following the precedents that had been established from the foundation of our government, would have had the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters at all elections except those for members of the General Assembly and officers elective by the people, the only elections which are mentioned or referred to in that article, or indeed in any part of the Constitution, until we come to the Schedule, the effect of which we shall now consider.
